This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J.

The borough of Thetford was a borough containing, according to the census of 1881, a population of less than 10,000, and was situate for administrative purposes within the county of Norfolk. It had a separate court of quarter sessions presided over by a recorder, and there was a clerk of the peace.

Before and since the Local Government Act, 1888, the salaries of the recorder and of the clerk of the peace were paid out of the borough fund. The borough had also a separate court of petty sessions, and the clerk to the borough justices in petty sessions was paid a salary out of the borough fund. The courts of quarter and petty sessions were held at the Guildhall, and the plaintiffs had paid the expenses incurred in connection therewith.

The plaintiffs contended that by the Act of 1888 the liability for the above expenses was transferred to the defendants, and they claimed a declaration to that effect; and they also claimed to be reimbursed the expenses so paid by them.

Wills, J., refusing to follow the decision of a Divisional Court (consisting of Stephen and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) in Ex parte Kent County Council and Borough of Sandwich, [1891] 1 Q. B. 389, 39 W. R. Dig. 114, held that the obligation of paying the above expenses had not been transferred to the county councils. He also held, following the decision in In re Herefordshire County Council, [1895] 1 Q. B. 43, 43 W. R. Dig. 101, that the obligation of paying the salary of the clerk to the borough justices in petty sessions had been transferred to the county council, but that the arrears of salary recoverable must be limited to six months, having regard to the power of making county rates.

The plaintiffs appealed, and the defendants gave cross-notice of appeal.

Crump, Q.C., and Le Riche (Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. with them), for the plaintiffs.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and W. Wills, for the defendants.

The statutes and arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The main question to be determined in this case is whether the corporation of the borough of Thetford or the county council of the county of Norfolk are liable to pay the salaries of the recorder of Thetford and of the clerk of the peace of that borough. There is also a question raised by cross-appeal as to the payment of the salary of the clerk to the petty sessions holden in and for that borough, which I will deal with separately. There is no doubt that prior to the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, the corporation of Thetford, which was a quarter sessions borough, was liable to pay the salaries of its recorder and clerk of the peace, and for that purpose might have recourse to the borough fund. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 140, and schedule 5, part 1, is clear as to this, and it is wholly unnecessary to go back to the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, or prior thereto, as we were invited to do by counsel. The sole point we have to determine as to the salary of the recorder and clerk of the peace is this—Has the Local Government Act, 1888, taken off the shoulders of the corporation of Thetford the obligation of paying its recorder and clerk of the peace and transferred the obligation on to the shoulders of the county council of the county of Norfolk? This entirely depends upon what is to be found in the Local Government Act, 1888, and, without travelling into what I conceive to be matters irrelevant to what I have to decide, I will point out as concisely as I can how the matter stands. By the Local Government Act, 1888, the boroughs of England and Wales were dealt with for certain purposes in three classes. The first class consists of boroughs which contained a population of not less than 50,000 on the 1st of June, 1888, or were counties in themselves. These are called "county boroughs." The second class consists of quarter sessions boroughs, not being county boroughs, which contained a population of 10,000 and upwards according to the census of 1881. These I will call the larger boroughs. And the third class consists of quarter sessions boroughs, which contained a population of less than 10,000 according to the census of 1881. These I will call the smaller boroughs. The borough of Thetford falls within this last class of boroughs. It is clear that the Legislature had a reason for splitting up the boroughs of England and Wales into these three classes, but why it did so is not for me to speculate upon or determine; it is sufficient to say that upon reading sections 31, 35, and 38 of the Act of 1888 it is manifest that the Legislature has done so. Now, as regards this first class of boroughs—i.e., the county boroughs—sections 31-34 of the Act are made to apply to them, and to them alone. I have not to consider the why and the wherefore the special provisions of these four sections are made applicable to this class of boroughs and not to the other two classes of boroughs, but that they are so applied is clear, and I have nothing more to to say upon this matter, especially as the borough of Thetford does not fall within this class. I now come to the second class of boroughs, to which, and to which alone, section 35 with all its sub-sections applies. This section commences: "In the case of a quarter sessions borough not being one of the boroughs named in the third schedule to this Act," that is, not being a county borough, "but containing a population of 10,000 or upwards, the following provisions shall . . . apply." Then come special and specific provisions applicable to this class of borough, and in my opinion to this class alone. By sub-section 5 of this 35th section it is enacted: "The payment of the costs of assizes and sessions shall be a general county purpose for which the parishes in the borough"—obviously, in my opinion, meaning the larger boroughs—"may be assessed to county contributions, and all costs of prosecutions mentioned in section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, shall be paid out of the county fund." So far as this sub-section 5 of section 35 is inconsistent with section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, it repeals it; see especially section 126 of the Local Government Act, 1888. It is said that this sub-section relieves the larger boroughs from payment of their recorders and clerks of the peace. It may or may not do so. I have not to decide the point, for I have only to deal with the corporation of Thetford, which is not larger but a smaller borough. I now come to what I have to decide—viz., whether, by reason of section 38 of the Act of 1888, the corporation of Thetford is relieved from paying its recorder and clerk of the peace, and whether this burden is cast upon the county council of the county of Norfolk. Section 38, which has application to the smaller boroughs alone, is wholly dissimilar in its provisions from section 35 of the Act, which has application to the larger boroughs alone. Why the Legislature has determined to deal differently with the three classes of boroughs, as I have before said, it is not for me to speculate upon; it has done so. This section 38 enacts that "Where a borough having a separate court of quarter sessions contained according to the census of 1881 a population of less than 10,000"—which is the case of the borough of Thetford—"(1) there shall be transferred to the county council the powers, duties, and liabilities of the council and justices of the borough" relating to pauper lunatic asylums, to coroners, to analysts, to reformatory and industrial schools, to fish conservancy, of explosives, and also to the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878. Power is given by this section for the council of the borough to apply to the county council to declare certain roads in the borough to be main roads. By sub-section 5 of section 38 it is enacted that "the area of the borough shall for the purposes of the above-mentioned Acts and all other administrative purposes of the county council be included in the county as if the borough had not a separate court of quarter sessions, and accordingly shall be subject to the authority of the county council and the county coroners, and may be annexed by the county council to a coroner's district of the county, and the parishes in the borough shall be liable to be assessed to all county contributions." The administrative purposes mentioned in the section have nothing to do with judicial functions of the borough. Administrative purposes are not judicial functions. It will be noticed that the salaries of recorders and clerks of the peace in section 38, which deals with the smaller boroughs, are in no way touched or dealt with; they are left to be paid as they were before the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888—i.e., by the corporations of the smaller boroughs. By sub-sections 7 and 8 of section 38 power is given to the council of any borough of less than 10,000 inhabitants according to the census of 1881, whether a quarter sessions borough or not, to petition her Majesty to revoke the grant of a court of quarter sessions to the borough, and also to revoke the grant of a commission of the peace for the borough. It was argued on behalf of the borough that the Legislature must have meant to place the payment of salaries of the recorder and clerk of the peace of the smaller boroughs upon the county, because it had done so in the case of the larger boroughs (whether it has or not I do not decide), and because by sub-section 5 of section 38 Thetford, a smaller borough, is made liable to be assessed to all county contributions, and therefore it should be held that, if the transfer of the burden of paying the recorder and clerk of the peace to the county council cannot be found in section 38 of the Act, which it clearly cannot be, sub-section 5 of section 35 must be pressed into the service and construed as a general provision not limited to the larger boroughs, as in my opinion it unquestionably is, and made applicable to the smaller boroughs as well. It is said, if this be not done, the Act would work injustice, and therefore this sub-section 5 of section 35 should be so read. With all submission to the late Mr. Justice Stephen and to my brother Vaughan Williams, who, in the case of Ex parte Kent County Council, held that sub-section 5 of section 35 was to be read as a general provision applicable to both the larger and smaller class of boroughs, I cannot agree. To hold so would, in my opinion, be doing such violence to the provisions and framework of the Act as no court would be justified in doing, even if the suggested imputations upon the legislation be well-founded, which I am by no means convinced of. The special provisions of sub-section 5 of section 35 applicable to the larger boroughs are, in my judgment, purposely omitted from section 38, which is applicable to the smaller boroughs. The special provisions of sub-section 5 of section 38 are, as was pointed out by Sir Robert Reid, such as to tax the borough for the expenses of the county, and not the county for the expenses of the borough; and yet it is now said by the borough that the true reading of the Act is that the county should pay these expenses (salaries of recorder and clerk of the peace) of the borough. It is, too, significant that the Legislature in this section 38 has given to the smaller boroughs an easy way out of these difficulties, if they do not desire to continue to pay their recorder and clerk of the peace when made liable to county contributions; for they may, under sub-section 7 of section 38, petition her Majesty to revoke the grant of a court of quarter sessions and also the grant of a commission of the peace. This right is not given, it will be seen, to the larger boroughs. As to the suggestion that the borough of Thetford is unable by reason of the Act of 1888 to pay out of its borough fund the salary of its recorder and clerk of the peace, I cannot find that it is well-founded, and do not agree with it. The construction of section 38 of the Act of 1888 appears to me to be clear, and, in my judgment, nowhere in that section nor anywhere else in the Act of 1888 can it be found that the obligation of the borough of Thetford to pay its recorder and clerk of the peace has been taken from the borough and transferred to the county council of Norfolk. Section 36 in no way deals with the liability of a corporation and has no bearing on this case. I agree with my brother Wills that the liability of the corporation to pay its recorder and clerk of the peace has not been transferred by the Act of 1888 to the county council, and I am of opinion that the appeal of the corporation of Thetford from his judgment should be dismissed.

I now come to the cross-appeal of the county council as to whether the borough of Thetford or the county council of the county of Norfolk is liable to pay the salary of the clerk to the borough justices in petty sessions holden in and for the borough of Thetford. My brother Wills has followed and agreed with the case of In re Herefordshire County Council, where a Divisional Court held, following the case of Cornwall County Council v. Truro Town Council, 63 L. J. M. C. 60, which was a borough with a population of over 10,000, that the salary of the clerk to borough petty sessions had since the Act of 1888 to be paid by the county council, and not by the borough. The correctness of this decision is now challenged in this court, and we have to say if it be rightly decided. The way in which it is said that the county council and not the borough is liable to pay the salary of the clerk to the petty sessions of the borough is this. First of all, the Act of 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 18) is referred to, which is "An Act for the holding of petty sessions of the peace in boroughs," not in counties. This Act, after reciting that "petty sessions of the peace are holden in and for certain divisions of the several counties of England and Wales, called petty sessional divisions, and important duties have lately been assigned to the justices attending at such petty sessions and to their clerks by certain Acts of Parliament, and it is desirable to declare and enact that the sittings of justices of the peace . . . in and for every . . . borough . . . having a separate commission of the peace . . . shall be deemed a petty sessions of the peace within the meaning of such Acts," enacts that "every sitting and acting of justices of the peace . . . in and for any . . . borough . . . having a separate commission of the peace . . . within England and Wales . . . shall be deemed a petty sessions of the peace, and the district for which the same shall be holden shall be deemed a petty sessional division within the meaning of any Acts of Parliament already made or hereafter to be made having relation to such petty sessions or to any business to be transacted thereat." It is not suggested that any Act prior to the Act of 1849 places the appointment and payment of a salaried clerk to a borough petty sessions in the county council, and it is not denied that prior to the passing of the Act of 1888 the borough appointed and paid the salaried clerk to its own petty sessions. It is, however, said that the Local Government Act of 1888 changes all this, and that section 84 is the section which effects this. Section 84, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1888 runs thus: "(1) The salaried clerk of every petty sessional division shall be from time to time appointed and removed as heretofore. (2) The county council shall pay to the salaried clerks of petty sessional divisions such salaries" as by this sub-section are enacted, and the standing joint committee are substituted for quarter sessions justices and the local authority respectively. It is true that by the Act of 1849 the borough bench is made a petty sessional division—that is, so far as this is concerned, they are placed on a par with county petty sessions; but with what salaried clerks is section 84 of the Act of 1888 dealing? Now, it will be seen that section 3, sub-section (X.), of the Act of 1888, which is the transfer section to the county council, deals, amongst other things, with salaried clerks of county justices, but not with salaried clerks of borough justices. Section 84 of the Act of 1888 also, in my opinion, deals with the salaried clerks of county petty sessional divisions, and not with the salaried clerks of a borough petty sessional division, and for these reasons. Section 84 is part of a group of sections commencing with section 83, which group is headed "Officers." Section 83 refers to county and not to borough officers; this is clear. The joint committee (appointed under section 30) mentioned in this section, as also in section 84, is composed of an equal number of county justices and county councilmen. This committee cannot interfere with the judicial functions of a larger or smaller borough. Section 84, which follows section 83, deals, in my judgment, with exactly the same class of salaried clerks as section 83—i.e., salaried clerks of county petty sessional divisions, and not with salaried clerks of borough petty sessional divisions. The words "Every petty sessional division" in section 84, according to the context and whole scope of the Act, mean, in my opinion, a county and not a borough petty sessional division. It will be seen that by section 84 (2) the appointment as well as the removal of the salaried clerk mentioned in the section is expressly left where this had been prior to the passing of the Act—that is, the appointment and removal of a county petty sessional salaried clerk is left with the county authority. If this sub-section applied to a borough petty sessions salaried clerk, which, I think, it does not, then the appointment and removal of a borough petty sessional salaried clerk is left with the borough authority. Sub-section 2 of section 84 also appears to throw light upon this, for by it the joint committee, composed as above-mentioned of county men, is introduced to deal with the "officers" mentioned in sections 83 and 84. What has such a committee to do with a borough officer, to whose selection, appointment, and removal they are strangers, and advisedly kept strangers, by the Act, though it is now said they are by reason of the Act to pay his salary? I do not see the object or sense of this, and, in my opinion, it is not the true construction of the Act. In my judgment section 84 of the Act of 1888 does not apply to borough petty sessions salaried clerks at all, and, therefore, does not shift the payment of such salaried clerks on to the county council. In my judgment, the corporation of Thetford is liable to pay the salary of its own clerk to its own borough petty sessions, as it was before the passing of the Act of 1888, and this obligation is not by the Act cast upon the county of Norfolk; and the case of In re Herefordshire County Council was not rightly decided; and, consequently, this appeal by the county council must be allowed. I have heard nothing about a point apparently taken in the court below, but not taken here, as to the salary of the clerk of the justices acting as visitors of licensed houses for lunatics in the borough of Thetford, and I therefore say nothing about it. As the county council has succeeded in this appeal and cross-appeal, first as respondents, and secondly as appellants, they must have their costs of each appeal both here and below.

RIGBY, L.J., read a judgment concurring with the above.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., also read a judgment agreeing with the above, stating that after consideration he had come to the conclusion that the decision of Stephen, J., and himself in In re Kent County Council and Borough of Sandwich was wrong.

Railway—Traffic—Rates—Rebate—Goods received at private siding—Station accommodation and terminal services—Burden of proof—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 54), s. 4.

On an application to the railway commissioners to determine a rebate upon rates under section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, the applicants proved that they delivered goods to the respondent railway company at a siding which belonged to themselves and not to the railway company, and that they had been charged rates by the railway company; but they did not prove that the rates so charged included any charge for station accommodation or terminal services. Their case was that they had sufficiently raised a presumption that they had been charged for station accommodation and terminal services.

Held, by A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ., that the application failed on the ground that the applicants had not satisfied the onus which lay upon them of making out the primâ facie case which they undertook to establish.

Held, by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that the application failed on the ground that it was clear that the rates charged did not include charges for station accommodation or terminal services; but, quære, whether the onus was upon the applicants to show that the railway company had charged for station accommodation or terminal services.

Appeal from a judgment of the Court of the Railway and Canal Commission on an application under section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894.

The applicants, the Salt Union (Limited), were manufacturers of salt carrying on business at various places in Cheshire upon premises adjacent to the line of the respondents, the North Staffordshire Railway Co., and connected therewith by means of sidings which belonged to, and were situate upon the premises of, the applicants, and which did not belong to the respondents.

The applicants consigned salt from each of their said sidings for carriage over the railway of the respondents and delivery at stations or sidings situate in some cases upon the respondent's railway, and in other cases upon railways of other companies. The contracts and charges for the carriage of the salt were made with and paid to the respondents.

The salt was always loaded into trucks belonging to the applicants, and at the initial terminus the applicants did not make use of any accommodation at a terminal station, nor did the respondent company perform any duties at a terminal station.

The applicants claimed to be entitled to an allowance or rebate from all rates upon such salt traffic charged to them by the respondent company in respect that the company did not provide station accommodation for such traffic.

A dispute having arisen with reference to such allowance or rebate, the applicants applied to the commissioners to determine what would be a reasonable and just allowance or rebate.

The respondent company in their answer alleged that no station or terminal service or any other charge whatever in respect of the initial terminus was included in the rates charged to the applicants, and that the applicants were not entitled to any allowance or rebate.

On the hearing of the application Wright, J., delivered the judgment of the commissioners in favour of the respondent company on the ground that the applicants had failed to give any evidence that a terminal charge in respect of the initial terminus was included in the rates charged to the applicants, or any evidence of a comparable rate by which the matter might be tested.

The applicants appealed.

C. A. Cripps, Q.C. (R. Whitehead with him), for the applicants.—Section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, is as follows: "Whenever merchandize is received or delivered by a railway company at any siding or branch railway not belonging to the company, and a dispute arises between the railway company and the consignor or consignee of such merchandize as to any allowance or rebate to be made from the rates charged to such consignor or consignee in respect that the railway company does not provide station accommodation or perform terminal services, the Railway and Canal Commissioners shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such dispute, and to determine what, if any, is a reasonable and just allowance or rebate." On the true construction of that section all that the applicants had to prove, in order to bring their case within the section, was that their goods had been received by the company at a siding which did not belong to the company, and that the company had charged them rates, and that the company had not provided station accommodation or performed terminal services. It was not necessary for them to show affirmatively that the rates which had been charged included charges for station accommodation or terminal services. The company ought to be called upon to show that the rates did not include any such charges. The learned judge had been wrong in practically nonsuiting the applicants.

Littler, Q.C., and Ernest Moon, for the respondent company.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. This is an application by a trading company under section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894 by which, as I understand the matter and read the section, they ask the commissioners to grant them a rebate from rates charged to them by the respondent railway company, on the ground that they have been charged for station accommodation which has not been provided and for terminal services which have not been rendered, because the applicants did not require such station accommodation or services, as their goods were delivered to the railway company from their own private sidings. The applicants argue that the true construction of the section is, that, though the trader does not show that he has paid one penny for station accommodation or terminal services, yet he is entitled to carry in his case before the commissioners and prove that he had his own siding and that he did not require or have station accommodation or terminal services from the railway company, and on proof of that alone he can call upon the railway company to prove a negative—viz., that they have not charged him for station accommodation or terminal services. But an application under this section is for a rebate, that is, as it seems to me, a rebate from that which the trader has been charged. I cannot think that the construction put upon the section by the applicants is a true one. In my judgment the meaning is this: that where the trader, either by reference to a comparable rate or by any other evidence, makes out a primâ facie or presumptive case that he has been charged wrongly for station accommodation or terminal services, the railway commissioners may call upon the railway company to answer that primâ facie or presumptive case. But I cannot see that, where the applicant merely brings himself, as it seems to me, half within the section—i.e., proves that he has not had station accommodation provided for him or terminal services rendered to him, but does not prove that he has been charged one single penny more than he ought to have been by the company, the company can be called upon to answer a case which has not been made out against them. I entirely agree with the construction which was put upon this section by my brother Collins in the case of Corporation of Birmingham v. Midland Railway Co., 9 Ry. & Can. Traff. Cas. 165.

RIGBY, L.J.—The question turns upon the construction of section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894. I cannot read the section as if the words "in respect that the railway company does not provide station accommodation or perform terminal services" were not there, and as if the words were "in respect that the railway company has charged for station accommodation or terminal services." On the language used it appears to me to be open to an applicant who brings himself within the words of the section to prove his claim to a rebate in any way he can, and I see no reason why he should not prove his claim without showing that the company have charged him for station accommodation and terminal services. But an applicant must make out a primâ facie case somehow, and the way in which the applicants here chose to make out their case was by raising the presumption that they had been charged for station accommodation and terminal services. The onus was upon them, and the learned judge held that they had not produced any evidence to support that presumption. In that I think he was right. But I do not think that the section confines the applicant to proving that the rate which he has been charged includes a charge for station accommodation or terminal services.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — As I understand, Wright, J., in this case, and Collins, J., in Corporation of Birmingham v. Midland Railway Co. have both decided clearly that, where a trader comes before the railway commissioners to invite them to exercise their jurisdiction under section 4 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, it is part of the onus which is thrown upon the applicant to give primâ facie evidence that he is being charged by the railway company in respect of duties as to which the company have been relieved by reason of a siding or branch railway having been provided by him and not by the company. A. L. Smith, L.J., entirely agrees with their view. I therefore feel very great difficulty in arriving at a different conclusion, but I think it is my duty to express my opinion as to the construction of this section. The scope of the section, according to my view, is to provide not only for the past, but for the future, and I think the meaning is this—that, where there is a private siding or a private railway, and the railway company and the trader who owns the private siding or private railway cannot agree as to what the rate shall be, or whether the rate, which is proposed to be charged by the company or which has actually been charged by the company, is a just rate, then the commissioners shall fix the rate. I do not feel at all certain that, when the trader proves that he owns a private siding, and that he consigns goods by the railway, and that a charge is made on him by the railway company, he is not entitled to ask the commissioners to determine what is a just allowance or rebate to be made for the fact that the railway company have not had the trouble or expense of providing station accommodation or terminal services. However, on the ground that the facts of this case show clearly that the railway company have not charged anything for station accommodation or terminal services, I am of opinion that the decision appealed against is right. I only wish to express the inclination of my opinion that an applicant brings himself within this section when he proves that his merchandize has been received or delivered by the railway company at a siding or branch railway not belonging to the company, and that a dispute has arisen between him and the railway company as to the allowance or rebate to be made from the rates charged to him.

Executor—Retainer—Following assets—Retainer for debt of deceased without notice of debt of higher degree.

An executor who pays creditors without notice of the existence of a creditor of higher degree is not liable to account at the instance of that creditor for the sums so paid. Retainer of the amount of a debt out of a deceased person's estate by the executor is payment at law, and he is therefore not liable to refund if an enforceable debt of higher degree, of which he had no notice, should afterwards appear to be due.

Summons.

By an indenture of the 2nd of July, 1877, certain funds, representing proceeds of sale of family estates or money liable to be laid out in the purchase of real estate, to which Sir John H. Fludyer, baronet, was entitled as tenant for life under a settlement of the 29th of January, 1822, and Charles Fludyer was entitled as tenant in tail, were disentailed and limited to such uses as Sir John H. Fludyer and Charles Fludyer should jointly appoint.

In July, 1879, a sum of £65,000 was raised out of the settled funds and paid to Charles Fludyer.

By an indenture of re-settlement of the 3rd of

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June, 1880, and made between the said Sir John H. Fludyer of the first part, the said Charles Fludyer of the second part, and the plaintiffs of the third part, the settled funds comprised in and assured by the disentailing deed of the 2nd of July, 1877, were limited to the uses upon and for such trusts and purposes, and subject to such terms and provisoes, agreements, and declarations as the said Sir John H. Fludyer and Charles Fludyer should by deed jointly from time to time appoint, and subject thereto to uses in strict settlement, under which Sir John H. Fludyer was tenant for life in possession, with remainder to the use of Charles Fludyer for life, and then to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to the use of Arthur J. Fludyer, with remainders over.

Further sums of £42,000 and £5,000 were subsequently raised out of the settled funds, by means of the joint appointment, and paid to Charles Fludyer.

In January, 1895, Charles Fludyer died without issue, having by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate, property, and effects unto and to the use of the defendant, whom he also appointed sole executrix. This will was duly proved by the defendant, the estate being worth about £3,200. The defendant paid some of the debts, including one to her sister of £1,000, and retained the balance as part satisfaction of a debt of her own of £2,181, which was owing to her from Charles Fludyer at the time of his death.

In August, 1896, Sir John H. Fludyer died, and the settled fund devolved upon Sir Arthur J. Fludyer, the present baronet, as tenant for life under the said re-settlement of 1880.

The succession duty which became payable on the death of Sir John H. Fludyer on the said several sums of £65,000, £42,000, and £5,000, was not commuted and paid prior to the same being made over to Charles Fludyer, and on the death of Sir John H. Fludyer the Crown claimed payment of succession duty from the plaintiffs as the trustees of the settlement of June, 1880. The plaintiffs' contention was that this succession duty should be borne and paid out of the estate of Charles Fludyer in priority to other creditors against his estate, including the defendant, as a Crown debt.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the plaintiffs.—The trustees are primarily liable to pay this duty, but are entitled to the Crown's priority if they pay: In re Churchill, Manisty v. Churchill, 36 W. R. 805, 39 Ch. D. 174. The estate of Charles Fludyer is liable to pay this succession duty to the extent of the assets, and the defendant ought to have paid this debt before paying any of the ordinary creditors. The defendant might have retained her own debt as against creditors of equal degree, but not as against a Crown debt. The amount retained by an executor in payment of his own debt, or share of the estate, can be recovered, because it remains in his hands as part of the estate: Blake v. Gale, 34 W. R. 555, 32 Ch. D. 571, p. 577, and to the extent of the sum retained the defendant must pay this debt of higher rank which now falls due.

Levett, Q.C., and Leverson, for the defendant.—At the date of Charles Fludyer's death, the claim for succession duty had not and could not have been made. The defendant can plead plene administravit without notice, and had a right to retain her own debt, not having at that time any notice of any debts of superior degree: Williams on Executors, 9th ed. pp. 879 and 884. If the plaintiffs' contention is right, then an executor is the only person who cannot get safely paid.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—ROMER, J.—Since the case of Harman v. Harman, 2 Show. 492, it has been considered settled law that an executor who pays creditors without notice of the existence of a creditor of higher degree is not liable to account at the instance of that creditor for the sums so paid.

In the case before me the defendant distributed her testator's estate in paying his debts (including a debt due to herself which she retained out of the assets) without notice of the debt which the plaintiffs now seek to enforce, in good faith, and without undue haste. It is admitted these payments are good as against the plaintiffs, except as to the retained debt, but with regard to that the plaintiffs contend that the defendant must be considered to have the amount of that debt in her hands as executrix, for which she is liable to account. I cannot see the justice of this contention, and think it unsound. Why should her debt when paid be treated differently from the other debts paid by her? It would be very unfair as against the executrix that she should be held always liable to refund, if an enforceable debt of higher degree, of which she had no notice, should afterwards appear to be due. It appears to me the simple answer to the plaintiffs' contention is that the debt in question is not in the hands of the defendant as executrix. She has been paid it, just as the other creditors have been paid their debts. Retainer is payment at law. If any authority was wanted for this it is supplied by the decisions that an executor under the plea of plene administravit can put in evidence retainer by him of his own debt: Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 1851.

There is no authority or principle that I can see which supports the plaintiffs' claim. The plaintiffs referred to the case of Blake v. Gale, where executors who were also some of the residuary legatees had retained their own shares of residue, and were at the instance of creditors made liable to account for the shares of residue retained by them as being still in their hands. But that case is quite distinguishable. A legatee is a volunteer, and assets paid to him can be followed by a creditor; a creditor is not a volunteer, and a creditor of higher degree has no right, because of that position only, to follow assets in the hands of an executor retained by him in discharge of his own debt. For these reasons I decide against the plaintiffs. The form of order will be: The court being of opinion that Charles Fludyer's estate has been fully administered, dismiss this summons with costs.

An officer of a charity was entitled under a special Act of Parliament to receive a salary of not less than £300, nor exceeding £500, without deduction or abatement for taxes. At the date of the special Act no income tax was payable.

Held, with regard to a person appointed to the office after the passing of the Income Tax Act of 1842, that the persons liable to pay the salary were bound to deduct the income tax therefrom.

Summons.

This was a summons to determine the liability of the governors and wardens of a certain charity in Liverpool and the Chapel of the Blessed Virgin Mary thereto belonging to deduct income tax in respect of the salary of a chaplain. The facts of the case were as follow: By a special local Act, 1829 (10 Geo. 4, c. xv.), provision was made for establishing and governing an institution in Liverpool, called the "School for the Indigent Blind at Liverpool," for incorporating the subscribers thereto, and also for regulating and supporting a chapel attached to the said institution.

By this Act the governing body of the school was incorporated under the name of "The President, Vice-Presidents, Treasurer, and Members of the Liverpool School for the Indigent Blind."

Section 22 of the Act, after enacting that a certain clergyman therein mentioned should be first chaplain of the said chapel, provided that "the next presentation and the future patronage for disposition, nomination, and appointment, and right of presentation to the said chapel shall for ever appertain, belong to, and be vested in the mayor of the town of Liverpool, the senior alderman of the said town, and two of the vice-presidents of the said institution or charity for the time being specially appointed to join in making such nomination or appointment according to the provisions of this Act, or in such of them as shall be members of the United Church of England and Ireland."

Section 26 provides "that for the maintenance of the chaplain for the time being of the said chapel the persons who shall be wardens thereof for the time being in pursuance of the Act and their successors shall, by and out of the rents of the pews erected therein, yearly and in every year well and truly pay or cause to be paid to such chaplain, as may be directed by the said committee, a sum not less than £300, nor exceeding £500, of lawful English money without any deduction or abatement for taxes or otherwise howsoever on the first day of January and on the first day of July in each year, by even and equal portions, and the money so to be paid shall be allowed to such wardens in their accounts, and a due apportionment of the said salary shall from time to time be made between the executors and administrators of any chaplain of the said chapel dying in the interval before the half-yearly days of payment and the successor of such chaplain so dying for and in respect of the half-year wherein such death shall happen.

Section 34 provides "that after payment of the said stipend, salaries, or wages, hereinbefore authorised to be paid by the said chapelwardens of the said chapel, the residue of all moneys received by them in anywise arising from the said chapel shall be paid over from time to time to the treasurer for the time being of the said institution or charity to be applied under the direction of the said committee in defraying the expenses of any alterations or repairs to the said chapel, or in augmenting the stipends of the chaplain, organist, clerk, or sexton of the said chapel, or in any such manner, for the benefit of the said institution or charity in such manner as shall seem best to the said committee."

The Act also (section 26) gives remedies for the recovery of the salary, including power to go before the bishop of the diocese and to obtain a sequestration of profits, or to sue by action of debt.

The income tax imposed in the year 1806 (46 Geo. 3, c. 65) had expired at the date of the passing of the Act, and was not re-imposed until 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35).

The plaintiff in the action was appointed to the post of chaplain in 1884 at a salary of £500 a year.

Up to a date shortly prior to the commencement of the action the chaplain had received the salary in full and had himself paid the income tax. The chapel authorities' attention had then been drawn to the fact that it was their duty to deduct the duty from the salary. The chaplain thereupon submitted that he was entitled to receive his salary in full, and that it was consequently the duty of the wardens to pay the tax for him and to pay him the salary in full.

Hughes, Q.C., and Sampson, for the plaintiff.—It is true that at the date of 10 Geo. 4, c. xv., there was no income tax payable. The only tax which this Act can be supposed to have contemplated by the Act is the Income Tax. [They referred to the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 102.] The liability of the wardens to pay the salary in full and to make no deduction for income tax arose not from any contract, but from a special and local Act of Parliament. Under the words of section 22 the income tax ought to be paid by the the wardens. They referred to Festing v. Taylor, 10 W. R. 246, 3 B. & S. 217; Lord Lovat v. Duchess of Leeds, 10 W. R. 397, 2 Dr. & Sm. 62; Seward v. Owner of "The Vera Cruz," 33 W. R. 477, 10 App. Cas. 59. The words of the special Act are clear, and the chaplain's salary must be determined under that Act. Nothing in any subsequent Act has in any way altered or abrogated his right to be paid his salary in full without any deduction in respect of any tax.

Eve, Q.C., and Stuart Deacon, for the defendants (the charity).—The question is one of contract. A contract was entered into between the chaplain and the charity after the income tax had become payable. Practically the matter was determined by the arrangement made between the chaplain and governors when the former was appointed.

Hughes, Q.C., in reply.—There was no contract in the case. The plaintiff was appointed to perform certain duties under the special Act.

BYRNE, J.—The claim of the plaintiff in this action is, that under the Act 10 Geo. 3, c. xv., he is entitled to be paid his salary of £500 without any deduction in respect of income tax from it by those who had appointed him.

The Act of Parliament under which a chaplain could be appointed in this institute was passed in the year 1829. At that date no income tax was payable. Section 26 arranges for the payment of the salary of a chaplain—[His lordship read the section.]—and provides that it shall be payable "without any deduction or abatement for taxes or otherwise howsoever." This Act, although a special, was a public Act of Parliament. The Income Tax Act was passed in 1842, and by that Act the payment of income tax is imposed upon such a salary as this is. The chaplain was appointed by resolution of the body entitled to appoint him, I think in 1884, at a salary of £500. That appointment involved a determination of what the salary of the chaplain was to be, because the Act of Parliament only gives limits within which the salary must range. That determination of the amount of the salary appears to me to amount to a contract between the parties appointing the chaplain and the chaplain himself. The Income Tax Act of 1842 distinctly provides that the duties chargeable under the Act in respect of such salaries as the present shall be detained and stopped out of the same or out of any money which shall be paid upon such salaries, or for arrears thereof, whenever the same shall happen, and be applied to the satisfaction of duties (not otherwise paid) in the manner directed by this Act. Since his appointment up to the present time the chapel authorities have paid the chaplain the sum of £500 in full and out of that he has himself paid the duty, as indeed he was bound to do. Defendants now say that they ought to detain the duty out of the salary. To the chaplain it makes no difference. It is a matter of collection. It is for the convenience of collection and to ensure payment that the hand to pay the money is made in this case the payer instead of the payee. But it is said that inasmuch as the special Act of Parliament provides that the salary, whether it is £300 or more than £300, or whether it amounts to £500 or any intermediate sum, is to be paid without any deduction or abatement for taxes. They cannot say that they are not to deduct, because the later Act of Parliament says they are to detain it, which is the same thing; but that it is equivalent to saying that if any future Act of Parliament shall compel them to make deductions for taxes, they shall be liable to pay a further sum, equivalent to the amount of the tax, so as to make up the full sum of £500 to the chaplain. I do not think that this is the true effect of this legislation and of the bargain that has been entered into between the parties. I think the effect of it is this, that the Act of 1842 provides machinery imposing a duty upon the trustees to deduct or detain money from payments which would otherwise be made in full. That duty is imposed upon them by an Act of Parliament, and they cannot refuse to perform it. Therefore it seems to me that inasmuch as it does not impose an additional burden upon the chaplain, for, as I have said, if he were paid the £500 without any deduction he would have to pay the income tax himself, it being a personal tax, I think that the true result of it is that the chaplain is not entitled to be paid £500 and not to recoup the governing body that which they are obliged to pay, and which the Act of Parliament says they are to pay by way of detention of his salary. Therefore I so hold.

BLAKE & CO. v. WOOLF. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Premises let to tenants—Damage to tenant's goods by overflow from landlord's cistern—Employment of plumber—Negligence of plumber—Liability of landlord for damage.

The plaintiffs took from the defendant the ground-floor of premises of which the defendant was the owner, and at the top of which the defendant had a cistern from which the premises were supplied with water. The water had been laid on when the plaintiffs became tenants, and the plaintiffs took their supply of water from the cistern. The plaintiffs discovered a leakage from the cistern, and gave the defendant notice of it, and requested him to remedy it. The defendant employed a competent plumber to remedy the defect; but, through the negligence of the plumber, the defect in the cistern was not remedied, the result being that the water overflowed, flooded the plaintiffs' rooms, and damaged their goods.

Held, that, in the absence of negligence or wilfulness on the part of the defendant, the defendant was not responsible for the negligence of the plumber whom he had employed, and that he was therefore not liable to the plaintiffs.

Appeal from the judgment of the deputy-judge of the City of London court.

The facts were as follows: The defendant was the owner and landlord of premises in Wood-street, Cheapside. He had a cistern on the fourth floor and had laid on water to the premises, and the whole of the premises was supplied with water from this cistern. The plaintiffs took from the defendant, and became tenants of, the ground-floor and basement of the premises after the water had been laid on. The cistern was upon the premises when the plaintiffs became tenants, and the plaintiffs took their supply of water from the defendant's cistern. On a certain Friday a leakage from the cistern was discovered, and on the same day the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendant to have it remedied. The defendant on the same day gave orders that it should be attended to, and his clerk employed and instructed a plumber to set the cistern right. The plumber undertook to set the matter right, but through his negligence the cistern was not, on the Friday, set right, and the defect was not remedied, with the consequence that when the plaintiffs' premises were opened on the Monday morning it was found that the water from the cistern had overflowed and flooded the plaintiffs' rooms and damaged their goods.

The plaintiffs then brought this action to recover £15 for the damage so caused to their goods.

The judge was of opinion that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence in employing the plumber he had employed to set the matter right, and he was also of opinion that the mischief was in fact caused by the negligence of the plumber in not having remedied the defect when he was called in on the Friday; and he held that, in point of law, it became the absolute duty of the defendant, when he received notice of the defect, to have the defect remedied, and that, not having done so, he was liable to the plaintiffs for the damage to the goods, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendant to appeal.

The defendant appealed.

Ritter, for the defendant.—Upon the facts as found by the learned judge there was no evidence of any negligence on the part of the defendant, and he was therefore not liable for the damage. He employed a competent plumber to set the matter right, and he could do no more than that, and the judge has expressly found that he was guilty of no negligence in employing the plumber whom he employed. That being so, the defendant is not liable: Carstairs v. Taylor, 19 W. R. 723, L. R. 6 Ex. 217. [WRIGHT, J., referred to Anderson v. Oppenheimer, 5 Q. B. D. 602, 29 W. R. Dig. 112, and Ross v. Fedden, L. R. 7 Q. B. 661, 20 W. R. C. L. Dig. 53.] The cases show that the defendant is not liable for the negligence of the independent contractor. [He was stopped.]

H. Tindal Atkinson, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant, as between himself and his tenants, was bound to keep the cistern in repair, and when he received notice of the defect he was bound, and it became his absolute duty, to set the matter right. The relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, and that gave the plaintiffs a right of quiet enjoyment for the infringement of which the defendant is liable. He is also liable on another ground—namely, that he has brought this water upon his premises, and if it escapes and does damage—as it has escaped and has done damage in this case—then on that ground the defendant is liable: Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 17. In this case the negligence of the plumber, whom the defendant had the selection of, and whom he employed, must be taken to be the negligence of the defendant himself, and renders the defendant liable: Miller v. Hancock, 41 W. R. 578, [1893] 2 Q. B. 177. The employment of an independent contractor makes no difference in the liability of the defendant, and he is liable for the negligence of such contractor: Hardaker v. Idle District Council, 44 W. R. 323, [1896] 1 Q. B. 335; Hughes v. Percival, 31 W. R. 725, 8 App. Cas. 443; Dalton v. Angus, 30 W. R. 191, 6 App. Cas. 740; Tarry v. Ashton, 24 W. R. 581, 1 Q. B. D. 314. In such cases it makes no difference whether the duty is a statutory one or one which is not imposed by statute, as in some of these cases the duty was not a statutory duty. [WRIGHT, J., referred to Gill v. Edouin, 71 L. T. Rep. 762, and 72 Ib. 579, 43 W. R. Dig. 124.]

WRIGHT, J.—(After stating the facts, his lordship proceeded:) Mr. Tindal Atkinson has not based his case upon any contractual liability arising from the relation of landlord and tenant between these parties; and in fact there was no evidence before us of the terms of the tenancy. The question then is, what is the position at common law? Apart from any contractual liability, I think the rule of common law is that as laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher, that a person who occupies any land has, primâ facie, a right not to have his premises invaded by any injurious matter which may be on his neighbour's land otherwise than in the ordinary course of nature. That general rule has some exceptions, one of which is, that where a person uses his land in an ordinary and reasonable way and damage results to an adjoining property, without wilfulness or negligence, no liability attaches for such damage. Here the bringing of this water upon these premises was, in my opinion, a reasonable and ordinary user of the premises, and if water escapes and does damage, without any negligence on the part of the owner of the cistern, then the owner is not liable to the occupier for the damage done. There is another exception to the general rule laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher, that where the party who has sustained the damage has consented to the dangerous matter being brought upon the premises. In such a case he cannot recover. When the plaintiffs took these premises from the defendant the cistern was there and the water already laid on, and the plaintiffs consented to take their water supply from this cistern. They must, therefore, be taken to have consented to the water being upon the premises in the way in which it was kept there by the defendant. Instances of this occur in such cases as Anderson v. Oppenheimer, Carstairs v. Taylor, Ross v. Fedden and Gill v. Edouin Is such circumstance the defendant would not be liable unless the damage was caused by his wilful default or neglect. Is there enough to show negligence here? In my opinion, there is not. The defendant did all any man could do to remedy the defect, as he employed a skilled plumber to put the cistern right, and it was through the negligence of this plumber, or his servants, that the damage was caused. It has been argued for the plaintiffs that where the performance of such a duty as this is concerned, a person cannot get rid of his liability by employing an independent contractor I know of no authority which establishes that doctrine. In Hughes v. Percival and Dalton v. Angus, and the other cases cited, there was an infringement of an absolute right, and that was the ground of the defendant's liability. There is no such absolute right in this case, which seems to me to fall within the exceptions specified in Rylands v. Fletcher. Under these circumstances the ordinary rule applies here, that a person is not liable for the acts of an independent contractor, as the duty is not a statutory one, in which case the person who performs it is liable whether he delegates the performance of the duty to an independent contractor or not. The test is, was there negligence on the part of the defendant? I think there was not, and on that ground I think the judgment of the learned judge cannot be sustained.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

In* 1876 a local authority took over the road and made it up and kept it in repair as a road suitable for light traffic, but no channelling or curbing was done. The owners thereupon objected on the ground that the street was not a "new street" within section 105 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and that the vestry having taken over and laid out the road in 1876 were estopped from exercising their power of paving it again under the provisions of the above Acts and throwing the cost upon the adjoining owners. The magistrate held the road had not become a "new street" in 1877, but that it became a "new street" for the first time after the erection of houses, and that the vestry had power to pave it under the provisions of section 105, and he ordered the adjoining owners to pay the cost of so doing.

Held, that the question whether the road had become a "new street" was a question for the magistrate to decide, and that he having found as a fact that it had become a "new street," the court could not review the decision.

The more expensive modern paving with wood may be ordered by the local authority.

Generally speaking, the correct guide as to whether a street is a "new street" within section 105 is that there should be houses erected on each side of it.

Special case.

This was a case stated by R. O. B. Lane, Esq., stipendiary magistrate, sitting at the West London police-court.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case stated as follows:—

(1) The vestry of the parish of Fulham is the successor of the Fulham District Board of Works, which board was dissolved by the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 33); section 3 of which Act incorporated the said vestry and invested it with all such powers and subjected it to all such provisions as if it had been named in Part II. of Schedule A of the Metropolis Management Act, 1885.

(2) The appellants William Gilbert Allen and Henry George Norris are jointly owners within the meaning of the said Acts of certain premises forming, bounding, and abutting on the said Wandsworth Bridge-road section 4, and the appellants Richard Bolton Silles and Alfred Heaver are respectively owners of other premises forming, bounding, or abutting on the said road.

(3) Wandsworth Bridge-road, of which Wandsworth Bridge-road section 4 is a part, forms a means of approach on the north side to Wandsworth Bridge, and extends from the northern abutment of the said bridge to the King's-road in the parish of Fulham. Such bridge together with the said road was made pursuant to the Wandsworth Bridge Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. ccxxxviii.), by the Wandsworth Bridge Co. incorporated by such Act for the purpose of constructing the said bridge and road.

(4) By section 62 of the Wandsworth Bridge Act, 1864, it was enacted that from and after the time at which the said road was completed it should be deemed a public highway and should be deemed one of the parish highways of the parish of Fulham and should accordingly be repairable by the Fulham District Board of Works in like manner as any other highway of that parish from time to time should be repairable by them.

(5) The Wandsworth Bridge-road was, pursuant to the Wandsworth Bridge-road Act, 1864, made by the said company in August, 1873, upon and through agricultural land which for many years preceding had been used as and for the purposes of market gardens, and after being so made it continued to be bounded on both sides throughout its entire length by market gardens until the erection of the houses hereinafter mentioned. In the aforesaid month the company applied to the Fulham District Board of Works to take over the maintenance and repair of the said road. The said road, however, having been made so inefficiently by the company as to be dangerous and in fact impracticable as a road, the said board by resolution of the 11th of August, 1873, declined to "accept the charge of the said road, until it was completely channelled, curbed, and paved and the carriage-way properly made up and drained." After protracted negotiations and litigation between the company and the said board, the company finally admitting their liability for the better completion and repair of the road but repudiating any liability for channelling or kerbing, the matter was in the year 1876 arranged between the parties upon the terms of the agreement in the next paragraph hereof stated. At this date the methods of road making and road repair were less elaborate than, especially as regards new streets, they have since become, and, in the parish of Fulham at least, there was little practical difference in the treatment in these respects applied to mere highways, as distinguished from streets formed by houses and streets in the latter sense, whether new or old.

(6) By an agreement dated the 14th of September 1876, the Fulham District Board of Works agreed with the said company, in consideration of the sum of £1,750 paid by the company to the board, to complete and put in repair the said Wandsworth Bridge-road and to make it in all respects fit for the purposes of a public highway within the meaning of the Wandsworth Bridge Act, 1864, and also to repair and (if necessary) complete the sewer under the same (which sewer had been previously constructed by the company). And by such agreement the said board agreed from the date thereof to undertake the liability of repairing the said road as imposed upon them by the Wandsworth Bridge Act, 1864, and to exonerate and save harmless the said company from all liability, claims, and demands in respect of the future repairs thereof.

(7) In 1877 the said board of works made up the carriage-way of the said road with flints rolled in over a foundation of hard core, the work being completed in July of that year. This was the method then adopted universally throughout the said parish in the case of highways not being house-built streets. In the case of house-built streets the same method of making up was often adopted where the traffic was light, but where the traffic was comparatively heavy they were made up with granite—i.e., macadamed. After an interval of some ten or twelve months the said carriage-way was repaired with granite, and this process has been repeated by the local authority from time to time down to the year 1897. Practically nothing in the way of making up was done to the footways of the road. No channelling or kerbing was done, that work not having been allowed for in the said £1,750 received from the company. In making up new streets under section 105 of the Act of 1855 the said board of works at the time in that paragraph referred to invariably insisted on channelling and kerbing. The traffic in the said road during the years 1877 and 1878 consisted wholly of comparatively slight through traffic, no houses having then existed there. It has of late years very considerably increased. Treating the work done to the road as aforesaid in the years 1877 and 1878 as practically one operation I find that, except for the omitted channelling and kerbing, the said carriage-way was made up and repaired in a permanent manner and in the same mode and to the same extent as new streets with a similar amount of traffic were dealt with at that period under the aforesaid 105th section.

(8) There were no buildings upon the land adjoining the Wandsworth Bridge-road until the year 1890. In that year houses were erected on the east side. None were erected on the west side until the year 1895. In that year and in 1896 houses were built on the west side. On the 24th of February, 1897, the vestry of the parish of Fulham passed with reference to the said Wandsworth Bridge-road section 4 the following resolution—viz.: "That whereas Wandsworth Bridge-road section 4, in the parish of Fulham, being a new street, is not paved to the satisfaction of this vestry, and it is deemed by them to be necessary and expedient that the same should be so paved. It is hereby resolved and ordered that the said street be taken to and paved under the provisions of the 18th and 19th Vict. c. 120, and the 25th and 26th Vict. c. 102, that the surveyor's plans and estimate be approved and adopted, that the estimated costs of the said paving works be apportioned upon the owners of the houses or land abutting or abounding upon the said street, at the proportions and in the amounts as set out in the apportionment hereby made, approved, and sealed with the official seal of the vestry, and the officers instructed to take the necessary steps for collecting the apportioned amounts within fourteen days.

(9) The estimate referred to in the said resolution makes provision for the paving of the carriage-way of the said road with wooden blocks laid upon a concrete foundation and it is the intention of the vestry so to pave the said carriage-way. The expense of so paving the said carriage-way will exceed the expense of paving it with macadam. On the other hand wood paving is more durable, is cleaner, and diminishes the annoyance of noise to the occupiers of the houses in the street.

(10) Demand having been made by the vestry of Fulham of the appellants for payment of the amounts apportioned upon them respectively, and default having been made in payment of the said amounts the summonses were issued. Upon the hearing of the said summonses it was admitted on both sides that (subject to a question of the competency of the vestry to pave with wood at the expense of the frontagers) the decision depended upon the date at which the said road became a new street, I find that it was not formed or laid out for building as a street.

(11) It was contended on behalf of the vestry that Wandsworth Bridge-road section 4 became for the first time a new street when buildings were erected upon the land adjoining it, and that upon such buildings being erected the vestry had, under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, power to require the adjoining owners to pave the said road, notwithstanding the facts as to the making up and repair thereof hereinbefore stated. It was also contended that wood-paving was "paving" within the meaning of the Local Management Acts, 1855 and 1862.

(12) On behalf of the appellants it was contended that Wandsworth Bridge-road was a "new street" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts when it was made by the Wandsworth Bridge Co., and that it having in 1877 and 1878, pursuant to the requirements of the vestry, been with the exception of the flagging of the footpaths and of the channelling and kerbing of the carriage-way as well and sufficiently paved as streets with similar traffic were then required to be paved prior to their being taken over by the vestry under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the vestry had no power thereafter to require the whole of the said road to be again paved at the expense of the adjoining owners by virtue of that section: That under the provisions of the special Acts hereinbefore set out the vestry became liable to repair and maintain the said road in the condition in which it was after it had been made up and paved in 1877, and could not get rid of such liability by requiring it to be paved in 1877, and could not get rid of such liability by requiring it to be paved under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. And that, assuming the vestry had power to require the said road to be paved under the last-mentioned section, it had no power thereunder to require the carriage-way of the said road to be made up at the expense of the adjoining owners with wooden blocks laid upon a concrete foundation in the manner in which it was intended by the vestry to make it up.

The learned magistrate was of opinion: (1) That the said road had not become and was not in 1877 or 1878 a new street within the meaning of section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862; (2) that it became a new street for the first time after the erection of houses therein and was a "new street" within the meaning of the said Acts on the 24th of February, 1897; (3) that the vestry was not prevented by anything contained in the special Acts or by anything it had done previously to the 24th of February, 1897, for requiring the said road to be paved under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855; (4) that wood paving was "paving" within the aforesaid Acts. He accordingly ordered the appellants respectively to pay to the said vestry the sum mentioned in the summons against them or him with costs.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the aforesaid findings and decision were right in law.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Glen with him), for the appellants.—This is not a "new street" within the meaning of section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. It was a new street when it was taken over from the bridge company and made up by the vestry. That body has therefore no power to now require the road to be made up at the expense of the frontagers: Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. Hunt, 56 L. J. M. C. 65, 35 W. R. Dig. 131. [Counsel was here stopped.]

Macaskie, for the respondents.—A distinction must be drawn as the rights and liabilities of a vestry under the Metropolis Management Act in the case of "highways" and "new streets." When the Wandsworth Bridge Act was passed it was provided that the road should be repairable by the vestry quâ a highway. Here then was a road which the respondents were bound to keep in repair. This road has now become a "new street" owing to the fact that houses have been built along it: see Pound v. Plumstead Board of Works, 20 W. R. 177, L. R. 7 Q. B. 183, where Blackburn, J., says that the Legislature use the word street in its ordinay, natural, and popular sense, and mean a place with continuous houses on each side of it, And further on he says, "Where a highway, which was not a street in the popular sense of the word, but merely a country lane, became a street by the building of houses continuously on each side of it, it then became a new street within the meaning of the statute, and the board had a right to pave it and charge the expense upon the owners of the adjoining houses." There must therefore be houses erected in order to constitute a new street. The requisite number of houses is a fact for the magistrate to decide. In Robinson v. The Local Board of Barton-Eccles, 32 W. R. 249, 8 App. Cas. 798, it was held that the expression "new street" was not confined to streets constructed for the first time. Also in the case of The Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. Crystal Palace Co., 40 W. R. 648, [1892] 2 Q. B. 33, it was held that an ancient county highway which became a new street in the ordinary and popular sense of the term by the erection of buildings fronting it is a "new street" within the terms of section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. In the case of Davis v. Board of Works for Greenwich District, [1895] 2 Q. B. 219, 43 W. R. Dig. 118, it was held that an old turnpike road which subsequently became a new street in the popular sense by the erection of buildings alongside it was within section 105, and the fact that temporary repairs had previously been done to it by the district board did not prevent them from exercising the powers given by the section. Counsel also referred to St. Mary, Battersea v. Palmer, 45 W. R. 110, [1897] 1 Q. B. 220.

Glen, in reply, contended that the cases cited were distinguishable from the present case. The vestry having made up this road as a street cannot afterwards call upon the frontagers to pay the expenses of making it up again. This is not a "new street" within section 105: Arter v. Vestry of Hammersmith, 45 W. R. 398, [1897] 1 Q. B. 646.

DAY, J.—This is one of those cases which I find always present very considerable difficulty, and the ordinary difficulties which one expects to meet with in cases of solving problems which are raised by the definitions given in Acts of Parliament are enhanced in this particular case by the peculiar history of the particular roadway in question, or street as it may be called.

The definition which we have to deal with in this Act of Parliament is the definition of "street," and again "new street," and I cannot derive assistance of any sort or kind from the definition clause. A definition clause is framed to be of some assistance in coming to a conclusion, or in coming to an interpretation, of the words which are defined. But the definition clause in this case gives me no assistance of any sort or kind whatever.

The history of this case is certainly peculiar. The road or street, whatever it may be called, leads from Wandsworth Bridge up to the neighbourhood of Fulham. It is a road which never can have been laid out as a road with the intention of its being used as a highway, because there is little or no through traffic on the road, but it presents all the appearance of an intended street laid out in what has been for many years a comparative wilderness, on which builders intend, when circumstances favour their operations, to erect houses. That has been the condition of this road for a very long period. It has undergone many vicissitudes. Originally the road was made as far back as 1864 by the bridge company. That company, however, seemed to have relieved themselves of their liabilities by not discharging them for a good many years, and at last, in the year 1876, the vestry took over the road and undertook to repair it and keep it in good condition. They appear to have done that, and to have kept it in good condition having regard to the knowledge which prevailed as to the keeping up of roads in what was considered at that time a thoroughly good condition. Whether they did all that is now done in streets can very well be doubted, because we have been told that the practice as to streets has been altered very much since that time, greater knowledge and more experience has been acquired and brought to bear on the repairing of streets, and streets are now much better repaired than they used to be. That is stated in the case, and I have no doubt it is perfectly true. They say they did it sufficiently for light traffic, and as in those days there was little or no traffic at all a very little amount of repair would have put the road in good repair for the traffic which presented itself. They did that, and somewhere about £1,750 was paid to them by the bridge company. They put the place into repair and they exonerated the company from all liability to keep the road in repair in the future. They took the road into their own hands such as it was. As I have said, it must have looked at that time very much like an intended street. Nothing else appeared to be wanting in it except the building of houses in the locality. That state of things remained until February, 1897, when the authorities determined to have the place put into a thoroughly good condition by the frontagers.

Accordingly the matter was brought before the magistrate, and he investigated the matter, and he has found that it became a street at some period between now and the time when the original bargain was made between the company and the vestry, and he has made an order upon those frontagers to contribute sums of money for the purpose of making it suitable according to modern ideas of a well-developed street. It has had wood paving laid down, and it will enjoy many other privileges in the future if they can get the money from the frontagers. It is a relief to me to find that in several of the cases that have been cited the responsibility for all this seems to rest more upon the magistrate than it does upon this court. The magistrate has found as a fact that it has become a street, but how or why I do not exactly know, except it be by suggesting that people have taken the buildings there. The building tendency has extended out to this place. Houses are springing up there, and the finding of the magistrate on the question of fact seems to me the best interpretation I can put, not only upon the statute, but also upon the previous decisions.

This is a question of fact for the magistrate, and on the question of fact I am not to review his decisions; therefore I must come to the same conclusion myself. The magistrate has found that it has become a street, and that it was not a street formerly; that is to say, it was not a street in 1876, when the repairs were done and the original bargain was made, but that it had become a street by February, 1897. I presume his finding must be a question of fact, and is not to be doubted. There is no question of law in this case upon which the magistrate can be said to have gone wrong. It is purely a question of fact for him. He has more knowledge of the locality than we can possibly have, and he has found that this is a new street, and has made this order. That being so, I do not see any reason why we should disturb his finding.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. The facts seem to be that a road or carriage-way was made up first in 1877, at which period there was no house which adjoined it on either side. It was, however, a high road or communication between a street at one end and the bridge at the other. Until 1895 no houses were built alongside it, but in that year, and in the subsequent year, 1896, houses appeared on both sides of the road. That having taken place, in 1897 the vestry of the parish of Fulham proceeded to treat it as a new street, and the magistrate has held that, it being a new street within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, they have a right to call upon the frontagers to contribute towards the expense of paving it.

Now, it appears to me that, according to the decisions which have been given upon the sections contained in the Metropolis Management Act, the magistrate's decision, so far as we are able to judge of it, is an accurate one, because in those decisions, beginning with the case of Pound v. The Plumstead Board of Works, and continuing through a series of decisions (one or two undoubtedly on the analogous Act—namely, the Public Health Act of 1875, but most of them on this very Act of Parliament), it has been held that a highway which has been repaired as a highway may become a street as soon as houses in a continuous line, to use one phrase, have been put on one side of it, or possibly on both; not, indeed, that it is necessary that the houses should be continuous from one end to the other, because that phrase has been dealt with in a way showing that the magistrate is to deal with the facts bearing on each particular case, and to say whether there are sufficient houses or buildings adjoining to the road in question to make it, in common parlance, a street, and that is the matter of fact with which he has to deal. It appears to me that the chief guidance that we can get from the decisions is this, that it requires, in order to be a new street, that there should be houses on each side of it; not, indeed, that it is an absolute and complete guide which you can follow without hesitation in every case, although it is, generally speaking, a correct guide. There is an exception, indeed, which Mr. Glen has hit upon, and which I believe is sufficiently clear to enable us to treat it as an exception standing by itself, in which case there may be a road which might be a new street, although there were no houses along it.

That appears to be suggested by the judgment of Cave, J., in the case of Arter v. The Vestry of Hammersmith, which has been quoted where undoubtedly he uses this phrase: "No doubt if a piece of land were newly laid out for the purpose of being used as a street, and were not repairable by the public at large, it would be a new street although there were no houses along it." I think in that case he must have been alluding to the frequent case of where an estate is being laid out for building purposes, roads are laid out throughout it, and where plots for houses to be built on are also adjoining the road. In such a case as that it may be that that would be, in proper and ordinary language, called a "new street," and that a magistrate would have been right in so dealing with it, although there were no houses adjoining it. But that, I think, must, if we read the other authorities, be treated as an exceptional case. I do not find that it was the case in this road because the period of time which elapsed between the laying out of this road, if you take it from 1864 onwards, is a long period of years before the houses began first to appear, and even if you take 1877 as the date of the formation of the road, then there were eighteen years passed, or more, before the houses began to appear.

I think, therefore, it is not a case which at all can be treated as analogous to that which was in the mind of that learned judge when he gave that judgment, and I am the more sure of that because when I read the rest of his judgment I see that he is treating this matter upon the same lines as we are doing to-day. He goes on to say: "Or again, if an old road has houses built along its side, with access to it, and thereby is converted into what is popularly understood by the term 'street,' it would be a 'new street' within the Act." All this was met by Mr. Glen very ingeniously by saying that because in 1877 the Fulham Board of Works made up the carriageway of the road in the same mode and to the same extent as new streets on which there was a fair amount of traffic were dealt with at that period, that therefore it became a new street. I think that that is a fallacy. That was mere repair of the road. You cannot by repairing a road in the way usual at the time make it into a street when it is not a street according to the definition which I have been endeavouring to give.

For these reasons I entirely agree with the learned magistrate, and I think the learned magistrate, whose discretion it is (within certain limit, of course) to find whether a particular road or street is to be treated as a "new street" or not, has properly exercised his discretion in this case.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.) April 29; May 23, 1898.

BARNES AND ANOTHER v. GLENTON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Statute of Limitations—Loan of money—Loan secured by transfer of mortgage—Payment of interest by co-trustees—Money "charged upon land"—Statute of Limitations applicable—Personal liability of borrower—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), s. 3—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 14.

The defendants, as trustees of a will, were indebted to one Maria Barber, in whom certain mortgages of land had become vested in trust for the testator, and for the purpose of paying off this debt the plaintiffs agreed to advance to the defendants a sum of money on the security of the mortgages, and the transaction was carried out as follows: By deeds executed in 1882 Maria Barber assigned the mortgages to the plaintiffs, and on the same day a deed was executed, to which Maria Barber, the defendants, and the plaintiffs were parties; and this deed, after reciting the transfers of the mortgages and that the plaintiffs had, at the request of the defendants, advanced to them the sum in question, provided that the moneys advanced by the plaintiffs should be a first charge upon the transferred mortgage securities, and that the plaintiffs might either allow the moneys secured by the several mortgages to remain as invested or might realize them. but they were not to proceed against the mortgaged premises without the consent of the defendants, such consent to be refused only in case the defendants themselves paid off the claim of the plaintiffs. This deed contained no express covenant by the defendants to repay the money. Immediately after the execution of this deed in 1882 the defendant L. retired from the trust. Interest was paid from time to time by the remaining trustees up to 1896. In 1897 the present action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover the balance due upon the loan for principal and interest.

Held, (1) that the defendants were personally liable to repay although there was no express covenant by them in the deed of 1882 to repay the advance; (2) that the money advanced was "secured by mortgage or otherwise charged upon or payable out of land" within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874; that that Act, and not the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, was the Statute of Limitations that applied to the case, and that therefore the defendant L., who had retired from the trust, was not entitled to the benefit of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, and that the payments of interest by the other defendants kept the debt alive against him.

Further consideration before Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.

The facts were thus stated in the written judgment of the learned judge:

The claim of the plaintiffs as endorsed on the writ is "for money lent due under a deed dated the 9th of September, 1882." The defendants were the trustees of the will of Lewis Glenton, who died in 1873, the defendant Maria Glenton, widow of the testator, being a beneficiary under that will. The material facts are these: One Fairless Barber had acted as solicitor for the testator and for the defendants as trustees, and certain mortgages for sums amounting to £3,095 15s. 5d. had been transferred to Barber as trustee for Lewis Glenton. Fairless Barber died in 1881, and such mortgages thereupon became vested in Maria Barber, his widow, who was devisee under and executrix of his will. At the time of Barber's decease the estate of Lewis Glenton was indebted to him in a considerable sum for services rendered by him as solicitor to Lewis Glenton and to the trustees and also for money advanced. The defendants as trustees of Lewis Glenton's estate, with the object of paying off the moneys so due to Fairless Barber's estate and for other purposes in connection with their trust, entered into negotiations with the plaintiffs for the advance of a sum of £1,650 upon the security of the mortgages before mentioned. The negotiations resulted in the plaintiffs agreeing to make the advance. The transaction was carried out

thus: By four deeds executed on the 9th of September, 1882, Maria Barber assigned the mortgages in question to the plaintiffs The only parties to these deeds were Maria Barber and the defendants. They contain no covenant for repayment by Maria Barber of the moneys advanced. Indeed, it was expressly agreed that she should come under no personal liability. On the same 9th of September, 1882, a deed or declaration of trust was afterwards executed, to which Maria Barber, the defendants (not described as trustees), and the plaintiffs were parties. It recited the four transfers already referred to; that as to the principal moneys they belonged in equity as to part to Maria Barber and as to the balance to the defendants; that the plaintiffs had, at the request of the defendants, advanced to them £1,650, part of which had been applied in payment of a portion of the moneys secured by the transferred mortgages, which belonged to Maria Barber, and the balance paid to the defendants, and that it had been agreed that the repayments of such moneys and interest should be secured in the manner thereafter mentioned. The deed then provided (1) that the moneys advanced by the plaintiffs should be a first charge upon the transferred mortgage securities; (2) that the plaintiffs might either allow the moneys secured by the several mortgages to remain as invested or might call in and realize them, and as to any money received for interest should, after retaining interest on their advance, pay any balance to the defendants or the survivors or survivor or other the trustees for the time being of Lewis Glenton's will, but no step was to be taken against the mortgaged properties or the persons entitled to redeem without the consent in writing of the defendants or other the trustees of Lewis Glenton, but such consent was only to be refused in case the trustees within three months after application made to them paid off the claim of the plaintiffs. It is only necessary further to say that, subject to the claim of the plaintiffs, the mortgage securities were dealt with as the property of the defendants or other the trustees of Lewis Glenton. The deed contained no express covenant by the defendants to repay the plaintiffs their advance. Immediately after the execution of this deed the defendant Lewis retired from the position of trustee. Interest was paid from time to time up to March, 1896. After crediting the sum of £352 0s. 9d. received on account of principal, the sum of £1,368 15s. 7d. for principal and interest remained unpaid at the date of the writ—namely, the 12th of April, 1897.

Section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), provides: "No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money or some interest thereon shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twelve years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments if more than one, was given."

Section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), provides: "In reference to the provisions of the Acts 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, and of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, and of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 113, s. 20, when there shall be two or more co-contractors or co-debtors, . . . no such co-contractor or co-debtor . . . shall lose the benefit of the said enactments or any of them so as to be chargeable in respect or by reason only of payment of any principal, interest, or other money by any other or others of such co-contractors or co-debtors . . ."

Dickens, Q.C., and H. Manisty, for the plaintiffs.—There are two points, and the first has reference to all the defendants, but the second has reference to the defendant Lewis alone. In the first place, the defendants have incurred a personal liability, although in the deed of 1882 there was no express covenant to repay. The money was advanced to the defendants at their request, and there is at common law an implied promise to repay whether the money is secured by mortgage or not: Yates v. Aston, 4 Q. B. 182. All the defendants are therefore liable personally. In the second place, it is said for the defendant Lewis that, as he retired from the trust in 1882, he is not liable upon the ground that the loan created a simple contract debt only, and therefore came within the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, and that, that being so, he came within the protection given by section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. But the loan or advance by the plaintiffs was not within the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, but was within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. The money advanced was money "secured by mortgage, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of land," within the meaning of section 8; and not being within the 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, the provisions of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act do not apply, and the defendant Lewis cannot have the benefit of those provisions. The period of limitation, therefore, is twelve years from the last payment of interest in 1896, and the payments of interest made by the remaining trustees are available to keep the debt alive against all the defendants, including the defendant Lewis: In re Frisby, 38 W. R. 65, 43 Ch. D. 106; Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511; In re Stephens, 43 Ch. D. 39, 38 W. R. Dig. 116.

D. J. Edwards (Alfred Roscoe with him), for the defendant Glenton.—It depends on the circumstances of each case whether there is a personal liability. Here the facts show that there was no such personal liability, as it is plain that the money was advanced by the plaintiffs solely on the security of the mortgaged premises, and that they looked for repayment to the mortgaged premises alone.

C. A. Russell, Q.C. (Rufus Isaacs with him), for the defendant Lewis.—Whatever may be the liability of the other defendants, the defendant Lewis is not liable. He retired from the trust in 1882, and the payments of interest made by the other defendants do not avail against him if section 14 of the Act of 1856 applies. We submit that it does apply. In the first place, the loan was not money "secured by any mortgage," or money "otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land" within section 8 of the Act of 1874. The only security for the advance was the fact that the plaintiffs, having become transferees of these mortgages, had the right when the money came into their hands under those mortgages to re-imburse themselves for the advance. Section 8 of the Act of 1874, therefore, does not apply, and the debt being really a simple contract debt came within the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, and therefore section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856, in express terms applies and protects the defendant Lewis. In the next place, even if section 8 does apply, section 3 of the statute of James also applies, and if there be two Statutes of Limitation applying to the same subject-matter, then the more stringent—in this case the statute of James—is to prevail. Therefore in either view section 14 of the Act of 1856 applies.

Manisty in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., read the following judgment: [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] In this state of facts two points were raised by the defendants. The first was that the plaintiffs had advanced the moneys solely on the security of the mortgages, and that there was no personal liability on any of the defendants to repay. The other point applied to the case of the defendant Lewis only. It was contended for him that the six years' limitation of actions applied and was a defence; that the liability here, if any, was for a simple contract debt within the meaning of the statute of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, and as Lewis had had nothing to do with the trust since 1882 he was within the protection of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 13), and that therefore the payments made by his co-contractors or co-debtors, the other defendants, did not keep the debt alive as against him. I have now to determine these questions. As to the first, I have arrived at the conclusion, after a careful consideration of the correspondence and deeds, that it was intended the defendants should undertake, and that the defendants did undertake, a personal liability. The correspondence before the advance was made was conducted by the firm of Barber & Oliver, solicitors, on the part of the defendants, and by the firm of J. & W. Maude, solicitors, on the part of the plaintiffs. That correspondence, beginning in May of 1882, treats the money as a loan, and speaks of the defendants as the borrowers. The correspondence after the advance was made has the same complexion, and indeed, when it turned out in 1897 that the mortgage security was inadequate and the present action was threatened, neither of the defendants Glenton nor Saunders suggested nonliability; and as regards the defendant Lewis, his only answer was that he had (as was the fact) ceased to act as a trustee since 1882. Further, there is the express stipulation that Maria Barber should be under no personal liability in respect of the advance, and an absence of the suggestion of any such stipulation on the part of the defendants. Lastly, the declaration of trust recites that the advances were made to the defendants by the plaintiffs at their request. In my judgment the conclusion properly to be drawn from the facts is that the transaction was a loan by the plaintiffs to the defendants accompanied by the security of the transferred mortgages, for which (unless there is any other defence) they are liable. It was insisted in argument that the defendants were trustees. At best this is only one of the facts to be considered in determining what is the proper inference to draw, and it is to be pointed out that the trustees received a portion or the money advanced and that all was applied for the purposes of the trust, and that Maria Glenton is one of the beneficiaries of that trust. As Maria Glenton and Saunders have no other defence there must be judgment against them. But a further contention was raised on behalf of the defendant Lewis, with which I must now deal. It was contended that the claim against him was within, and was barred by, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, argued that it was not within 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, but that it was an action to recover a sum of money secured by or charged upon, or payable out of, land within the meaning of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that the payments of interest to the plaintiffs by his former co-trustees from time to time kept the claim alive against him. It was admitted on his behalf that, if the plaintiffs' contention was correct, he could not claim the benefit of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (see In re Frisby, 43 Ch.D., p. 116). The question then is—Does the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, govern this case? [His lordship read section 8 of the Act.] In my opinion this section applies. By the deed now sued on the money advanced is made a first charge on all moneys recovered by virtue of the mortgages, and the plaintiffs have the power to foreclose, subject only to the defendants' consent, which they could withhold only in the event of their preferring to pay off the debt. Therefore, having regard to the terms of this deed, I think this money was secured by mortgage and was charged upon and was payable out of land within the meaning of section 8. It was argued in Frisby's case that the section applies only to actions against a mortgagor, and Bowen, L.J., appears to have held that view; but Cotton, L.J., said he could find nothing in the section pointing at such a limitation. In my view, however, it is not necessary in this case to express an opinion on the point, for I think the transaction between these parties amounted at least to an equitable mortgage, and the defendants are practically in the position of mortgagors. Section 8 of the Act of 1874, therefore, applies to this case, and, if so, the defendant Lewis is not entitled to the benefit of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. It follows that the payments made by the co-trustees of Lewis are sufficient according to the decision in In re Frisby to keep the claim alive against him. It was also contended on behalf of Lewis that if the two sections are read together, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, would govern all cases where there was a contract without specialty, and that section 8 of the Act of 1874 applied only where there was a specialty. It was argued that here there was no specialty contract, and therefore the case fell within 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, and therefore Lewis was entitled to the benefit of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. I do not agree with this contention. I think the effect of this section 8 is to take out of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, and for all purposes, all actions of debt secured by mortgage or otherwise charged upon or payable out of land. But, further, section 8 expressly included cases of security by lien which are not often effected by specialty contract. There must, therefore, also be judgment against the defendant Lewis, but as the question is important there will be in his case stay for an appeal if it is desired. It follows from what I have already said that there will also be judgment for the plaintiffs on the counter-claim.

Q. B. Div.
(Ridley and Channell, JJ.) May 19, 20.

THE MAYOR OF BURY ST. EDMUNDS v. WEST SUFFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Quarter sessions borough with population over 10,000—New county bridges—Liability for costs of—Special and general expenses of county—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 6, 35 (1) (2).

A quarter sessions borough with a population over 10,000 is not liable under the Local Government Act, 1888, to contribute rateably to the costs incurred by the county in erecting, maintaining, or repairing new county bridges—i e., county bridges taken over or newly erected since the passing of that Act.

This was a special case stated on a question raising the liability of a quarter sessions borough with a population of over 10,000 to contribute towards the costs of county bridges which had become county bridges since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888.

A writ of summons was issued in an action brought by the Corporation of Bury St. Edmunds against the defendants. The indorsement on the writ so far as here material was as follows: "The plaintiff's claim is for a declaration that the plaintiffs are not liable to contribute rateably to the costs of erecting, maintaining, or repairing new county bridges and for £137 13s., money received by the defendants for the plaintiffs' use."

On that indorsement a special case was stated, from which it appeared that Bury St. Edmunds is a quarter sessions borough, with a separate commission of the peace, and contained, according to the census of 1881, a population of over 10,000. At the time of the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, and at the present time there were and are certain bridges in the borough which the plaintiffs were and are legally bound to maintain; and bridges in the county of West Suffolk which the defendants were and are legally bound to maintain and to which the plaintiffs are not liable to be and had not been assessed. Since 1888 certain other bridges in the county have become county bridges under section 6 of the Local Government Act, 1888. There are practically no main roads in this county and what few there are do not cross any of these bridges.

The defendants since 1892 paid £1,570 4s. 4d. in respect of these bridges, which they charged to their county accounts as general expenses, and the plaintiffs have been assessed to their county rate, and have contributed thereto the sum of £137 13s., their rateable proportion of the whole sum.

The plaintiffs' contention was that the payments should have been charged to special and not to general expenses, so that they might be exempted from contributing.

The following sections of the Local Government Act, 1888, were referred to during the argument:

"Section 6.—The county council shall have power to purchase or take over on terms to be agreed on existing bridges not being at present county bridges, and to erect new bridges, and to maintain, repair, and improve any bridges so purchased, taken over, or erected."

"Section 35.—In the case of a quarter-sessions borough . . . containing . . . a population of 10,000 or upwards the following provisions shall . . . apply. (2) Where such borough is at the passing of this Act exempt in whole or in part from contributing towards costs incurred for any purpose for which the quarter sessions of the county in which the borough is situate are authorized to incur costs the parishes in the borough shall not, save as in this Act expressly mentioned, be assessed by the county council to county contributions in respect of costs incurred for any such purpose."

W. Graham, for the plaintiffs.—The action was brought to recover money paid in respect of those bridges recently made county bridges. The plaintiffs are only liable to repair bridges within the borough; there is nothing in the Local Government Act, 1888, which makes any distinction between county bridges then existing and those which have become county bridges since the passing of that Act. The difference between special and general expenses is defined in section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1885, and the plaintiffs' contention is that this is a special expense because it cannot properly be levied over all the county.

W. Wills, for the defendants. — Intermediate quarter session boroughs with a population of over 10,000 are liable to be rated to contribute to the maintenance and repair of any bridges that have become county bridges after the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888. Erecting or taking over these new county bridges was not a purpose for which the quarter sessions could, prior to that date, have incurred costs.

RIDLEY, J.—I think that this matter is fairly clear. The question arises upon the 35th section of the Local Government Act, 1888, although other sections of that Act also have to be referred to in order to arrive at a proper construction of section 35. The former state of things, as has been pointed out by my brother Channell as to boroughs such as this borough of Bury St. Edmunds, was that they were called upon in certain cases to contribute to the rates—that was a state of things which had to be dealt with when the Local Government Act was passed creating the county council, and it appears to have been the policy of the Legislature to say that for certain purposes the borough shall maintain and keep its own bridges and roads and so forth out of its own rates, but for other purposes it shall not be liable where it has not hitherto contributed—that is to say, it shall continue to pay its own expenses as to what was required within the borough, but as to the county expenses of a certain character it was not to pay any contribution at all. The two are separated for the future. It is different, of course, with the larger boroughs, and with the smaller ones on the other hand, but we are dealing now with the quarter sessions boroughs, or what may be called the No. 2 class. Now, what did the Local Government Act, 1888, enact with regard to these boroughs? It says in sub-section (1) of section 35 that the powers, duties, and liabilities of the council of such boroughs shall continue as under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, "but, subject to such provisions and to the savings hereinafter contained, the borough shall form part of the county for the purposes of this Act." Then it continues (sub-section (2)): "Where such borough is at the passing of this Act exempt in whole or in part from contributing towards cost incurred for any purpose for which the quarter sessions of the county in which the borough is situate are authorized to incur costs the parishes in the borough shall not, save as in this Act expressly mentioned, be assessed by the county council to county contributions in respect of cost incurred for any such purpose."

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, the maintaining of county bridges has always been recognized as falling within the county rate, and it is a purpose for which the quarter sessions of the county in which this borough is situated and in which other boroughs are situated were authorized to incur costs. That purpose, therefore, is one from contribution to which the borough is primâ facie exempted.

So far the matter is perfectly clear. But the defendants contend that although for all existing county bridges existing at the time of the passing of this Act the borough is exempt from contribution, yet that exemption does not apply in the case of bridges taken over or newly erected since the passing of that Act, because the cost of those bridges was not a "purpose" in respect of which the quarter sessions were authorized to incur costs.

It was argued that the quarter sessions, although they could incur costs up to that time in respect of the maintenance of bridges, were not authorized as is at this present moment the county council under section 6 of the Local Government Act, 1888, to erect bridges. It is not, I think, correctly stated in that form, because it does appear that under the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, s. 22, the county authority might make contribution to the extent of one-half of the cost of the erection of a new bridge; but it is true that the quarter sessions' power to incur liability in the putting up of a new bridge did only extend to one-half the cost of such bridge, whereas reading section 6 it appears to me to give the county council power, if they think proper to do so, to erect a new bridge entirely at its own cost. It may be arguable that it is not so, but, assuming it to be so in favour of the defendants, there remains the question, Is that a distinction sufficient to enable us to say that the intention was to limit the exemption of the borough specifically to cases in which the former authority, the quarter sessions, had authority, and to leave outside the new powers conferred upon the county council? I think upon the proper construction of the Act it cannot have been intended to have that meaning.

The word "purpose" in sub-section (2) of section 35 was, I think, intended to include not only the maintenance of existing bridges, but also all the powers as to bridges given to the county council by section 6.

CHANNELL, J.—The whole matter turns upon the interpretation which we must put upon the word "purpose" in this second sub-section of section 35. Now I think it is a very general word, and that one must so interpret it. It says, Where a borough is exempt from contributing towards costs incurred for any purpose for which the quarter sessions are authorized to incur costs. Now the quarter sessions were authorized to incur costs in reference to the maintenance of bridges, and they were authorized also to incur costs in reference to the erection of bridges, not to pay the entire cost, but to contribute towards cost of erection of bridges; and the item "general county bridges" was a substantial heading of county expenditure, and was always so treated. It was an item of expenditure in respect of which there was no power to call upon the quarter session boroughs for contribution, although, of course, as to a very large number of matters there was power so to call upon the boroughs for contribution. That being the state of things, the policy of this Act undoubtedly is to leave this class of borough in substantially the same pecuniary position as it was before. Where you find that these boroughs have to pay separately for their own bridges primâ facie you would not expect that they should pay any share for the bridges in the county outside the borough. This is not of universal application, but in reference to these boroughs I know of no case in which they are charged double. The smaller boroughs are charged double for a considerable number of things. That being the general view, and I quite appreciate Mr. Will's argument, the only difficulty created is in reference to section 6, which appears to confer a new power upon the county council. It is quite clear that if a new power is conferred upon the county council of incurring costs in reference to some matter for which the quarter sessions originally had no power to incur costs, that the boroughs are liable to be rated in reference to costs incurred as to such new matters. So that the question really turns partly on this word "purpose" and partly on section 6. It seems to me section 6 is merely an enlarged power of incurring costs for the same purpose for which the quarter sessions had previously a more limited power, and that being so, it does not affect this question, it still remains a purpose for which the quarter sessions were authorized to incur costs, and the boroughs therefore are exempt in reference to it. On those grounds I think we ought to give the declaration as asked.

Judgment accordingly, no order for costs.

WHEELER v. HUMPHREYS. (a.)

Will—Hotchpot clause—Covenant by testator—Settlement—Debt—Satisfaction.

The testator had covenanted with the trustees of the son's marriage settlement that his executors would pay to them £10,000, to be invested and held upon trust for the son for life, with remainder to the son's wife for life, with remainder as to the capital for the children of the marriage, and in case of there being no child (as in the event happened) the capital was to be held in trust for the testator absolutely. By his will the testator directed his executors and trustees to convert his whole estate into money, and to stand possessed of the clear residue in trust for his two children in equal shares. And the testator by his will declared that any sum given "to or with any child" on his or her marriage was to be taken in or towards satisfaction of the share of such child, and brought into hotchpot. The son died, leaving a widow and no issue.

Held, that the testator's trustees must specifically appropriate and allot to the son's share under the will the testator's contingent reversionary interest in the £10,000, so as to effect an equal division between the son and the daughter.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 45 W. R. 376, [1897] 1 Ch. 325, affirmed, but on different grounds.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.), reported under the name of In re Cosier, Humphreys

v. Gadsden, 45 W. R. 376, [1897] 1 Ch. 325, reversing that of Chitty, J.

The facts are given in Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the appellants.—The order appealed from gives no operation to the hotchpot clause, the object of which is to cut down a previous gift. The words "shall be taken in satisfaction" mean that the sum is to be taken into account for the purpose of calculation and division.

Levett, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the respondents.—The object of the hotchpot clause was to ensure equality: Chichester v. Coventry, 15 W. R. 849, L. R. 2 H. L. 71, 95.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

July 4.—The LORD CHANCELLOR (Earl of HALSBURY) expressed his concurrence with Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I listened respectfully to the learned counsel for the appellants. I have since had the opportunity of reconsidering arguments which at the time I was unable to follow. But I must confess that the only result is that I am still unable to understand what the difficulty is—the case appears to me to be so very simple, though it is perhaps a little obscured by the line of argument adopted in the Court of Appeal.

The testator, at the time when he made his will, was a widower with only two children—a son and a daughter—both of whom were then married. By his will he directs his executors and trustees to convert his whole estate into money, and to stand possessed of the clear residue in trust for his two children in equal shares. After settling the daughter's share and giving his trustees various powers, including a power specifically to appropriate and allot any part of his estate in or towards satisfaction of the respective shares thereinbefore given or settled, he declares his will as follows: "Provided also, and I declare that any and all sums of money, annuities, or annual sums and property which I have already covenanted or agreed to give, or which I may hereafter covenant or agree to give to or with any child of mine on his or her marriage, shall, in default of any direction to the contrary in writing under my hand, be taken in or towards satisfaction of the respective share of such child . . . and shall be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly."

In the case of the daughter there was nothing to be brought into hotchpot. In the case of the son, the testator had covenanted with the trustees of the son's marriage settlement that his executors would pay to them the sum of £10,000, to be invested and held upon trust for the son for life, with remainder for the son's wife for life, with remainder as to the capital for the children of the marriage. In case there should be no child (as in the event happened) the capital was to be held in trust for the settlor absolutely.

The clear residue of the testator's estate, without providing for this sum of £10,000, amounted, roughly speaking, to £52,000. Taking it at that sum, how ought the amount to have been dealt with?

The first question seems to be, What was the effect of the father's covenant? What did it give to the son? It gave him a life interest in the investments representing the £10,000. Then it gave a life interest to the son's wife, and, further, it gave the capital to the issue of the marriage in the event of there being any issue to take. For the purposes of the will it seems to me that it would be only reasonable to hold that, whatever was coming to the son's wife and the children of the marriage under the covenant, was a marriage gift to the son. What was given was, in substance, given to the son to be enjoyed by him by means of a settlement on himself, his wife, and children. But there the gift to the son ends. The interest which the father retained or reserved was not given to the son in any sense. It would, therefore, have been wrong to require the son to bring the whole £10,000 into hotchpot in every event. And the testator has not done so. The learned counsel for the appellants did not contend that the £10,000 was to be brought into hotchpot as a gift "to the son." They argued that the whole fund was to be brought into hotchpot as a gift "with the son." That, if I may venture to say so, is the mistake which the learned judge of first instance makes. "The truth is," he observes, "that the testator has not referred in this hotchpot clause to the trusts of the £10,000, but what he has directed to be brought into account is the £10,000 which he gave with his son." Now, I cannot agree with that observation. The reference in the will is, I think, a reference to the trusts of the £10,000, so far as they enured for the benefit of the son, and to nothing else. Surely the testator must have been referring to the beneficial interest in the gift, not to the legal ownership of the fund which was designed to protect that interest. A gift is a gift, whether it be given directly or given through the medium of a trust. What the donor keeps back is no gift. Then I do not understand the expression, "given with any child of mine," as applied to a provision on behalf of a son. It obviously applies to a provision on behalf of a daughter. You give your daughter in marriage, and you give a portion with your daughter. That is a common expression, and correct enough, because the portion is given to, or for the benefit of, the person to whom the daughter is given. In the marriage service the question is asked, "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" A corresponding question applied to the other contracting party, even nowadays, I presume, would be thought inappropriate. It appears to me that it would be equally inappropriate to refer to money settled on behalf of the intended husband as given "with" him. The contention on the part of the appellants involves a contradiction. It requires an object of the testator's bounty to give credit for something which never was his, and then it treats that very thing as belonging absolutely and for all purposes to the testator himself. This contention seems to have had its origin in a misapplication of the testator's words. Not that that misapplication can really make any difference. The contingent interest reserved by the settlor is no more given "with" the son (if anybody prefers that way of looking at it) than given "to" the son. It was not given at all. The settlor kept it.

The courts below agree in thinking that the sum of £10,000 which the testator covenanted to pay to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement must be brought into account under the hotchpot clause en bloc and without reserve. There, however, they part company. In the first court it was held that the hotchpot clause could have no further operation. The contingent interest under the ultimate trust in the settlement remained the father's property; as such it would have to be divided equally between the son and the daughter when it fell into possession; the result was unexpected, but inevitable. The Court of Appeal are more fortunate in finding a way of escape. By inverting the hotchpot clause they arrive at a correct result. The whole fund, they say, must be brought into hotchpot by the son. It has therefore to be taken towards satisfaction of his share; the direction that it is to be so taken implies a gift, and therefore whatever interest the father retained in the fund is given to the son by the hotchpot clause, as Rigby, L.J., thinks, or, as the other members of the court hold, by the conjoint operation of that clause and the gift in the earlier part of the will.

Now, I must say I cannot follow this reasoning. It seems to me plain that the testator's reversionary interest in the fund cannot come under the operation of the hotchpot clause. That clause has nothing to do with it. Nothing was to be brought into hotchpot but what the testator had covenanted or agreed to give. The hotchpot clause is in the common form. The language used must have its ordinary effect. The simplest way of looking at the matter is to put oneself in the position of the executors when they came to divide the estate. They had £52,000 in hand, and no liability to meet but the claims of the settlement trustees. The first thing to be done was to pay the trustees. The trustees got their £10,000. Against that a like sum was set apart for the daughter's share. I pause there, for the division of the rest of the estate cannot give rise to any difficulty. The surplus, whatever it is, may be disregarded for the purpose of considering the present question. I ask what is the result of what the executors have done so far? Equality, if the testator's interest under the ultimate trust has been appropriated to the son; inequality if that interest is the father's property. If that mistake is to be regarded as still made, the daughter has certainly received too much. As no one suggests, or ever has suggested, that the beneficial interests under the prior trusts are not to be brought into hotchpot, it is obvious that the daughter has received too much by the exact amount or value of the testator's reversionary interest. How is the mistake to be set right? Simply by doing now what ought to have been done before anything was set apart for the daughter. You must specifically appropriate and allot to the son's share the testator's contingent reversionary interest under the ultimate trust. But that is to be done not under the hotchpot clause, but under the plain directions in the earlier part of the will. It is the only way to effect an equal division between the son and the daughter. When ever the interest of a legatee, together with the interest, if any, of the testator, in a particular fund or a particular property exhausts the whole beneficial interest therein, and the legatee has to bring his interest into hotchpot, the appropriation of the fund or property in or towards satisfaction of the legatee's share or legacy under the will necessarily involves bringing the legatee's interest into hotchpot, and at the same time deals with the testator's interest, if any, in conformity with his directions in regard to his own property.

The son is now dead without issue, and the whole of the £10,000 belongs to the son's estate absolutely, subject only to the life estate of his widow. The result of the view put forward on behalf of the appellants is certainly startling. Whereas the testator directed that his residuary estate should be divided in equal shares between his two children, the son gets £10,000 less than the daughter. The result might have been more startling still. The residuary estate, without providing for the £10,000, might have been only £20,000. That is an event which the testator seems to have contemplated as at least possible, because he directs that what he had covenanted to give to his son should be taken either towards satisfaction or in satisfaction of his son's share under the will. The son's wife might have died without issue in her husband's lifetime, and then, according to the view of the appellants' counsel, the testator's endeavour to produce equality would result in this—the son living and in a position to marry again would get £5,000, and the daughter would carry off £15,000. Suppose, further, that the bequest to the son had been a definite sum of £10,000 instead of being a share of residue, and suppose the ultimate residue had been given to someone else—an eldest son, for instance—the son, in whose favour the covenant was made, and who was in a position to marry again, would have taken nothing but a life estate.

I agree with Lindley, M.R., that such a result does suggest that there must be some error somewhere. But I desire to rest my judgment on the plain language of the will, without putting any strained construction on any words in the hotchpot clause or giving it a peculiar or unusual effect.

I think that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — June 17, 23, 1898.

MACKINNON v. CLARK. (a.)

Election law—Parliament—Illegal practice—Penalties—Return of election expenses—"Transmit," meaning of—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 33, sub-sections 1, 5.

By section 33, sub-section 1, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, it is enacted that, within thirty-five days after the day on which a candidate returned at a parliamentary election is declared elected, the election agent "shall transmit to the returning officer a true return" respecting the election expenses. By sub-section 5 a candidate who has failed to comply with the requirements of section 33 is liable to a penalty for each day on which he sits or votes in the House of Commons.

The defendant was a candidate at a parliamentary election, and was declared elected on the 23*rd of July. The thirty-five days expired on the* 27*th of August, on which day, at* 10 p.m., the defendant, who was his own election agent, posted to the returning officer a return of his expenses. The return reached the returning officer in the ordinary course of post on the 29*th of August. The return was incorrect in that it omitted one item of expenditure, as to which the defendant had not received an authorized excuse under section* 34. The defendant sat and voted in the House of Commons on the 28*th of August and on subsequent days.*

Held, that the defendant, by posting the return on the 27*th of August, had complied with the requirements of section* 33, sub-section 1, as to transmission within thirty-five days, and that, although the return was incorrect, it was none the less a return within the meaning of section 33.

Appeal of the defendant and cross-appeal of the plaintiff from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought to recover £4,900, being forty-nine penalties of £100, on the ground of the defendant's having sat and voted in the House of Commons on forty-nine occasions as member for the county of Caithness without having duly transmitted to the returning officer a true return respecting his election expenses.

At the general election of 1895 the defendant was a candidate for Parliament for the county of Caithness. The poll was declared on the 23rd of July, when the defendant was declared to be duly elected. The defendant had acted as his own election agent and it thereupon became his duty under section 33, sub-section 1, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, to transmit a return of his election expenses to the returning officer within thirty-five days from the day on which he was declared elected. The thirty-five days expired on the 27th of August, on which day the defendant posted a return of his election expenses in the letter-box of the House of Commons at 10.45 p.m. This return left London the following morning, and in the ordinary course of post was delivered to the returning officer on the 29th of August. The return was incomplete by the omission of certain matters as to which the Court of Session in Scotland had allowed an authorized excuse under section 34 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, the omissions being due to inadvertence. The return also omitted an item of £2 9s., for which no authorized excuse had been applied for or granted. The defendant voted in the House of Commons on the 28th of August, and on forty-eight days in 1896.

Kennedy, J., held that the return had not been transmitted until it reached the returning officer, and that therefore it had not been transmitted within thirty-five days, but that the transmission of an incorrect return was not a failure to transmit a return, and the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for one penalty of £100 in respect of the voting by the defendant on the 28th of August.

The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883:

"33. (1) Within thirty-five days after the day on which the candidates returned at an election are declared elected, the election agent of every candidate at that election shall transmit to the returning officer a true return (in this Act referred to as a return respecting election expenses) in the form set forth in the second schedule to this Act, or to the like effect, containing," &c.

"(5) If in the case of an election for any county or borough the said return and declarations are not transmitted before the expiration of the time limited for the purpose the candidate shall not, after the expiration of such time, sit or vote in the House of Commons as member for that county or borough until either such return and declarations have been transmitted, or until the date of the allowance of such an authorized excuse for the failure to transmit the same, as in this Act mentioned, and if he sits or votes in contravention of this enactment he shall forfeit one hundred pounds for every day on which he so sits or votes to any person who sues for the same.

"(6) If without such authorized excuse as in this Act mentioned a candidate or an election agent fails to comply with the requirements of this section he shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

The defendant in person contended that the requirements of section 33, sub-section 1, as to transmitting the return were complied with if the return was despatched by post within the thirty-five days.

He cited Pennell v. The Churchwardens of Uxbridge, 10 W. R. 319, 31 L. J. M. C. 92, and Banks v. Goodwin, 11 W. R. 309, 32 L. J. M. C. 87.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Courthope Munroe, for the plaintiff.—The learned judge has rightly held that a return is not transmitted until it comes to the hand of the returning officer. The word "transmit" has always been construed as being equivalent to lodge: see Aspinall v. Sutton, [1894] 2 Q. B. 349. That case turned on the construction of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 42, s. 2, which provides that upon an appeal by way of case stated against a decision of justices, the appellant must, within three days after receiving the case, "transmit" it to the court, and it was there held that the case must be lodged in court within the three days. There is no reason why the word "transmit" in this Act should be construed differently. This construction does not involve any hardship, for if the return were sent off so that in ordinary course it would arrive within the prescribed time, but it happened to be delayed by some accident, the party would be entitled to relief under section 34. (They also cited in this point Hurdle v. Waring, 22 W. R. 735, L. R. 9 C. P. 435.) Secondly, the defendant failed to comply with the Act because the return sent, being incomplete, was not a "true return" within section 33, sub-section 1, and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to the full amount of the penalties claimed.

June 23.—The judgment of the Court (A. L. SMITH, RIGBY, and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ.) was read by

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by the plaintiff, as a common informer, to recover from the sitting member for the county of Caithness penalties amounting to the sum of £4,900, for having sat and voted in the House of Commons as member for that county forty-nine times without, as it is alleged, having made a return of his election expenses, pursuant to section 33 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883. My brother Kennedy has held that the defendant is liable for one penalty of £100—that is, for voting upon the 28th of August, 1895, and the defendant appeals against this judgment of the learned judge. The plaintiff appeals against the learned judge for having held that the plaintiff was not entitled to forty-eight other penalties of £100 each, amounting to the sum of £4,800, for having voted after the return reached the returning officer upon the 29th of August, 1894. The facts are extremely short. Upon the 23rd of July, 1895, the defendant, Dr. Clark, was declared elected to represent the county of Caithness in the House of Commons. At midnight of the 27th of August, 1895, the thirty-five days within which Dr. Clark, who was his own election agent, had to make (I use here advisedly a neutral word) his return of election expenses to the returning officer expired. Before midnight of that day—viz., at 10.45 p.m. upon the 27th of August, 1895, Dr. Clark in London posted his return to the returning officer, who was resident at Wick, in Caithness. Upon the next day (the 28th of August, 1895) Dr. Clark sat and voted in the House of Commons, and also upon forty-eight occasions subsequent to the receipt of the return by the returning officer, which reached him upon the 29th of August, 1895. The question is, in these circumstances, has Dr. Clark become liable to any, and what, penalties under the Act of 1883? This depends, first of all, upon what in section 33 of the Act is the meaning of the words "transmit to the returning officer." Sub-section 1 of that section runs thus: "Within thirty-five days after the day on which the candidates returned at an election are declared elected, the election agent of every candidate at that election shall transmit to the returning officer a true return (in this Act referred to as a return respecting election expenses)"; and by sub-section 5 the candidate is liable to a penalty of £100 for each day he votes without having done so. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the words "transmit to the returning officer" mean not only that the return shall be sent off to the returning officer within the thirty-five days, but that it shall actually be delivered to or lodged with him within that period. It will be observed that the section says nothing about delivery to or lodgment of the return with the returning officer within the thirty-five days. This is remarkable, for if lodgment with the returning officer is what the Legislature was aiming at, why has it not said so in distinct terms? All the section enacts is, that the agent shall within the prescribed period transmit the return to the returning officer. This is what the agent has to do from where he happens to be, and I can find no obligation cast by this section upon the agent to go, as in the present case, from London to the other end of the United Kingdom to ascertain whether the returning officer has received the return; nor in the Act is there to be found any obligation upon the returning officer to forward to the agent an acknowledgment of the receipt of the return. The word "transmit" in this section in my judgment means the same thing as the word "send" or "remit," and, for reasons I will presently give, it does not mean "lodge," as the plaintiff contends. The plaintiff's construction of the word "transmit" brings about the extraordinary result that, if the return is sent off, say, a week before the expiration of the thirty-five days, and in ample time to reach its destination within the thirty-five days, yet the candidate is guilty of an illegal practice (see section 33, sub-section 6) if the return happens to perish upon its way and does not reach the returning officer within the prescribed time and the member votes, unless he can obtain an "authorized excuse." It is said by the plaintiff that section 33, sub-section 6, makes the non-lodgment of the return within the thirty-five days an illegal practice only if the candidate does not get an "authorized excuse" as provided by that section, and if the return perished upon the way through no fault of the candidate he could always obtain such an excuse. Is this correct? We must look to section 34 of the Act to see in what cases the court can make an order allowing an "authorized excuse." Now, it appears to me strange that the statute should make the failure to transmit the return within the thirty-five days within the meaning of the section an illegal practice dependent upon whether an "authorized excuse" for not doing so can be obtained or not. But in respect of what can an "authorized excuse" be obtained? Section 34 is explicit upon the point. It enacts by sub-section 1 (a) that "if the candidate . . . shews that the failure to transmit such return . . . has arisen by reason of his illness . . . or misconduct of his election agent or sub-agent, or of any clerk or officer of such agent, or by reason of inadvertence, or of any reasonable cause of a like nature, and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the applicant," the court may grant an "authorized excuse." Take the case of the return being destroyed whilst in transit to the returning officer, say, in an accident like the Abergele railway accident or the Tay Bridge accident, under what head of "authorized excuse" in this section does this come? It seems to me under none, and if this be so it is cogent, if not conclusive, to show that the plaintiff's reading of the word "transmit" is erroneous, for if it means lodgment of the return with the returning officer within the thirty-five days, and not the sending off of the return within that time, there would surely have been an "authorized excuse" obtainable under section 34 for what might happen to the return during its transit to the returning officer, so that if it arrived with that officer outside the thirty-five days by reason of circumstances beyond the control of the candidate, he might be able to obtain the "authorized excuse" provided for by the section; for it must be admitted that under section 33, sub-section 6, without obtaining an "authorized excuse," the candidate in such circumstances would be guilty of an illegal practice, and liable to the consequences thereof. It is said that the words in section 34, sub-section 1 (a), "by reason of inadvertence," cover the case of the return perishing during transit; but this, in my judgment, is not the meaning of those words, for they mean the overlooking or forgetting of something, and not accidents which may happen to the return itself after it is sent off, and whilst on its way to the returning officer. It also appears to me that such a loss of the return is not covered by the words "any reasonable cause of a like nature" in the section, for the perishing of the return is not of a like nature to the other matters mentioned in the section. In my judgment the "authorized excuses" in section 34 do not cover the case of a return perishing during transit. By section 23 of the Act power is given to the court, irrespective of granting an "authorized excuse," to except innocent acts from being illegal practices, and under this the candidates may obtain relief; but this in no way affects the question, What are the acts for which "authorized excuses" are to be given under section 34, sub-section 1 (a), so as to cause the non-sending of the return within the prescribed period not to be an illegal practice within section 33, sub-section 6? I do not myself think that the cases cited—viz., Pennell v. The Churchwardens of Uxbridge and Banks v. Goodwin and others—throw any real light upon what is the meaning of the word "transmit" in section 33 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, and if I were to refer to cases I would cite the case of Comber v. Leyland, recently decided, but not yet reported, by the House of Lords upon the word "remit," in the contract in that case. The word "transmit" may well have a different meaning in different statutes and in different contracts. For the reasons above, I cannot agree with my brother Kennedy in thinking that the word "transmit" in this section means "lodge," and, in my opinion, Dr. Clark did not violate section 33, sub-section 1, when he voted upon the 28th of August, 1895, having sent off his return to the returning officer at 10.45 p.m. upon the day before—viz., the 27th of August, 1895.

Another point was taken by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, which has only to be stated to show that it is utterly untenable. It is this—that a return with an error in it is no return at all; that although an agent of the candidate has sent off to the returning officer the return of the candidate's election expenses within the thirty-five days, and such return has reached the returning officer within that period, yet if it be subsequently discovered that an expense, say, of 2s., which should have been returned, has by error been omitted, nevertheless, if the sitting member in utter ignorance of this omission, has voted, say, ten, twenty, or even a hundred times in the House of Commons, he is liable to a penalty of £100 upon each day upon which he votes. This notion is to me preposterous. I entirely agree with what my brother Kennedy has held as to this. It is said that section 33, sub-section 1, enacts that the return to be made within the thirty-five days is to be a true return, and that a return with a blunder in it is therefore no return at all within the Act. But section 34, sub-section 1, shows clearly that this is not so, for by it the court may grant an authorized excuse for the failure to "transmit such return," and also for "any error . . . in such return," which shows to demonstration that a return with errors in it is still a return within the Act. For the errors which did exist in the return sent in by Dr. Clark he has obtained "authorized excuses" in the court in Scotland, excepting as to a sum of £2 9s., which was overlooked when "authorized excuses" were applied for and obtained. We have nothing to do with any proceedings which may be taken as regards the £2 9s. item, for it in no way affects the claim of the plaintiff for penalties against Dr. Clark having voted either before or after the return with the omission in it reached the returning officer. For the reasons above I think that Dr. Clark has not brought himself within the meshes of the Act so far as to be liable to penalties for having voted without having made a return within the Act, and that the appeal of Dr. Clark, the defendant, succeeds, and should be allowed with costs here and below, and that the appeal of the plaintiff fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from Darling, J. (at chambers).

The plaintiffs brought their action in 1897 and obtained judgment for £400, of which £45 4s. 9d. remained due on the 2nd of March, 1898. A second action was subsequently brought for £91 11s. 3d. No appearance had been entered in either action.

On the 2nd of March judgment was signed in the first action for £50 4s. 9d., and in the second action for £96 11s. 3d., £5 in each case being added on to the debt for costs. The plaintiffs applied by way of judgment summonses in both actions to the county court for an order for payment by instalments of both judgment debts.

The summonses came on for hearing on the 3rd of May. The evidence as to what happened on that occasion was conflicting, and the Court of Appeal considered that orders were made on each summons for payment by instalments of 30s. a month.

On the hearing it transpired that the defendant owned some furniture, and on the 3rd of May, the same day, two writs of fi. fa. were issued, one on each judgment.

On the 6th of May the plaintiffs withdrew the execution on the first judgment.

On the 11th of May the defendant took out a summons before the district registrar to set aside the execution on the second judgment. The registrar referred the matter to the judge, who set aside the execution and ordered the plaintiffs to pay all the costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

T. Willes Chitty, for the appellants.—The point is, whether the fact that a judgment creditor has applied to the county court for an order for payment by the debtor by instalments prevents him from issuing a writ of fi. fa. in the High Court. There is no authority to the effect that a man may not pursue all his remedies at the same time. Imprisonment under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, does not deprive the creditor of his right to issue execution against the goods of the debtor, and consequently an order for payment by instalments may be followed by execution instead of imprisonment. The dictum of Cave, J., in In re Ives, Ex parte Addington, 34 W. R. 593, 16 Q. B. D. 665, that an order of the High Court to pay by instalments does not take away the right to levy execution, covers my case. No order for payment by instalments has been made here. It has simply been postponed. Jones v. Jenner, 4 W. R. 651, 25 L. J. Ex. 319, does not apply, because that case was decided in 1856, before the Debtors Act, 1869.

A. D. Bateson, for the respondent.—In re Ives is in direct conflict with Jones v. Jenner. It would be a great hardship on the debtor that he might be imprisoned on a committal order and that the creditor might also issue execution. The county court judge offered an order of 30s. on each summons, or £3 on the one, and no order on the other. The plaintiffs are now trying to go behind that offer, and it is a breach of faith to the judge. The county court judge has in effect altered the judgment of the High Court. He has postponed the judgment for six months, and that being so, execution cannot be issued. This case is absolutely within the principle of Jones v. Jenner. I submit that there is ample power to stay execution in a proper case, and this is one. Further, the plaintiffs having elected to go to the county court cannot now go back to the High Court.

Chitty, in reply.—There is no question of discretion here. The plaintiffs may or may not issue a writ of fi. fa. The county court judge has not made any order. He has merely adjourned the application. An order varying the terms of the judgment means an order for payment by instalments, and that has not been made here.

CHITTY, L.J., referred to the facts, and continued: The question is whether it is competent in point of law for the plaintiffs, who have voluntarily gone to the county court judge, and put in motion section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, to afterwards levy execution on the judgment in the High Court without at any rate going to the county court judge and getting the order made by him discharged. I think that the Act means that if a person goes to the county court and accepts from the county court judge an order there for payment by instalments, he thereby consents to have the order of the High Court modified to the extent of that order. That the county court judge has that power is unquestionable. He can direct any debt due from any person in pursuance of any order or judgment of that or any other competent court to be paid by instalments, and may from time to time rescind or vary such order. That is the language of section 5. It seems to me that so long as the county court judge's order stands there is a modification of the order of the High Court, and it would, to my mind, involve a great injustice to a defendant if it were not so. He is told that he is to pay by instalments, and the instalments in such a case are generally small. In this case the plaintiffs did not see their way to obtaining execution, and they thought that this was the best way of getting their money, and the defendant has loyally and faithfully obeyed the order since it was made, and has paid his instalments up to the present. A man in such a position exerts himself in order to get the money together for the purpose of complying with the order. He does so under stress of liability to imprisonment if he makes default; but I think he would be likely to be misled, and it would put him in a hard position if he were told that he was still liable, in spite of that, to pay the whole debt, and that what goods he had could be taken in execution. It has been put forward as a ground for this application that the plaintiffs have discovered that the defendant had some furniture, but that fact was known at the time when they obtained the order of the county court judge, and they nevertheless took the order. The result is that they are not entitled so long as that order stands to levy execution, and as regards the adjournment of the second summons, I think that is part of the order which the county court judge made on both summonses. He said that the defendant was to pay 30s. instalments on the two summonses or £3 on the one, and in the latter event he would adjourn the second summons. For what purpose? To see whether the defendant does or does not loyally comply with the order.

Then it is pointed out that under section 5 of the Act of 1869 imprisonment shall not operate as a satisfaction of a debt, and that the Act is silent as to the operation of an order for payment by instalments. There is, it is true, nothing in the Act about it, but it appears to me that the reasonable construction of the Act is as I have stated. Now, how stand the authorities? There is the case in the Court of Exchequer in 1856, long before the Act of 1869 was passed—viz., Jones v. Jenner. There it was held that after proceeding in a county court upon a judgment in the High Court, the plaintiff could not issue execution in the High Court—as Pollock, C.B., said, "if a plaintiff elects to enforce his judgment in the inferior court, there he must remain." The actual decision was that the plaintiff could not obtain a garnishee order. The report is, no doubt, short, and the reasons given by the different judges are not quite the same, but all come to the same conclusion, that the plaintiff should not take his garnishee order, and the Chief Baron said that a writ of fieri facias on the judgment could not then be issued in that court. That case was before 1869, but the principle applies, as the application to the county court there was founded on a plaint issued in the county court upon the judgment in the High Court. Now, having regard to the Act of 1869, it is not necessary to do that, but the application can be made direct to the county court judge himself. The reasoning of what the Chief Baron said applies to the present case. Against that, there is what Cave, J., said in In re Ives, Ex parte Addington. I have attended to that as I should to anything that fell from that learned judge, but it seems to me that he has not taken the right view. He has taken a view that is contrary to that taken by the Court of Exchequer in Jones v. Jenner, and it seems to me that the more reasonable view was that adopted by that court. Cave, J.'s, observations were addressed to the Act of 1869, but they have no special force, in my opinion, beyond this, that they are to be treated with respect, as dicta. The decision in Jones v. Jenner was not cited to Cave, J. If he had been aware of that case he possibly would not have said what he did. I think it is not necessary to travel into the somewhat entangled questions which have been raised under rule 26 of order 25 of the County Court Rules. I think we ought to dismiss this appeal.

COLLINS, L.J.—I do not think it is necessary to add anything to the reasons which have been so fully stated by the Lord Justice, and with which I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

In re ARBITRATION.

BARING-GOULD v. SHARKINGTON COMBINED PICK, &c., (LIMITED), AND THE ARBITRATION ACT, 1889. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Purchase of undertaking—Dissentient shareholder — Arbitration — Award of umpire—Validity of award—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), first schedule (c), (d)—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 161, 162.

The articles of association of a company constitute an agreement between the shareholders inter se, and not between an individual shareholder and the company, and consequently are not an agreement within section 162 of the Companies Act, 1862, so as to exclude the right of the shareholder to resort to arbitration.

The words "being called on to act" in clause (c) of the first schedule to the Arbitration Act, 1889, do not mean calling on the arbitrators to do some specific thing connected with the arbitration, but to enter on the specific business of the arbitration. Consequently, where notice was served on arbitrators calling on them to appoint an umpire, and their award was not made till more than three months after the receipt of such notice,

Held, that the power of the arbitrators had not expired by effluxion of time, and that the jurisdiction of the umpire had not yet arisen.

This was a summons in the action to enforce an award made under the following circumstances:

Article 128 of the articles of association of the defendant company provided that if a sale or arrangement should be made under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 161, the purchase-money to be paid for the interest of a dissentient member should be such sum of money as the liquidator could obtain by selling the shares, stock, or other property to which the dissentient member would have been entitled on the completion of the sale or arrangement had he not expressed his dissent.

In the autumn of 1897 a scheme was brought forward for the reconstruction of the company, and resolutions were passed for a voluntary winding-up. On the 9th of September the plaintiff dissented from these resolutions.

On the 15th of October the liquidator entered into an agreement for the sale of the assets of the old company to a new company. The price was to be 24,900 fully-paid shares of the new company, which were to be applied for by the shareholders of the old company.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 13th of November the plaintiff brought this action to restrain the liquidator parting with the assets or undertaking of the old company without providing for his interest under section 161. The matter was referred to arbitration, but the company accepted the arbitration under protest. An umpire was appointed in the arbitration, and he, on the 30th of April, 1898, awarded the plaintiff £100 for his interest in the company. The plaintiff then took out this summons, which was adjourned into court to enable the defendants to raise the question of the validity of the award.

Buckley, Q.C., and Gore Browne, for the summons.

Mattinson, Q.C., and Beddall, contra.

The arguments used and cases cited are fully dealt with in the judgment.

Aug. 3.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued: Two objections have been taken to the award. First, it is said that the event on which arbitration is to take place under section 162 of the Act of 1862 has not happened; secondly, that the event which gives the umpire jurisdiction has not happened. Section 162 provides thus: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Now, on behalf of the company and the liquidator it is contended that article 128 constitutes an agreement within the meaning of this section, and that the right to resort to arbitration is thereby excluded. In opposition to this view various arguments have been urged. First, it is said that the agreement under section 162 must be between the disputing parties; and it is said that these are the dissenting shareholder on the one hand and the liquidator on the other. I am not satisfied that this is so, and that these are the disputing parties. The language of section 162 and the decision in De Rosaz v. Anglo-Italian Bank, 17 W. R. 724, 4 Q. B. 462, seems to show that the disputing parties must be the shareholder and the company. Then arises this objection: it is said that the articles of association do not constitute an agreement between the shareholder and the company, but between the shareholders inter se; and in support of this view two cases are relied on. The first is Eley v. The Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. (Limited), 24 W. R. 252 and 338, 1 Ex. Div. 20 and 88. There the articles contained a clause that the plaintiff Eley should be solicitor to the company, and he acted as solicitor for a time, but ultimately they ceased to employ him. The plaintiff brought an action against the company for breach of contract in not employing him as solicitor in the terms of the articles, and it was held that the articles of association were a matter between the shareholders inter se or the shareholders and directors, and did not create any contract between the plaintiff and the company. In that case Eley does not appear to have been a shareholder—at least an original shareholder—in the company, but in Browne v. La Trinidad, 36 W. R. 289, 37 Ch. D. 1, a case arose in which the articles of association provided that the directors should adopt and carry into effect with or without modification an agreement which had been entered into before the formation of the company between the plaintiff and a person as trustee for the intended company, by which it was stipulated that the plaintiff should be a director, become a shareholder of the company, and should not be removable till after 1888. It was held that, treating the agreement as embodied in the articles, still there was no contract between the plaintiff and the company, the articles being only a contract between the members inter se and not between the company and the plaintiff. The material passages in the judgment of the Court of Appeal are to be found on p. 13 of 37 Ch. D. [His lordship read the judgment of Cotton, L.J., on that page and also the judgment of the present Master of the Rolls down to the words "It appears to me upon the materials before us that he has no contract with the company."] It seems to me that, having regard to that decision, I cannot treat this as a contract between the dissentient shareholder and the company, and I think that this point is well founded. The third point which is raised is this, that article 128 does not apply to this case, and I think that that point is also well founded. Article 128 only applies to a case where a dissentient shareholder would have been entitled to "shares, stock, or other property" upon the completion of the arrangement if he had not expressed his dissent. Here, under the agreement of the 15th of October, 1897, a shareholder who did not express his dissent would be entitled only to a sum of money, he would not be entitled to shares and stock unless he did something more, unless, for example, he made an application for allotment. I think, therefore, that the first objection to the award raised on behalf of the company and the liquidator fails.

Then it is said that the award is bad because the umpire had no jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the umpire only arises if the arbitrators declare in writing that they cannot agree or the power of the arbitrators has expired by effluxion of time. It is admitted that the former event has not occurred, but the question is whether the latter event has occurred. This turns on the provisions of the first schedule of the Arbitration Act, 1879, clause (c). [His lordship read the clause, and continued:] Now, it is not contended that they failed to make their award within three months after entering on the reference or any extension of time, but it is said that they failed to make their award within three months "after being called on to act by notice in writing," and that is made out in this way. It is said that on the 11th of January, 1898, notice was served on the arbitrators to appoint an umpire. The three months expired on the 11th of April and the award was made on the 30th of April, within a month of the latter date. The question turns on this, whether notice to appoint an umpire is a notice calling on the arbitrator to act within the clause. I have found on this point no judicial decision, but the meaning of "entering on the reference" was considered in Baker v. Stephens, 15 W. R. 902, L. R. 2 Q. B. 523, where it was held that it meant not merely making an appointment to hear the parties, but actually beginning to hear them, and that an award was made in time if within the time, reckoning not from when the arbitrator accepted the office, but from when he entered into the matter of the reference either with both parties before him or a peremptory appointment enabling him to proceed ex parte. I will read a few words from the judgment of Blackburn, J. He first says he does not think entering on the reference means accepting the office of arbitrator. Then he says: [His lordship read the judgment from the words "It is plain, as it seems to me, that entering upon the reference means something else than merely accepting the office," to "And on the whole I think the latter is the true construction of the section," and continued:] That case does not govern the present one, but it throws some light on the meaning of the section. It seems to me that the words "being called on to act" do not mean calling on the arbitrators to do some specific thing connected with the arbitration, but to enter on the substantial business of the arbitration. I think, therefore, the objection is well founded, and that the jurisdiction of the umpire does not arise.

In re PRINCE.
GODWIN v. PRINCE. (a.)

Administration—Testamentary expenses—Probate costs—Costs of unsuccessfully opposing probate.

By his will, a testator charged his residuary real and personal estate with the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. His personal estate was insufficient for the payment of his debts. An action was brought in the Probate Division by a person claiming to revoke the probate of the will, and to have an earlier will established; but that action was dismissed, and the costs of all parties were directed by the Probate Division to be paid out of the testator's estate.

Held, that the plaintiff's costs of such action were not testamentary expenses within the meaning of the provision in the will, and that they were therefore not payable out of the testator's real estate.

This was a summons taken out by the executors of the will of John Prince, deceased, for directions whether, the personal estate of the testator being insufficient for the payment of his debts, the plaintiffs might be at liberty to raise by mortgage or sale of the testator's real estate a sum sufficient to pay the costs of all parties to an action Prince v. Godwin lately pending in the Probate Division directed to be paid out of the testator's estate by an order of the Probate Division.

By his will dated the 1st of April, 1895, the said John Prince devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate, subject to the payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to his children, and he thereby authorized and empowered his executors to raise by mortgage of his real estate any sum which might be necessary for the purposes of his estate and for the payment of legacies.

The testator died on the 29th of May, 1896, and on the 19th of November, 1896, his will was proved in common form by the executors.

On the 13th of January, 1897, the testator's widow commenced the said action of Prince v. Godwin in the Probate Division, impeaching the validity of the testator's said will on various grounds, and she claimed that the court should revoke the grant of probate of that will and should decree probate of a previous will dated the 10th of June, 1891. The executors, the defendants to that suit, denied her allegations, and claimed that the court should pronounce against the will set up by the plaintiff and decree probate in solemn form of the said will of the 1st of April, 1895. The said action was heard on the 19th, 20th, and 22nd of November, 1897, and in the result the judge pronounced in favour of the will of 1895 and ordered the costs of all parties to be paid out of the testator's estate.

The present summons was subsequently taken out by the executors, and upon it the question arose whether the costs in Godwin v. Prince of the testator's widow were payable out of the real estate of the testator.

Romer, for the executors.

Martelli, for the residuary devisees.—The Probate Court had not jurisdiction to order payment of costs out of real estate: Young v. Dendy, L. R. 1 P. & E. 344, 15 W. R. Pro. Dig. 20; Charter v. Charter, 24 W.R. 874, 3 Ch. D. 218; In re Price, 34 W. R. 291, 31 Ch. D. 485; In re Shaw, 43 W. R. 159, [1894] 3 Ch. 615; Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 311.

E. P. Hewitt, for the widow.—Testamentary expenses are by the will charged on the real estate, therefore these costs, being testamentary expenses, are payable out of the real estate. In re Price does not touch this case, as there the question was as to specifically devised real estate. Costs of opposing probate were held to be testamentary expenses in Brown v. Burdett, 31 W. R. 854.

Martelli, in reply, referred to Sharp v. Lush, 27 W.R. 528, 10 Ch. D. 468; Patching v. Barnett, 45 L. T. Rep. 292, 30 W. R. Dig. 54.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and said: It is admitted, and upon the authorities it is quite clear, that the order of the Probate Division of the 22nd of November, 1897, affected only the personal estate of the testator. The question is whether the costs of the plaintiff in the probate action can be paid out of the real estate as testamentary expenses. Now, this court has not drawn a very narrow line as regards the meaning of "testamentary expenses," and I have no wish to do anything to narrow the definition which that expression has received in this court. It has been held that where an action has been properly brought by an executor or administrator for the administration of the personal estate, and the proper parties appear, the costs of both plaintiff and defendants are, as a general rule, testamentary expenses within the meaning of such a will as this. Moreover, it is not necessary that the action should have been brought by the executor. The same rule applies if one of the persons beneficially entitled comes here as plaintiff and asks the court that directions may be given to the executors for the proper administration of the estate. Although I have not been referred to any case which defines the meaning of testamentary expenses as regards an action in the Probate Court, I should be sorry to lay down any very narrow definition with regard to it. For example, if there were an action properly brought by the executors for the probate of the will in solemn form, in which it was necessary to summon various parties who might be interested in disputing the validity of the will, and if those parties appeared and contented themselves with simply cross-examining the plaintiff's witnesses, or with producing such further evidence as might in the judgment of the court be necessary in order to enable the court to arrive at a proper determination whether the will ought to be proved or not, I should be unwilling to say, if the Court of Probate said that these were proper costs to be paid out of the personal estate, that they were not, or might not be, also testamentary expenses within the meaning of such a will as this. Again, even if the proceedings were not taken by the executors, but by some other person interested in upholding the will, and that was considered by the Court of Probate to be a reasonable course for establishing the will, I should be unwilling to hold, simply on the ground that the action had not been brought by the executors, that the plaintiff would be excluded from a benefit in the will charging testamentary expenses upon real estate.

But here the plaintiff in the action came challenging the will. It was not a mere mode of getting the decision of the court upon the validity of the will by requiring the will to be proved in solemn form, but, as I have ascertained from the learned judge who tried the case, there was a serious contest raised by this lady as to the validity of the will.

That the costs of the executors in the probate action were testamentary expenses appears to me to be beyond controversy—they were costs properly incurred in upholding the will.

The costs of the plaintiff, on the other hand, or the bulk of them—and they are very considerable—were incurred in contesting the will, in asserting that it was a will which ought not to be recognized as the will of the testator; and it does not appear to me, however wide the definition may be, that those costs ought to be regarded as testamentary expenses.

Mortgage — Real estate — Equitable sub-mortgage by deposit—Priority—Notice—Equitable sub-mortgagees of land.

An equitable sub-mortgage by deposit of the original mortgage deeds of real estate confers on the equitable sub-mortgagees an interest in the land mortgaged, and, consequently, the doctrine of obtaining priority by the giving of prior notice, does not apply in such case.

In re Richards, Humber v. Richards, 39 W. R. 186, 45 Ch. D. 589, considered and followed.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 11th of December, 1861, being the settlement made on the marriage of Augustin and Mary Hannah Williams, certain property was conveyed to William Taylor and John Severn Walker to be held by them upon trust for Mary Hannah Williams and Augustin Williams and their children as therein mentioned.

William Taylor died on the 20th of August, 1874, and John Severn Walker died on the 11th of June, 1875, having by his will appointed his widow Ellen Barber Walker and the plaintiffs William Jeffery Hopkins and George Truefitt his executors.

On the 8th of December, 1875, a sum of £500, part of the trust property, was paid off and was in the hands of R. C. H., solicitor to the trust.

Pending the intended appointment of new trustees and a permanent investment of the £500, Mrs. E. B. Walker and the plaintiffs agreed that R. C. H. should retain the £500 and should give security for the repayment thereof with interest at 5 per cent. per annum by deposit with them of certain mortgage securities, dated the 25th and 26th of October, 1875, belonging to him and of the documents of title relating to the property comprised therein. On the 8th of December, 1875, R. C. H. accordingly deposited with Mrs. E. B. Walker and the plaintiffs a memorandum of deposit and the deeds and documents therein specified. The memorandum was to the following effect: "I have this day deposited with Mrs. Ellen Barber Walker and Messrs. William Jeffery Hopkins and George Truefitt, the devisees in trust and executors of the will of the late John Severn Walker, Esq., deceased, who was the surviving trustee of the settlement made on the marriage of Rev. Augustin Williams and Mary Hannah his wife, the above deeds and writings as a security for the sum of £500 lately out on mortgage of property in Worcester recently sold when such mortgage was paid off, and which sum of £500 remains in my hands pending the appointment of new trustees of the said settlement to be proceeded with forthwith. And I undertake at any time when called upon to repay the said sum of £500 with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum, and hereby indemnify the said Ellen Barber Walker, William Jeffery Hopkins, and George Truefitt from all liability in case any loss or deficiency should arise in respect of the investment of the said sum of £500 as above. Signed, R. C. H."

Mrs. E. B. Walker died on the 2nd of October, 1890.

On the 29th of July, 1891, R. C. H. sent to Messrs. Hughes & Brown, the plaintiffs' solicitors, a draft appointment of a new trustee of the settlement for approval. The draft purported to be an appointment by Augustin Williams and Mary Hannah Williams of Henry Lucy Sowdon to be a trustee of the settlement in place of John Severn Walker. R. C. H. at the same time represented to the plaintiffs through their solicitors, Messrs. Hughes & Brown, that he was authorized to act as solicitor for Henry Lucy Sowdon, and that Sowdon had agreed and consented to accept and act in the trusts of the settlement.

In June, 1892, the deed of appointment and a transfer of the trust securities to Henry Lucy Sowdon were executed, and on the 10th of June, 1892, the plaintiffs delivered the deeds and documents specified in the memorandum of the 8th of December, 1875, to R. C. H. as solicitor to Henry Lucy Sowdon.

As a matter of fact Sowdon had neither given authority to R. C. H. to act as his solicitor, nor had he agreed and consented to accept and act in the trusts of the settlement; and he disclaimed the trusts of the settlement and the assurances vesting the property in him.

On the 24th of September, 1892, R. C. H. deposited with the defendant Harry Raines Hemsworth the deeds and documents specified in the memorandum of deposit of the 8th of December, 1875, as an equitable security for a loan to him of £128 18s. 1d.

On the 5th of October, 1894, John Wootton, the original mortgagor, under the mortgages of the 25th and 26th of October, 1875, died, and on the 20th of March, 1895, H. R. Hemsworth gave notice to the executors of Wootton's will of the deposit with him of the 24th of September, 1892, the plaintiffs not having at that time given notice of the memorandum and deposit of the 8th of December, 1875.

On the 12th of May, 1896, R. C. H. being insolvent executed an assignment of all his property to Hubert Aloysius Leicester upon trust for the benefit of his creditors.

In November, 1897, the plaintiffs brought this action against Hemsworth and Leicester, claiming that it might be declared that they were entitled to first charge upon the mortgages of the 25th and 26th of October, 1875, and on the documents of title relating to the property comprised therein, and on the moneys secured by the said mortgages in priority to any claim by the defendant, to secure the sum of £500 lent by them to R. C. H. and interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum. That an account might be taken of what was due to them in respect of the said charge, and that the said charge might be enforced by foreclosure on sale. That the defendant Hemsworth might be ordered to deliver up to them the deeds and documents of title in his possession relating to the said mortgage security.

The defendant Leicester disclaimed any interest in the property.

The defendant Hemsworth in his defence stated the fact of John Wootton's death, and that he had given notice to John Wootton's executors of the memorandum and the deposit of the 24th of September, 1892. He further alleged that the plaintiffs were guilty of gross and wilful negligence and breach of trust in handing the deeds in litigation to R. C. H.,

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

also that the appointment of Sowdon as sole trustee of the settlement would, if carried out, have been improper and a breach of trust, as not being within the power for the appointment of new trustees contained in the settlement, and that the plaintiffs had made no inquiry as to Sowdon being willing to act as trustee, or as to his having given authority to R. C. H. to act as his solicitor. By way of counterclaim the defendant Hemsworth claimed a declaration that he was entitled as against and in priority to the plaintiffs to the full benefit of the memorandum and deposit of the 24th of September, 1892, and the charge thereby professed and intended to be created.

Warrington, Q.C., and S. Dickinson, for the plaintiffs.—The question to be decided is as to priority between equitable sub-mortgagees by deposit of a legal mortgage of freeholds. The doctrine of obtaining priority by notice does not apply to a charge upon any interest in land: In re Richards, Humber v. Richards, 39 W. R. 186, 45 Ch. D. 589, and this is an interest in land and not a chose in action inasmuch as it is a debt secured by a mortgage of land.

Benshaw, Q.C., and J. B. Matthews, for the defendant Hemsworth. — In this case both the plaintiffs and the defendant are sub-mortgagees, having an equitable charge. The case of In re Richards, Humber v. Richards, is different to the present case. There the question was between an assignee of the mortgagee and a sub-mortgagee. Here the parties have each a charge, by equitable sub-mortgage, on the debt from the original mortgagor to the original mortgagee. An interest of this nature is a chose in action, and notice being necessary, whichever party gives notice first gains priority: Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1; Loveridge v. Cooper, 3 Russ. 30; In re Hughes' Trusts, 12 W. R. 1025, 2 Hem. & M. 89; Wigram v. Buckley, 43 W. R. 147, [1894] 3 Ch. 483.

KEKEWICH, J., after dealing with the alleged negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, and holding that there had been no such negligence as would, on the authorities, postpone them to the defendant, proceeded:

There is a subordinate point, but one of some importance. It is said that notice was necessary to perfect the securities, and as the plaintiffs did not give notice, whereas the defendant did give notice to the executors of the original mortgagor, the defendant is entitled to stand before them.

The difference between equitable estates and interests in land on the one hand, and choses in action on the other, for this purpose has been recognized on both sides. The question is, to which class does a mortgage debt belong. In the case of In re Richards, Humber v. Richards, Stirling, J., reviews the authorities, and at p. 597 of 45 Ch. D., says: "So that from the time of Sir W. Grant down to that of Lord Hatherley, the rule with respect to mortgage debts has been, that as between the particular assignee and the assignee in bankruptcy the title of the particular assignee prevails, although no notice has been given to the mortgagor by the former."

The distinction suggested between that case and the present is that Stirling, J., was not considering the case of two independent dealings with one mortgage by way of sub-mortgage. It seems to me, however, that the principle laid down by Stirling, J., covers the case, and it would be mischievous to pare down his language in that way and say that it does not extend to such a case as the present one. It is true that no case exactly in point seems to have been discovered, but, in my opinion, the interest created by deposit of title-deeds is equally an interest in land for this purpose, whether it is created directly by an original mortgagor or derivatively through an intervening mortgagee by way of sub-mortgage; and the principle is, that whenever you are dealing with interests in land, the doctrine of obtaining priority by notice is inapplicable. There will be a declaration accordingly that the plaintiffs are entitled to a first charge on the indenture of mortgage and the documents of title relating to the mortgaged property, and on the moneys secured by the mortgage in priority to any claim by the defendant.

Company — Shares — Issue of fully-paid shares — Registered contract—Sufficient statement of consideration—Property purchased described merely by reference to prior contract—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

Where the contract registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, on the issue of fully paid-up shares merely described (by way of recital of a prior contract entered into between the vendor and a trustee for the company) the property sold, as "certain leasehold messuages, shops, and premises, together with the goodwill of the several businesses carried on by the vendor upon the same, together with the machinery, plant, horses, vans, carts, fixtures, and fittings used in connection with the said several businesses."

Held, that the consideration for the issue of the shares was sufficiently stated.

In re Maynards (Limited), 46 W. R. 346, [1898] 1 Ch. 515, not followed.

Motion on behalf of shareholders in the above company that the register of the members of the company might be rectified by striking out therefrom the names of the respective applicants as the holders of shares respectively set opposite their names.

By an agreement dated the 7th of October, 1895, and made between Samuel Frost (thereinafter called the vendor) of the one part, and W. H. Chandler (thereinafter called the trustee) for and on behalf of the company thereinafter referred to, and which was about to be formed, of the other part. The vendor agreed to sell, and the company to purchase, the respective leasehold shops, mortgages, and premises mentioned in the schedule thereto, together with the goodwill of the several businesses carried on upon the premises, together with all machinery, plant, horses, vans carts, fixtures, and fittings used in connection with the several businesses. The consideration to be paid to the vendor for the sale was to be the sum of £20,000, payable as to one moiety thereof in cash and as to the remaining moiety in fully paid up shares of the company, and it was by the said agreement also provided that the proportions of the purchase-money payable in shares and cash respectively might be varied by substituting other classes or amounts of shares of the company, or a larger or less amount of cash and shares respectively, as the directors of the company and the vendor migh t thereafter mutually agree upon.

The company was duly incorporated on the 9th of October, 1895, with a nominal capital of £100,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £1 each.

By another agreement dated the 21st of October, 1895, and made between the vendor of the first part, W. H. Chandler of the second part, and the company of the third part, the company adopted and confirmed the last-mentioned agreement, and it was provided that the purchase-money of £20,000 should be paid as follows: that is to say, by the allotment to the vendor, or as he should direct, of 15,689 fully paid up preference shares of £1 each, of 75 fully paid up founders' shares of £1 each, and by the payment to the vendor of £2,519 cash; and further, that before any of the fully paid up shares were issued a proper contract would be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies.

By an agreement dated the 18th of November, 1895, and made between Samuel Frost of the one part and S. Frost & Co. (Limited), of the other part, after reciting that by an agreement dated the 7th of October, 1895 (being the agreement first above mentioned), it was agreed that the vendor should sell and the company should purchase certain leasehold messuages, shops, and premises, and that he should grant to the company and the company would accept the lease of certain other premises, and that the vendor should sell and the company should purchase all the goodwill of the several businesses carried on by the vendor upon the same respective premises, together with all the machinery, plant, horses, vans, and fixtures and fittings used in connection with the several businesses as therein mentioned, and after reciting the formation of the company and the agreement above-mentioned of the 21st of October, 1895, it was witnessed and agreed as follows: (1) The company shall forthwith cause this agreement to be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies; (2) the company shall on or before the 30th of November, 1895, allot to the vendor or his nominees the shares mentioned in the agreement of the 21st of October, 1895; (3) the said shares shall be accepted by the vendor in full satisfaction of £17,481, being that portion of the purchase-money of £20,000 which under the hereinbefore-recited supplemental agreement of the 21st of October, 1895, was to be satisfied by the allotment of fully paid up shares.

The agreement of the 18th of November, 1895, did not contain any copy of the schedule to the agreement of the 7th of October, 1895, or any further reference to the property comprised therein, and it was duly filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, on the 21st of November, 1895, and the shares therein mentioned were shortly afterwards issued to the vendor and to his nominees.

Doubts having been raised as to the sufficiency of the contract of the 18th of November, 1895, so registered as aforesaid to protect from liability the fully paid up shares issued to Samuel Frost and to his nominees thereunder having regard to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, this motion was made.

The evidence showed that the application was a bonâ fide one and that the company was in a prosperous and flourishing condition.

T. H. Carson, for the motion.—The question is whether the consideration for the sale of the shares is sufficiently stated in the contract of the 18th of November, 1895, filed under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. I submit it is not, and the case is governed by In re Maynards (Limited), 46 W. R. 846, [1898] 1 Ch. 515, and I also rely on In re Kharaskhoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate, 46 W. R. 37, [1897] 2 Ch. 451.

Howard Spensly, jun., for the company.—In the contract of the 18th of November, 1895, the consideration for the issue of the shares is stated to be the sale of certain leasehold messuages, shops, and premises, and the goodwill and stock-in-trade, and that is sufficient particularity to constitute a proper contract.

Cur. adv. vult.

ROMER, J.—This case is one of considerable importance and will, I am glad to understand, be brought before the Court of Appeal. I need therefore only state briefly any reasons for holding that the motion fails.

I have the misfortune to differ from some of the views expressed by my brother Kekewich in the very similar case of In re Maynards (Limited), but I note in that case the point arising was not fully argued, and under the circumstances I think I ought to act on my own judgment in the present case.

To comply with section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the contract filed must show on the face of it the consideration, for that is an essential part of the contract, and accordingly in In re Kharaskhoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate, on appeal, it was held that where the so-called filed contract, only referred to the consideration by stating it could be found in another document not filed, it would not comply with the section.

The question before me in this case is whether what is filed is a complete contract; or whether what is filed is not in itself a complete contract because (as is alleged) it does not sufficiently state on the face of it the consideration. If what is filed amounts in itself to a complete contract, including a proper statement of the consideration, then the section is complied with, and I know of no sufficient reason why the section should have a meaning or effect given to it beyond what is conveyed by the exact language used.

Now, fairly viewed, is the consideration stated on the face of the filed document in the case before me? I think it is. The document shows that the consideration was (stating it shortly) that the vendor had agreed by a previous contract therein mentioned (but not filed) to sell and lease to the company certain leasehold premises and to sell the goodwill of the business carried on by the vendor on those premises, together with the machinery and fittings used in connection with those businesses as therein mentioned. That is a short, but to my mind sufficient, statement of the consideration, and I do not think it was essential that the full particulars of the leaseholds, businesses, and plant should be detailed in the filed contract. Indeed if the other view be held I do not know what limit could be placed on the particulars required to be set forth. Would a full list of the machinery, plant, horses, vans, carts, fixtures, and fittings be required; or if not, why not? It is not as if under the section it was made essential that any person seeing the filed contract should be able from it alone to ascertain the exact value of the consideration as compared with the shares to be allotted or cash paid. I can see nothing in the section requiring such particularity in the statement of the consideration. As previously observed, all that the Act says so far as concerns the consideration, is that the registered document must be a contract—by which no doubt is meant a contract complete in itself—including the consideration. And I do not think that, apart from what can be gathered from the Act itself, the court should construe the section by speculations or considerations as to what reasons may or may not have induced the Legislature to pass the Act. This being so I do not see why it is required to state the consideration in the filed contract under section 25 with more particularity than would be necessary, say, in stating it in writing in any agreement required by statute to be in writing. And it appears to me that a consideration stated with such particularity as that I am now considering would undoubtedly be held to be sufficiently stated, if in writing, to answer the requirements of any such statute as I have referred to; take, for example, section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, which covered guarantees before the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97. Under that section certain agreements have to be in writing, signed by the party to be charged, and accordingly it has been held that the consideration must appear in writing: see Wain v. Warlters, 5 East 10, and Saunders v. Wakefield, 4 B. & Ald. 595. Could it possibly be held under that section that a statement in a signed written agreement that the consideration was the sale of certain goods and chattels which had been handed over was insufficient because the details of these goods and chattels had to be ascertained by parol evidence? I think not. And when I look at the judgments of the Lords Justices in the Kharaskhoma case, it appears to me that they carefully guarded themselves from its being supposed that they considered the statement of the consideration in the contract to be filed under section 25 of the Act of 1867, required such particularity as is insisted in the case now before me.

Lastly, I may add that if such a document as I am considering be held no contract within the meaning of section 25, section 25 will in my opinion prove to be a veritable trap. If the applicants before me are right and this company had been wound up before the applicants moved, the court must have held them liable to pay in full on their shares, and many persons are likely thereafter to be made liable because they or their advisers had interpreted the word "contract" in section 25 in what appears to me in a fair and reasonable way.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff carried on the business of ladies' tea-rooms and a ladies' club. The defendants were the occupiers and owners for a term of years of Nos. 13 and 14, Old Bond-street.

By an underlease of the 24th of December, 1895, four rooms on the second floors of Nos. 13 and 14, and one room on the third floor of No. 14, were demised to the plaintiff "together with free ingress and egress for the lessee, her servants and customers, through the staircase and passages of No. 13 aforesaid to and from the premises hereby demised on the second floor of the said messuages Nos. 13 and 14 aforesaid, and through the staircase and passages of No. 14 aforesaid from the second floor of the said premises to and from the room hereby demised on the third floor of No. 14 aforesaid at all times during the term hereby granted."

It appeared that there was no staircase in No. 13 leading from Old Bond-street directly to the demised premises, the only staircase which gave such access having been pulled down when the lift was made in 1893. There was, however, a staircase in No. 14, but, as this was entered through the defendants' shop on the ground floor of No. 14, the defendants declined to allow the plaintiff to use this staircase except in case of fire or other emergency, and insisted that she and her customers must gain access to the demised premises by means of the lift in No. 13, for the use of which by the plaintiff special provisions had been made by the underlease.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that, under the circumstances, and upon the true construction of the underlease, she was entitled to a right of access to the demised premises through the shop by the staircase in No. 14.

The defendants counterclaimed for rectification of the underlease, on the ground of common mistake, by striking out from the grant the words "the staircase" and all other words purporting to grant any right of way other than the right to use the lift in No. 13 and the passages leading thereto and therefrom.

Farwell, Q.C., and Stock, for the plaintiffs.—On the true construction of this grant, a right of access to the staircase leading to the demised premises was given to the plaintiff, and the words "of No. 13" is falsa demonstratio, and may be disregarded: Elphinstone on Interpretation of Deeds, pp. 157 and 158.

Levett, Q.C., and J. R. Brooke, for the defendants.—The doctrine of falsa demonstratio does not apply to this case. You cannot construe a grant of way over the staircase of No. 13 into a grant of way over the staircase in No. 14.

Farwell replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 6.—ROMER, J.—The first point which arises concerns the true construction of the underlease to the plaintiff, and may be shortly stated as follows: [His lordship having shortly stated the facts, and the words of the grant, continued:] Now, there was and is a staircase leading to and from the demised rooms, and no other way to which the grant of the right of ingress and egress could apply: but this staircase is in No. 14, and not in No. 13. There is a staircase in No. 13, but it does not lead to the demised rooms, and it is now common ground that that staircase was certainly not demised or referred to by the grant in question. The question is whether under these circumstances, as a matter of construction of the underlease, a right of way over the staircase that does lead to the rooms must not be held to pass, and the words in the grant "of No. 13" be rejected as falsa demonstratio. To my mind the point is one of great difficulty. Since the trial I have considered the numerous authorities bearing on the point, some of which are not easy to reconcile, and in the result I have come to the conclusion that on this question of construction the plaintiff is right.

The principle on which the cases bearing on the point have been decided has been variously stated. One way in which it may be put is the following: "In construing a deed purporting to assure a property, if there be a description of the property sufficient to render certain what is intended, the addition of a wrong name or of an erroneous statement as to quantity, occupancy, locality, or an erroneous enumeration of particulars, will have no effect." And Parke, J., in Doe d. Smith v. Galloway, 5 B. & Ad. 43, at p. 51, stated the principle as follows: "The rule is clearly settled, that where there is a sufficient description set forth of premises by giving the name of a close or otherwise we may reject a false demonstration." Among the numerous authorities illustrating the principle I will select the case of Wrotesley v. Adams, Plowden 187, for the observations of the court in that case at p. 191 of the edition of 1816 appear to me to bear directly on the case before me. The court there had to consider the effect of a lease of all the lessor's farm in Brosley, then in the tenure and occupation of Roger Wilcox, and decided that inasmuch as the word "farm" signified the capital or chief messuage or house and all the lands lying to it, and so had a certainty in itself, the court could disregard the erroneous description of "in the tenure and occupation of Roger Wilcox," because "there is a certainty in the thing demised—viz., the farm in Brosley, and so another certainty put to a thing which was certain enough before is of no manner of effect"; and the court distinguished the case from one where the property was merely described by an uncertain (i.e., by a general) description followed by a certain one, and the distinction was illustrated thus—a release of all my right in all my lands in Dale which I have by descent on the part of my father, and I have lands in Dale but none by descent on the part of my father, there the release is void; but a release of Whiteacre in Dale which I have by descent on the part of my father is good if I have Whiteacre, though not by descent on the part of my father. Now, when I come to apply this principle to the case before me, considerable difficulty arises owing to the wording of the grant of the right of way, and especially to the position of the words "of No. 13." But looking at the question as one of substance rather than of form, it appears to me that the most important matter to be borne in mind in construing the grant is that it is a right of way over the staircase and passages which led to and from the demised rooms. This causes no ambiguity or doubt whatever; the way is made certain, and is in no sense described in an uncertain or general manner; then does the addition of the words "of No. 13" compel the court to hold that the otherwise clear grant is to be held void, or cannot the court reject the words as being falsa demonstratio? In my opinion the latter is the correct view, and the court ought to hold the deed effectual as granting the right of way over the only access which could have been referred to by the grant in question. I think no difference ought to be drawn between this grant according to its actual wording and a grant worded thus: "Together with free ingress and egress for the lessee, her servants and customers, through the staircase and passages which lead to and from the demised rooms and which are in No. 13," where I think comparatively little difficulty would have been felt by the court in rejecting the added words "and which are in No. 13." For these reasons I construe the grant in favour of the plaintiff's contention, though I feel great doubt on the point.

Judgment for the plaintiff and against the defendants' counter-claim.

Section 80 of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act, 1859, gave power to the Company of Watermen and Lightermen of the River Thames to make bye-laws "for the government of the company, and for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, and for carrying into effect the purposes of the Act and the several powers and authorities thereby vested in the company."

Held, that a bye-law made under this section, requiring that "every steamboat navigated on the river in the towing of barges, vessels, and craft should have one licensed waterman on board such steamboat for the purpose of assisting in the management and navigation thereof" was ultra vires and invalid, as not coming within the scope of any of the purposes specified in the section.

Case stated by the police magistrate for the borough of West Ham.

An information was laid by the appellant stating that the steamboat Rotifer, of which the respondents were the owners, on the 6th of December, 1897, in the River Thames off Silvertown, in the borough of West Ham, unlawfully towed the barge Hetty without having a licensed waterman on board such steamboat for the purpose of assisting in the management and navigation of the same, contrary to bye-law 60 of the bye-laws made under the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.).

Upon this information a summons was issued, and upon the hearing of the same on the 19th of January, 1898, the learned magistrate found the following facts—namely: That the steamboat Rotifer did on the 6th of December, 1897, on the River Thames off Silvertown, tow and navigate one barge without having on board such steamboat a licensed waterman to assist in the management and navigation thereof.

The Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act, 1859, provides:

Section 80.—"The said court of master, wardens, and assistants are hereby empowered from time to time to make such bye-laws as they think proper for the government of the said company, and for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, and for carrying into effect the purposes of this Act and the several powers and authorities hereby vested in the said company, with power to annex reasonable penalties and forfeitures for the breach of such bye-laws respectively not exceeding the sum of five pounds for any one offence, so that the same bye-laws be not inconsistent with any of the laws of this kingdom, or with this Act, or with any of the bye-laws, rules, orders, or regulations made or to be made by the conservators of the River Thames under the authority of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1857, or of any Act for the time being in force relating to the conservancy of the River Thames; and also from time to time to alter, amend, and repeal such bye-laws, or any of them; provided always, that no such bye-laws shall in any way interfere with the tolls of the Sunday ferries hereinbefore authorized, and that no such bye-laws or alterations in any bye-laws shall be of any validity until they shall have been approved by the conservators of the River Thames."

Under section 80 of the Act, bye-laws were made by the Company of Watermen and Lightermen of the River Thames, for their government, and for the government and regulation of watermen, lightermen, barge-owners, and others connected with the navigation of the River Thames between Teddington Lock and Lower Hope Point, near Gravesend, and made in pursuance of and for carrying into effect the purposes of the Act, and the several powers and authorities thereby vested in the company.

Bye-law 60 provided:

"That every steamboat navigated on the river within the limits of this Act, in the towing of barges, lighters, vessels, and craft, shall have one licensed waterman on board such steamboat for the purpose of assisting in the management and navigation thereof. And if any such steamboat shall be navigated in contravention of this section, the owner thereof, or the master in charge of the same, shall incur a penalty not exceeding forty shillings; and that every barge, lighter, or craft towed on the river by steamboat, shall have one licensed lighterman, or licensed apprentice at the least, in charge thereof to steer and navigate the same; and if the same shall be navigated in contravention of this section, the owner thereof, or the person in charge of any such craft, shall incur a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

It was contended before the magistrate by the respondents—(1) That bye-law 60 was ultra vires and not within the scope of section 80 of the Act of 1859; (2) that the bye-law was inconsistent with the Act, inasmuch as the Act, in section 66, has a proviso that, with regard to the matters coming under that section, if the owner prove that he is unable for the usual compensation to obtain the services of a lighterman or apprentice as required by the section, then no such penalty shall be payable by him; whereas in bye-law 60, which requires in some cases a waterman and in some cases a lighterman to be employed, there is no similar proviso; (3) that the bye-law was unreasonable, and especially on the ground that, although it purports to confer certain privileges on watermen, neither the Act nor the bye-laws impose any corresponding obligation on them to work on a steam tug; (4) and in the alternative that, if the bye-law is good, no offence had been committed as only one barge was being towed.

The magistrate dismissed the information on the ground that, looking at the general scope of the Watermen and Lightermen Amendment Act, 1859, and the interpretation given by section 3 of the Act to the word "waterman," bye-law 60—so far as the information before him was concerned—was ultra vires.

The question for the opinion of the court was—Whether the magistrate was right in his decision in holding the bye-law No. 60 to be ultra vires?

Ashton, for the appellant.—Section 80 is the section which gives the company power to make these bye-laws, and under that section these bye-laws were made, the section giving power to make bye-laws "for the government of the company, and for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, and for carrying into effect the purposes of the Act, and the several powers hereby vested in the company." The preamble of the Act shows what some of these purposes of the Act are—namely, for "the regulation of the persons employed to navigate" the barges, and for "the security of passengers passing to and fro on the river." The bye-laws may be supported as coming within the terms of this preamble as well as within the scope of section 80. It is also a reasonable bye-law, as it is a reasonable thing for the common safety to require that when a steamboat is employed on the River Thames in towing barges there should be one licensed waterman on board to assist. In Elmore v. Hunter, 3 C. P. D. 116, 26 W. R. Dig. 215, which came under section 66, six barges were fastened together and were towed by a steam tug; four men were in charge, and there was no person on board the two last barges, and the court there decided that these two barges were "worked or navigated" in contravention of the Act. The bye-law in this case was within the powers of the company to make, and was also reasonable, and it is therefore a valid bye-law.

He also referred to Gosling v. Green, 41 W. R. 141, [1893] 1 Q. B. 109; "The Quickstep," 15 P. D. 196, 39 W. R. Dig. 214; Rolles v. Newell, 39 W. R. 96, 25 Q. B. D. 335; and Edmonds v. Master of the Company of Watermen and Lightermen, 24 L. J. M. C. 124.

C. A. Russell, Q.C. (Tudor Howell with him), for the respondents.—The preamble states that one of the objects of the Act is that "proper regulations should be made for the navigation of barges, &c., carrying goods, wares, and merchandize," and section 66 deals with that matter and provides that "no barge, lighter, boat, or other like craft for the carrying of goods shall be worked or navigated unless there shall be in charge of such craft a licensed lighterman or qualified apprentice," and there is this important proviso, that the penalty is not to be incurred if the owner of the barge show that he could not for the usual remuneration obtain the services of a lighterman. Then section 80 gives power to make bye-laws for the various objects specified in that section. This bye-law does not come within any of those purposes. It is not a bye-law "for the government of the company," or "for the government and regulation of watermen and lightermen," or "for carrying into effect the purposes of the Act and the several powers vested in the company." It does not come within any of these objects, but is merely a bye-law made by the company in their own interests. It is also unreasonable, as it contains no proviso similar to that in section 66 of this Act, and it could not be carried out. The magistrate was therefore right in holding it to be bad.

Ashton in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—The written judgment of the court (WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ.) was delivered by

WILLS, J.—The decision of the learned magistrate is in our opinion correct. We shall not attempt to define the office of a bye-law, or to lay down the limits of its operation. It is sufficient to say that bye-laws of the class with which we are dealing derive their authority from the statute which gives power to make them, and the provisions of different statutes in that behalf vary almost infinitely; so that it is necessary in any particular instance to look to the enactment under the authority of which the bye-law affected to be made, and to see whether or not it is within the statutory power. The bye-law with which we have to do is one made by the court (duly empowered to make bye-laws) of the master, wardens, and commonalty of the watermen and lightermen of the River Thames; and section 80 of their Act of 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., Session 2) is the enactment upon which the power to make bye-laws is founded. It provides that "the court of master, wardens, and assistants are hereby empowered from time to time to make such bye-laws as they think proper for the government of the said company, and for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, and for carrying into effect the purposes of this Act and the several powers and authorities hereby vested in the said company." The bye-law in question is bye-law 60. It provides: "That every steamboat navigated on the river within the limits of this Act, in the towing of barges, lighters, vessels, and craft, shall have one licensed waterman on board such steamboat for the purpose of assisting in the management and navigation thereof," and imposes a penalty of 40s. upon the owner or master in charge of any steamboat navigated in contravention of this "section"—that is, of this bye-law. The word "vessel" in this bye-law must be read as vessel of the like kind with barge or lighter. Nothing is clearer in the Act of 1859 than that the only craft it deals with (excepting passenger boats) are lighters, barges, and kindred craft, and that in the few places in which the word "vessel" has been introduced it refers to vessels of the like kind with lighters and barges, and not to vessels of all sorts; and it is fair, therefore, in favour of the bye-law to give it the same meaning in the bye-law, otherwise it would be preposterously beyond anything within the purview of the Act. Now, the bye-law is clearly not one for the government of the company, nor for the governing and regulation of lightermen or watermen; it can only be supported therefore if it aid in carrying into effect the purposes of the Act, or some one or more of the powers and authorities vested in the company by the Act. It is necessary therefore to see what these purposes and what these powers and authorities are. Part of the preamble of the Act recites that it is expedient that proper regulations should be made for the navigation of barges, lighters, boats, and other light craft carrying goods, wares, and merchandize within the limits of this Act, and for the regulation of the persons employed to navigate the same, and for the security of passengers passing to and fro on the said river in boats and other craft, and for the orderly conduct of the traffic on the said river," and it was argued broadly that all the matters referred to in this recital are amongst the purposes of the Act, and that the court had power to make the bye-law in question inasmuch as its object (it was said) fell under one or another of the above heads. This argument, however, magnifies to the extent of distortion the proper office of a preamble. If it is sound, there is hardly a subject connected with the traffic on the river, whether for business or pleasure, goods or passengers, which might not be dealt with—from a cockboat to an ocean steamer—or the regulation of speed, manning, lights, and everything else which may be considered to bear upon the security of passengers in boats and craft, or the orderly conduct of traffic. It does not follow that because large words are used in a preamble everything to which they can be referred is within the scope of the Act. They may be useful to a limited extent in helping to interpret doubtful passages or phrases in the Act, but they do not extend its provisions or its scope beyond what the enacting parts of the Act contain, and it is necessary, therefore, to see what the Act does provide for. Section 2 defines a "passenger boat" as "any sailing boat, river steamboat, row-boat, wherry, or other like craft used for carrying passengers within the limits of this Act, unless there is something in the context inconsistent with such a meaning." Section 3 defines a "lighterman" as "any person working or navigating for hire a lighter, barge, boat, or other like craft within the limits of this Act," and "waterman" as "any person navigating, rowing, or working for hire 'a passenger boat,' unless there is something in the context inconsistent with such meanings." Sections 6-42 refer to the internal affairs of the company. Sections 43-45 (now repealed) require lighters and such-like craft to be registered and certain particulars to be painted visibly on the craft. Sections 46-52 regulate the apprentices and their indentures and rights, and section 53 refers to the registration of persons who may enter into indentures with apprentices. Section 54 enacts that "if any person, not being a freeman licensed in pursuance of this Act, or an apprentice qualified according to this Act, to a freeman . . . shall at any time act as a waterman or lighterman, or ply or work or navigate any wherry, passenger boat, lighter, vessel, or other craft, upon the river . . . within the limits of this Act, for hire or gain," he shall be liable to a penalty: Provided that any person licensed as herein provided or qualified apprentice may work as a lighterman. Sections 55-60 regulate the qualifications of applicants for a lighterman's or waterman's licence and the fees payable in respect of them. Section 61 enacts that every apprentice may, upon certain conditions, become a freeman. Sections 62-65 deal with matters connected with licences. Section 66 has more bearing upon the matter in hand. It enacts that "no barge, lighter, boat, or other like craft for the carrying of goods, wares, or merchandize shall be worked or navigated within the limits of this Act, unless there be in charge of such craft a lighterman licensed in manner hereinbefore mentioned," or an apprentice "qualified as hereinbefore mentioned," and imposes a penalty not exceeding £5 for a breach of the section, unless the owner of the boat proves that he is unable for the usual compensation to obtain the services of a licensed lighterman or apprentice. Section 67 provides with regard to passenger boats that no unlicensed person shall row, steer, or navigate them for hire within the limits aforesaid, under a like penalty. Sections 68-79 contain various miscellaneous provisions having no bearing whatever upon the present question, and the same may be said of the rest of the Act (sections 81-103) following section 80, which gives the power to make bye-laws. It seems to us that there is no single provision or purpose of the Act which is subserved by the requirement that a steamboat towing barges shall have on board one licensed waterman to assist in the navigation and management thereof. The bye-law provides not even for compulsory pilotage, but merely for compulsory employment. A person who is to assist in the management and navigation of the vessel must necessarily be under the orders of the captain, or whoever represents the captain, he has no right to give an order or to take the helm, or to do anything but obey the captain's orders, a position for which any able-bodied man, accustomed to a tug, is just as competent as the waterman. It is a curious thing, and interesting as showing how little the framers of these bye-laws were thinking of anything tending to the convenience or safety of navigation, that the person who must be taken on board the tug is not even to be a lighterman, but a waterman, who according to the Act is a person having especially to do with passenger boats. The Act gives no special privileges of employment to watermen or lightermen, except to the extent provided for by section 66 as to lightermen, and by section 67 as to watermen (including in both cases apprentices to the respective branches of the trade), and the bye-law attempts to extend these privileges and to force upon the owners of tug-boats members of the company to perform services for which, so far as the Act is concerned, the owners are at liberty to go into the open market. Section 66 has been relied upon in a way which is not very easy to follow, but seems to come practically to this —that the steamboat is concerned in the navigation of the lighters she tows and that therefore there ought to be a licensed person in charge of her, and that the bye-law enacts something less and is therefore not objectionable. It is true that in a sense the tug is concerned in the navigation, but she is not a lighter or other craft for the carrying of goods, and there is nothing in the Act anywhere giving the court of the company a power to interfere with the owner or master of the tug in managing his steamboat as he may think fit. The framers of the bye-laws have taken a very extravagant view of their powers of legislation, for they have not hesitated to enact in bye-law 98 that if any person shall act as master, or in command of, or assist in the management of, any steam or sailing boat or vessel whose voyage shall commence or terminate within the limits of the Act, until licensed by the court in the way provided by the Act, he shall be liable to a penalty. According to this bye-law, no person can use the waterway of the Thames, a highway from time immemorial, for any purpose if it be begun or ended within the limits in question, for any purpose of pleasure, trade, or business, without putting a licensed waterman or lighterman in command. I am not surprised that we were told that no attempt had been made to enforce the bye-law; but it affords a key to a good deal that would otherwise be startling in the bye-laws. We have no doubt therefore that the bye-law in question is radically bad. Were it even within the general scope of the powers to make bye-laws it would be in the highest degree unreasonable upon another ground. There is no exemption from the penalty, whatever be the circumstances under which the failure to take a waterman on board the tug occurs. There may be none available, or the one available may demand an exorbitant sum; the penalty attaches notwithstanding, and the saving provision which in the Act was made applicable to a case under section 66, and exempted the owner, if the lighterman could not be got for an ordinary wage, is wanting in the bye-law. But our objection goes far deeper, and could not be removed by any mere modification of this bye-law. It only remains to say a word or two about two cases which were pressed upon us by Mr. Ashton in the course of argument, in which certainly everything that ingenuity could suggest was urged on behalf of the case of his client. In Elmore v. Hunter it was held that where six barges were being towed by a tug, and there were only four lightermen in charge, section 66 of the Act was violated, for the reason that the barges were being "worked or navigated" notwithstanding that they were being towed. It is very difficult to see how any court could possibly have come to any other conclusion. What we have stated is the decision, and the whole of it, and it seems to us to have no bearing whatever upon the validity of bye-law 60, or any other that we know of. In Rolles v. Newell a prosecution was instituted under bye-law 59 of the Watermen's Company, which says that if any person when in charge of and navigating any steamboat on the Thames shall at the same time tow more than six barges exceeding ten tons each attached thereto, he shall incur a penalty. The person prosecuted had been in charge of a steamboat towing thirty-one such barges into a dock communicating with the Thames. The court held that under the circumstances of the case, to which it is not necessary further to allude, he had not in so doing been navigating the River Thames, and quashed a conviction that had taken place. The decision certainly has not the slightest bearing upon the present question, but Lord Coleridge speaks of the bye-law as in itself reasonable and useful. There had been no question raised as to its validity, and no reference to the powers under which the bye-law was made, and, therefore, there is no expression of judicial opinion that the bye-law was within these powers. It is perhaps unnecessary to express any opinion upon that question. Bye-law 59 is clearly of a very different character from bye-law 60. There is nothing on the face of it unreasonable, and it may be a useful regulation in the interests of public safety, which would be good enough if made by the authority of persons having power to legislate in that behalf. Bye-law 60, on the other hand, would seem to subserve no purpose except to find work, or at all events pay, for watermen. But we confess that, except in the very general words of the preamble, with which we have already dealt, we can find nothing in the Act from beginning to end to which bye-law 59 can be considered as ancillary.

Lord HERSCHELL.—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division affirming an order of the Recorder of Plymouth on a case stated by him.

The question in dispute is whether Matilda Small, or Manley, a pauper lunatic, was settled in the appellants' union. She was born at Plymouth, in that union, and had never gained a settlement of her own. Her mother, Eliza Manley, a single woman, who also had gained no settlement of her own, was born within the respondents' union. It appeared at the hearing before the recorder that Eliza Manley was the legiti-mate daughter of Henry and Matilda Manley, and that Henry Manley was born of English parents, and that he had lived with his father from boyhood at Bridport. The learned recorder states that he held, "if I could rightly do so, and if it is material," that Henry Manley had a settlement, though he did not make the necessary inquiries to ascertain what that settlement was, and that his daughter Eliza derived that settlement from him. And he adjudged and ordered that the pauper was settled in the appellants' union, that being the place where she was born, as he was of opinion that it could not be ascertained what settlement the pauper derived from Eliza Manley, her mother, without inquiring into Eliza Manley's derivative settlement.

The question in controversy turns upon the construction of section 35 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61. That section, after enacting that no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or widowed mother up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken till it shall acquire another; and further, that an illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until it acquires another settlement, provides as follows: "If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or, being a female, shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born."

It is contended for the appellants that the provision I have just quoted is inapplicable to the present case, and that the pauper is not to be deemed settled in the parish in which she was born, but in the place of the birth settlement of her mother. It was conceded that the birth settlement of the mother was only her primâ facie settlement, or, as it was put, that it would be displaced if she had a higher settlement such as one derived from her father; but it was argued that until it was shown what the settlement of the father was, and therefore what the settlement she derived from him was, the enactment did not apply.

I concur with the courts below in thinking that this argument is not well founded; in my opinion it would defeat the very object which the enactment had in view. This plainly was to prevent the expense which was often incurred by parishes and unions through prolonged and elaborate inquiries into derivative settlements. It was thought that it would on the whole prove more beneficial to poor law authorities to lay down the artificial rule that where an inquiry into a derivative settlement would otherwise be involved, the place of birth of the pauper should be taken to be the place of settlement. If in order to bring the clause into operation it is necessary to proceed with the inquiry to the extent of ascertaining what the derivative settlement is, I cannot conceive why the place so ascertained should not have been treated as the place of settlement, and why another and wholly artificial place of settlement should have been substituted for it. I think the very purpose of the enactment was to preclude any such inquiry, and the language employed seems to me conclusive against the interpretation sought to be put upon it. The words are not without "ascertaining," but without "inquiring into" the derivative settlement of such a parent. As soon, then, as it appeared that the pauper's mother was the legitimate offspring of an English father, I think the case was brought within the enactment I am considering, and the learned recorder was right in declining to proceed with the inquiry into the settlement of the father, and in adjudging the pauper settled in the parish in which she was born.

It may well be that where nothing is known of the circumstance beyond the birth settlement of the pauper's parent, this is to be adjudged the place of the child's settlement, but that is a different case from the one with which your lordships have now to deal. Although there may be dicta in some of the authorities cited not altogether consistent with the conclusion at which I have arrived, I do not think it conflicts with any decision.

Lord MACNAGHTEN. — It seems to me that the learned recorder was right. I see no reason to alter or modify the opinion I expressed, perhaps unnecessarily, in the case of the Reigate Union Guardians, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465. It appears to me that where there is an independent inquiry into the settlement of a child, if you find that the settlement of the parent of the child was a derivative settlement, you are not to pursue the inquiry any further. The child is to be deemed to be settled in the place of its birth. The Act prohibits all derivative settlements except in two specified cases. It could hardly have meant that in a case not falling within either of those exceptions the expense of an inquiry into a derivative settlement has to be incurred for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion which must be set aside as soon as it is reached. What the Act, I think, means is this, the door must be opened wide enough to see where the path beyond is leading to. If it is found that it leads in the forbidden direction, the door is to be shut at once, and the rule prescribed in the Act is to be applied.

The Lord Chancellor (Earl of HALSBURY), Lord MORRIS, and Lord SHAND concurred.

ROBINSON & CO. (LIMITED) v. HEUER. (a.)

H., the confidential clerk of R. & Co. covenanted that he would not, during his engagement, carry on or be engaged, directly or indirectly, in any trade or business of a similar nature to that of R. & Co., or any other business whatever, on pain of instant dismissal and forfeiture of salary.

of H.'s engagement, was not unreasonable, and ought to be enforced by injunction.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from North, J.

By an agreement dated the 8th of February, 1895, Hermann Wilhelm Heuer entered the service of the plaintiffs as their confidential clerk for a term of five years as from the 1st of January, 1895, renewable at the option of the plaintiffs for a further term of five years. The plaintiffs were at liberty to discharge Heuer on giving him three months' notice, and without such notice Heuer was to remain in their employ for the term of five years or for the further term of five years, at the plaintiffs' option.

By clause 6 of the agreement Heuer agreed that he would not during his engagement enter into any business, either directly or indirectly, relating to goods of any description sold or manufactured by the plaintiffs, or into any other business whatever, under penalty of instant dismissal. Heuer further covenanted that if he should be dismissed from the plaintiffs' service, either during the first five years or the further period of five years of his service, he would not engage during the next ensuing three years in any business of a similar nature to that of the plaintiffs within 150 miles of Wolverhampton.

The plaintiffs carried on the business of hollow-ware merchants in Wolverhampton.

In 1898 Heuer, on the failure of certain negotiations between himself and the plaintiffs, left the plaintiffs' service and entered the service of a rival firm, calling upon the customers of the plaintiffs and soliciting orders from them on behalf of the rival firm. The plaintiffs then brought an action and moved for an interlocutory injunction to restrain Heuer until the trial from carrying on as principal, agent, servant, or otherwise, any trade, business, or calling relating to enamelled hollow-ware goods or other goods of any description sold or manufactured by the plaintiffs, or from travelling for or soliciting orders for any persons other than the plaintiffs in breach of the agreement.

North, J., following Ehrmann v. Bartholomew, 46 W. R. 509, [1898] 1 Ch. 671, refused the motion.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Micklem, for the appellants.—We treat the engagement as still subsisting. The defendant has not been dismissed, and our liability for his salary still continues. He cannot escape from his employment by absenting himself. We merely want to restrain his engagement in any competing business. The covenant in the agreement is severable—Rogers v. Maddocks, [1892] 3 Ch. 346, 41 W. R. Dig. 207—and we do not want to enforce a contract of personal service; the injunction we ask for is limited to a particular business and a definite time. We are willing to terminate the service forthwith, and take an injunction, limited to three years, in the terms of the second half of clause 6.

Everitt, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the respondent.—We cannot accept the plaintiffs' offer. The defendant may be liable in damages, but an injunction cannot be granted. If the covenant in the agreement is severable, then the first part of it is void, as it is far too wide. But the covenant is not severable, and is unreasonable: Ward v. Byrne, 5 M. & W. 548.

Eady, Q.C., in reply.—We are willing to take an injunction in the limited form suggested, and will undertake not to renew the service for a further period of five years. He referred to National Provincial Bank of England v. Marshall, 37 W. R. 183, 40 Ch. D. 112.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In this case we have been very much embarrassed by the peculiar form of the agreement, and by the course taken by both sides; but the result at which I have arrived is this—that the justice of the case really requires that some injunction should go. This defendant is certainly breaking his agreement, and is doing that which he has no business to do; and the question is whether he should be at liberty to do so or whether he is to be restrained. Now, the agreement is a very peculiar one. The plaintiffs are a company who carry on business in enamelled hollow-ware and as general merchants, and they took into their employ the defendant as their confidential clerk. That is a very serious matter. That opens to him all the secrets of their trade. The service is to commence from the 1st of January, 1895, and last for a term of five years from the above date, "except as hereinafter mentioned," which refers to powers of dismissal which I will deal with presently, with the option on the part of the plaintiffs of renewing the engagement for the further term of five years, so that, so far as this clause goes, they can convert this period of service into a period of ten years at their option. I pass over the rest till we come to the sixth clause, which is his agreement not to carry on business. That clause is composed of three parts, the first two of which are material. The first is that the defendant shall not during this engagement, without the previous consent of the plaintiffs, "carry on or be engaged, either directly or indirectly, as principal, agent, servant, or otherwise, in any trade, business, or calling, either relating to goods of any description sold or manufactured by the said William Robinson & Co. (Limited), their successors and assigns, or in any other business whatever, upon pain of instant dismissal and forfeiture of salary previously earned and unpaid"; and the first question is whether that clause, limited as it is by the words "during this engagement," is invalid in point of law or not. Now, to my mind, there is absolutely no authority whatever to show that that is an illegal agreement—that is to say, that it is unreasonable and goes further than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiffs. It is confined to "during the engagement," and that means simply this—so long as you are in our employ you shall not work for anybody else, or engage in any other business. There is nothing unreasonable in that at all. But when we consider the advisability of granting an injunction to enforce it, there is great difficulty. The real difficulty which has always to be borne in mind when specific performance or injunctions to enforce agreements involving personal service are in question, is this—that this court never will enforce an agreement by which one person undertakes to be the slave of another; and if this covenant were enforced in its terms it would compel the defendant personally to serve the plaintiffs for the period of ten years. That we never do; that is past praying for. Therefore an injunction in these terms cannot be granted, although the agreement is valid in point of law. But the plaintiffs do not ask for an injunction in the terms of this clause. They say, "We do not want you to compel him to serve us; all we want you to do is to hold him to so much of his bargain as relates to his competing with us"; and the plaintiffs ask for an injunction to restrain him from engaging, directly or indirectly, and so on, in any trade, business, or calling relating to goods of the description sold or manufactured by the plaintiffs. That is a totally different thing. That does not sin against the principle to which I have alluded. Even that may be a little hard, if it were for ten years, under the peculiar circumstances with which we have to deal; but the appellants have undertaken not to exercise the option of prolonging the first period of five years, and that, to my mind, gets rid of that difficulty.

Now, the next clause is important. This, be it observed, gives the plaintiffs liberty to dismiss the defendant if he commits any breach of this agreement. It provides that if during the period of five years, or the extended period, at the option of the plaintiffs, the defendant shall be dismissed, he shall not at any time within three years from the time of such dismissal, directly or indirectly, engage or be engaged either as principal, agent, or otherwise, in carrying on the business of an enamelled hollow-ware dealer at any place within 150 miles of Wolverhampton. That is a distinct agreement; there is nothing there about any other trade or business; and, to my mind, if the plaintiffs had taken the course of dismissing the defendant, and he had by his conduct done that which he has done, an injunction in the terms of the second clause would be almost a matter of course. But, however, there has been this cross-quarrel; the plaintiffs for reasons of their own, which I do not propose at present to go into, decline to dismiss the defendant. I see why, because they have launched their case on the other theory; they can dismiss him if they like, and that is what has been weighing on my mind so long—namely, whether we ought not to say, "You have your remedy in your own hands; if you choose to dismiss him, you will get an injunction." Counsel for the defendant say they will not accept anything of the sort, and that there is no evidence before the court that he threatens and intends to do what he should not. As a technical answer, I do not see how to get over that; as a practical business answer, I do not see that there is anything in it; but the fact is, that here there is a person who is in a position to do the most grievous injury to the plaintiffs in direct violation of his bargain, which is good in point of law, and which is enforceable within limits; and, to my mind, he ought to be restrained in the terms of the first paragraph of the sixth clause, leaving out, of course, the second part of the clause. It must be put in this form: The plaintiffs, by their counsel, undertaking not to exercise the option of extending the term conferred upon them by clause 2, we grant an injunction to restrain the defendant in the words of the sixth clause of the agreement "during this engagement," leaving out "or any other business." The costs ought to be the costs of the plaintiffs in any event both here and below. I think it is a gross and deliberate breach of a plain bargain.

CHITTY, L.J.—The relation of the plaintiffs to the defendant at the present time is that of master and servant. The defendant is the confidential clerk of the plaintiffs, and by the agreement he has bound himself to serve for a period of five years, with the option on the part of the plaintiffs and no correlative option on his part to continue the engagement if they think fit for a further period of five years. The appellants have given up that second period of five years as part of the terms on which the court grants the injunction. Under the fifth clause the defendant agrees during the term to devote the whole of his time, care, and attention to the business of the plaintiffs, and to obey their orders, and so forth; and then, to supplement that, and to support it by a definite negative agreement, we have the sixth clause. That clause is divided into several parts. We are concerned with two parts. The first is, that during the engagement, without the consent of the plaintiffs, he will not be, directly or indirectly, engaged in the particular business or in any other business. Now, it appears to me on the authorities that that, during his engagement, is a valid contract in point of law. It is not necessary to speak about the term "or any other business." As at present advised I see no objection to it; and the case seems to me to fall within the authority of Pilkington v. Scott, 15 M. & W. 657, and Hartley v. Cummings, 5 C. B. 247. The agreement, then, is during the engagement; and the strange thing is the contest the parties have carried on before the motion was made by the plaintiffs before North, J. The defendant said that he had dismissed himself, or had been dismissed; the plaintiffs said, "No, you have not; and what is more, we will not dismiss you"; and so the matter comes on before the Court of Appeal, the plaintiffs contending that the engagement is still on foot; and I think the result is that the engagement is still a continuing engagement, and the plaintiffs, therefore, are right. Now, the point in the case in the defendant's favour appears to me to be this: There are at the end of the clause relating to the continuance of the engagement the words "upon pain of instant dismissal and forfeiture of salary." I quite agree that where penalties are affixed to a contract the court can grant an injunction, notwithstanding the penalties; and that those words are not sufficient, as a general rule, to prevent the court granting an injunction. The materiality of them in the present case is this, that the plaintiffs had it in their hands to dismiss the defendant at once, and thereupon the defendant would have become subject to the less onerous covenant which appears in the latter part of the same clause. But the appellants proposed that they should give an undertaking to dismiss at once, and take the injunction in the more limited form. Counsel for the defendant stood upon their rights, and said, "There is no evidence that our client threatens or intends to break the covenant"; and technically they are right, because he has not at the present moment been dismissed, and that covenant only comes into operation upon dismissal. It might perhaps have been wise for the defendant to have accepted the olive-branch that was offered by the appellants, who were content to take an injunction in the less severe form. But now, coming back to the case upon the first part of the clause, here is a plain deliberate breach by the confidential clerk of the plaintiffs, who is now directly engaged in the particular business for other persons, rivals in trade of the plaintiffs; and in fact we have the case of a confidential clerk acting in deliberate violation not only of his agreement, but of his general relation of confidence towards his employers. That is a very strong case. The appellants did not ask for an injunction which would run exactly in the terms of this covenant in the first part of the sixth clause—they were willing to give up "or in any other business"; therefore I need not consider that part of the case beyond saying this, that in my opinion the covenant is clearly severable. We are not upon the question of whether this covenant is good or bad in law, but whether in this case the court ought to grant an injunction; and the difficulty that for a long time presented itself to my mind was whether we should not, by means of the injunction, be compelling the defendant in substance to serve the plaintiffs. Now, the great objection has been removed by what the appellants have undertaken to do. They have undertaken, in substance, to reduce this term of the engagement to a period of two years or so from the present time; and I think not only that it is reasonable, but I think justice requires that this confidential clerk should not in violation of his agreement go about betraying his masters. Therefore I see no objection to granting the limited injunction which is asked for at the bar, and which the Master of the Rolls has stated.

COLLINS, L.J.—My view has been so exactly stated in the judgments that have been delivered that I should be afraid of detracting from what has been already said if I made any observations of my own.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court on an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894.

1. By a deed dated the 19th day of October, 1885, and made between Henry (3rd) Earl Grey (since deceased), of the one part, and the defendant, then Albert Henry George Grey, Esq., of the other part, reciting that the said Henry Earl Grey was absolutely seised of or entitled to considerable family estates and to other estates and real property purchased or acquired by him in the county of Northumberland, but that a portion of the said estates was subject to several life annuities (which annuities amounted in the whole to £3,100 a year, but four of which, amounting together to £900 a year, have since ceased to be payable), and reciting that another portion of the said estates was subject to a mortgage for £200,000, and reciting that the said Earl Grey was also possessed of considerable personal estate comprising rents then already due and arrears of rent and the furniture and effects in and about the mansion-house in which the earl then resided at Howick, and farming stock, crops, and other effects, and reciting that the defendant Albert Henry George Grey was the nephew of the said Earl Grey and heir-presumptive to the peerage and that the said Earl Grey was desirous of giving his real and personal estate to the said A. H. G. Grey subject to the provisions therein contained and that it had been agreed between the parties thereto that the deed now in statement should be executed. It was by the now stating deed witnessed that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the natural love and affection which the said Earl Grey bore to his said nephew, and for the other considerations therein appearing, the said third Earl Grey did thereby convey to the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey, all those the manors, messuages, farms, lands, rent-charges, and other the hereditaments and real estate whatsoever and wheresoever of him the said third Earl Grey and all leaseholds and terms of years (if any) belonging to him to hold the same to the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey in fee simple, subject nevertheless as to the parts of the property charged therewith or affected thereby to the payment of the said annuities and to the mortgages affecting the same to the use that the third Earl Grey should thenceforth during his life receive an annual rent-charge of £4,000 to be issuing out of the said hereditaments (other than such part as the third Earl Grey was to occupy and enjoy under the trusts thereinafter declared). And to be paid quarterly as therein mentioned and subject to and charged with the said rent-charge all the hereditaments thereby conveyed were to be held to the use of the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey in fee simple; but as to the said mansion-house at Howick and the premises to be enjoyed therewith subject to the trusts and provisions thereinafter contained and as to the leaseholds or terms of years (if any) for the whole term or interest of the earl therein. And it was also witnessed that in further pursuance of the said and for the considerations aforesaid, the third Earl Grey did thereby assign unto the said A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey all rents then already due and all arrears of rent owing in respect of the said real estate or any part thereof, and also all furniture and effects in or about the said mansion-house and premises at Howick, and all stock, crops, and effects and other the personal property of the said third Earl Grey other than money belonging to him at his bankers or elsewhere, and private papers and correspondence, his wardrobe, ornaments, and effects in his own personal, use, to hold the premises thereby assigned to the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey as to the parts thereof affected by the trusts thereinafter declared upon the trusts, and subject to the provisions thereinafter contained concerning the same, and subject thereto as to the whole of the premises thereinbefore assigned to the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey absolutely for his own use and benefit, and it was by the deed now in statement declared that the mansion-house at Howick, together with the pleasure-gardens, and kitchen and fruit-gardens, stables, vineries, greenhouses, out-buildings, and appurtenances as then occupied and enjoyed by the third Earl Grey, should be held upon trust to permit him to occupy and enjoy the same as theretofore during his life, and that all the furniture, plate, books, pictures, and articles of household use or ornament, wines, stores, garden implements, horses, carriages, and other things whatsoever in or about the mansion-house and premises should be held upon trust to permit the said Earl Grey to use and enjoy the same in like manner during his life, and the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey covenanted with the said third Earl Grey that he (the defendant), his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, would do the following things—that is to say: (1) Pay the annuities mentioned in the first schedule thereto and all other annuities (if any) charged on any part of the property or payable by the said third Earl Grey as the same should respectively become due and so long as the same should respectively be payable. (2) Pay the said mortgage debt of £200,000 and all interest then or thereafter to become due thereon, and also every other mortgage debt and other charge to which any part of the property was subject, also a bond for £1,000 payable to the Hon. George Grey with all interest due and to become due thereon, and would perform all covenants, and discharge all liabilities, binding on the said third Earl Grey in respect of any property thereby assured, and indemnify the earl and his estate from all loss and damage in respect thereof. (3) Pay to the said third Earl Grey the said annual rent-charge of £4,000, and a proportionate part to the day of his death to his executors or administrators. (4) At the cost of the defendant, his executors, administrators, or assigns keep the mansion-house and building at Howick insured for the amount in which they were then insured, and expend all money received on any insurance in restoration, repairs, or rebuilding, and keep in repair, and properly uphold and maintain, the said mansion-house, buildings, gardens, and effects to be enjoyed by the said third Earl Grey as aforesaid, and also stock and manage the said gardens as the same had theretofore been managed, and at the request in writing of the said third Earl Grey or of his agent forthwith do and make any repairs in any of the premises so to be enjoyed which the said Earl or his agent might desire to have made or done. (5) At the like cost supply and deliver to the said third Earl Grey (free of cost to him) all such farm or garden produce as he or his agent might require for the use and consumption of the household at Howick. (6) Pay at the death of the said Earl Grey all his funeral and testamentary expenses including all stamp and other duties and also all the debts of the said Earl to the full exhaustion of all the property real and personal of the said third Earl Grey. (7) The lands at or near Howick then farmed by the said Earl Grey should not be sold or disposed of or let during the life of the said third Earl Grey, but should be farmed by the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey personally, in like manner as the same had theretofore been farmed by the third Earl Grey, and no buildings should be erected and no works should be established thereon without the consent in writing of the said third Earl Grey. (8) At the request of the said earl, his executors or administrators, to produce all receipts and vouchers for payments to be made under clauses 1, 2, 4, or 6 of the now stating covenant. And it was provided that in the event of the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey, dying in the lifetime of the said third earl or of any breach by the defendant, his heirs, executors, or administrators, of any covenant on his part therein contained, and failure to remedy such breach within thirty days after notice in writing so to do it should be lawful for the said third Earl Grey to revoke the deed now in statement either wholly or in part, but save in the event aforesaid the deed now in statement was to be irrevocable, but any revocation under that power was to be without prejudice to the title of any purchaser or mortgage from the defendant, his heirs, executors, or administrators, under a sale or mortgage made previously to such revocation.

2. By an indenture, dated the 26th of September, 1894, and made between the said Henry third Earl Grey, of the one part, and the defendant A. H. G. (now Earl) Grey, of the other part, reciting that the indenture now in statement was supplemental to the indenture of the 19th of October, 1885, hereinbefore stated, that the rent-charge of £4,000 had been duly paid and the covenants contained in the indenture of the 19th of October, 1885, on the part of the defendant had been duly performed, and reciting that the third Earl Grey in consideration of £5,000 to be paid to him by the defendant had agreed to sell and release to him the said rent-charge of £4,000, and also to release the covenant to pay the same, and also to release the covenant to retain unsold and to farm the lands near Howick mentioned in the principal indenture. It was witnessed that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the sum of £5,000 upon the execution of the indenture now in statement paid to the said third Earl Grey by the defendant, the said third Earl Grey as beneficial owner thereby conveyed and released unto the defendant all the said rent-charge of £4,000 to the intent that the lands and hereditament charged therewith might thenceforth be discharged therefrom; and in further pursuance of the said agreement and for the consideration aforesaid the said third Earl Grey released unto the defendant all the premises conveyed by the principal indenture from the power of revocation contained in the said indenture, and also released the said A. H. G. Grey from the covenant to pay the said rent-charge of £4,000, and from all claims under the covenant by the defendant contained in the principal indenture to retain unsold and to farm certain lands near Howick.

3. The said third Earl Grey died on the 9th day of October, 1894, and thereupon his nephew, the defendant, succeeded to the earldom. The average net annual income of the property comprised in the said deed of the 19th of October, 1885, after deducting interest on incumbrances and other charges and the cost of management, is and was before as well as after the date of the last-mentioned indenture very considerably in excess of £4,000.

4. Under the circumstances aforesaid estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, had been claimed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue from the defendant on the principal value (less the value of the encumbrances subsisting thereon) of the whole of the property comprised in the said deed of the 19th of October, 1885 (including the mansion-house at Howick and the effects therein, upon which alone such duty has been actually paid by the defendant on the 20th of March, 1895), as being property passing on the death of the said third Earl Grey within the meaning of sections 1 and 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, which incorporates the provisions of section 38 of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 12 as amended by section 11 (1) of 52 Vict. c. 7. But the defendant had refused and still refuses to pay such estate duty (save as to the mansion-house and effects) and he contends that no such duty has become payable. Moreover, the value of the bulk of the property comprised in the said deed of the 19th of October, 1885, was not taken into account in determining the amount of estate duty paid by the defendant on the mansion-house at Howick and accordingly further duty is payable thereon.

The Crown thereupon claimed: (1) That it should be declared that upon the death of the said Henry third Earl Grey estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value to be ascertained as in the said Act provided of all the property real and personal comprised in the said deed of the 19th of October, 1885, as property passing on the death of the said Henry third Earl Grey within the meaning of sections 1 and 2 (1) (c) of the last-mentioned Act, and having regard to section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889.

The Divisional Court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.) decided in favour of the Crown.

From this decision the defendant now appealed.

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, sub-section 2 it is provided that "the personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions—viz.: (a) any property taken as a donatio mortis causâ made by any person dying on or after the 1st of June, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise, which shall not have been bonâ fide made three months before the death of the deceased. (c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property."

By section 11, sub-section 1, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), the aforesaid sub-section 2 is amended as follows: "The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word 'twelve' were substituted for the word 'three' therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift whenever made, of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

By section 2, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30) it is provided that "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include . . . (c) Property which would be required . . . to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Bremner, for the appellant.—The duty has already been paid in respect of the mansion-house, so that point is not in dispute. The question which arises here is whether estate duty is payable in respect of the rest of the estate. This estate, minus the mansion-house, does not come within section 2, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894. The appellant was given an estate subject to the payment of £4,000 per annum to the third earl, and this estate the appellant retained within the meaning of section 11, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1889 "to the entire exclusion of the donor." The power of revocation was a limited and conditional one, and the contingencies on which it would have been exercised never arose. There was here no absolute right to reclaim the property reserved to the donor, such as is referred to in section 38, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1881. The power there is a general one. In the present case it is a limited one. The appellant assumed bonâ fide possession and enjoyment within the requirement of the section. This was not a gift but a purchase for full value, and therefore the twelve months' period does not apply.

They cited Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99; Attorney-General v. Beech, 46 W. R. 44, [1897] 2 Q. B. 535.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Sir R. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins with him), appeared for the Crown.—This case is clearly within the language of section 38, sub-section 2 (a), of the Act of 1881 as amended by the Act of 1889. It is also within section 38, sub-section 2 (c), of the Act of 1881. If there be any disposition whereby the donor retains any interest or benefit the donee does not escape liability on the death of the donor. If property has been disposed of, and out of that property any benefit is reserved to the donor, such property is not intended to be exempt from taxation. Section 11, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1889 puts this beyond dispute. The only means of evading the tax is to assume absolute and immediate possession and enjoyment of the estate. In the present case, however, that condition was not fulfilled. The reservation is within the very words of section 38, sub-section 2 (c), of the Act of 1881. The third earl was in the position of being able to contract debts which would have to be satisfied out of the estates of the appellant. This was a most important reservation. There were powers of revocation in the deed which might easily have been exercised.

Bremner replied.

On the 10th of August the following written judgments were delivered:

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion the Crown succeeds this case, and the appeal by the present Earl Grey fails. By the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), not only property which passes upon death, but also property which shall be deemed within the meaning of the Act to pass upon death, is made liable to estate duty, and the question is whether the property upon which the Crown claims duty in the case, is property which is deemed to pass within the meaning of the Act upon the death of the late Earl Grey, which took place upon the 9th of October, 1894.

By deed bearing date the 19th of October, 1885, the late earl in consideration of the natural love and affection which he bore to his nephew, the present earl, conveyed to the present earl (the defendant in this information) all his manors, messuages, farms, lands, rent-charges, and other hereditaments and all leaseholds belonging to the late earl in fee simple, to the use that the late earl should during his life receive an annual rent-charge of £4,000 a year issuing out of the hereditaments thereby conveyed, and should be also entitled during his life to occupy and enjoy that part of the hereditaments which consisted of the mansion-house at Howick and its appurtenances, together with the furniture, plate, books, pictures, and articles of household use or ornament, wines, stores, garden implements, horses, carriages, and other things whatsoever in or about the said mansion-house and premises. By the deed the present earl covenanted with the late earl to pay certain annuities and mortgage and bond debts and to idemnify the late earl and his estate from all loss and damage in respect thereof, and to pay the late earl the annual rent-charge of £4,000 per annum, and at the death of the late earl to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, including all stamp and other duties, and also the debts of the late earl to the full exhaustion of all property real and personal of the late earl.

By this deed it was provided that in the event of the present earl dying in the lifetime of the late earl, or by any breach by the present earl of any of the covenants on his part therein contained, it should be lawful for the late earl to revoke the said deed either wholly or in part, but save as aforesaid the said deed was to be irrevocable, and it was stipulated that any revocation under the powers was to be without prejudice to the title of any purchaser or mortgagee from the present earl under sale or mortgage made previously to such revocation. The above is a sufficient statement of the deed to raise the point which I have in hand; it will be found set out at length in the information in this case. By an indenture made on the 26th of September, 1894, between the late and present earl, the late earl, two weeks before his death—which occurred, as I have said, upon the 9th of October, 1894—in consideration of £5,000 paid him by the present earl, released unto the present earl the rent-charge of £4,000 a year, as also the power of revocation contained in the indenture of the 19th of October, 1885, and, as I understand, the late earl remained in possession of the mansion-house and its amenities as by the deed of the 19th of October, 1885, is provided, until his death.

The question is, whether the property contained in the indenture of the 19th of October, 1885, was property which is deemed to pass upon the death of the late earl within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, so as to be liable to estate duty. That brings me to section 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894. By it property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include "(c) property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 [44 & 45 Vict. c. 12] as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 [52 & 53 Vict. c. 7], as if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom." In The Attorney-General v. Beech, 46 W. R. 435 [1898] 2 Q. B. 147, I commented upon this class of legislation, and I have nothing further to say thereon.

Now, what is it that the 38th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, as amended by the Finance Act, 1894, has enacted? Section 38 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, must for the present purpose be read as follows: "Any real, personal, or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions—namely, (a) Any property . . . taken under a disposition . . . made by a person dying after the 1st of August, 1894, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos . . . which shall not have been bonâ fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased"—the clause does not apply to the present case—"or property taken under any gift whenever made"—this means whether made within or without twelve months before death—"of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise." In my judgment the meaning of the section is, that if there be a gift, no matter when made, of property inter vivos, then the property must be included in an account and therefore liable to estate duty unless the donee has bonâ fide assumed possession and enjoyment of the property immediately upon the gift, and has thenceforward retained the possession and enjoyment thereof to the entire exclusion of the donor, or if he has taken and retained the possession to the entire exclusion of the donor, then that this possession and enjoyment has been without any benefit by contract or otherwise to the donor. To escape estate duty both these events must concur. This being my opinion as to the true construction of section 38 (1) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881 as it now stands incorporated into section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, how upon the facts of the case can it be said that the present earl, the donee, has either bonâ fide assumed possession of the estate immediately upon the gift, or has thenceforward retained "the possession and enjoyment of the property contained in the deed of the 19th of October, 1885, to the entire exclusion" of the late earl, the donor, or that he has done so without any benefit by contract or otherwise accruing to the donor, the late earl? That the present earl, the donee, has contracted with the late earl, the donor, to pay him £4,000 a year as well as to bear the other liabilities of the late earl as appears by the deed of the 19th of October, 1885, for the benefit of the late earl, cannot be disputed, and whichever limb of the sub-section be taken, in my judgment the case comes within it, and therefore falls within the definition of property deemed to pass within section 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894, and consequently is liable to estate duty.

It was argued by the Crown that the case also falls within sub-section (c) of section 38 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881, and that under that sub-section the property was chargeable with estate duty as being property which was deemed to pass within section 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894. This may well be so, but as in my opinion section 30 (1) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881 is fatal to the appellant, the present earl, it is unnecessary in this case to give a judgment as to the meaning of sub-section (c), and therefore I say nothing about it. In my judgment the Crown succeeds, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—The grant and assignment made by the third earl to the present earl by the deed of the 19th of October, 1885, was subject, first, as to all the hereditaments, other than such parts as the third earl would occupy and enjoy under the trusts thereinafter declared, to an annual rent-charge issuing thereout of £4,000; secondly, as to the hereditaments not charged with the £4,000 a year, and the personal property connected therewith, to a beneficial interest in the third earl; thirdly, to a covenant by the present earl to pay at the death of the third earl all the funeral and testamentary expenses and also the debts of the third earl to the full exhaustion of all the property real and personal of the third earl; fourthly, to a conditional power of revocation by the third earl.

It is plain, in my judgment, that under the abovementioned heads, benefits were secured to the third earl which made it impossible for the donee to assume or thenceforward retain the subject-matter of the gift to the entire exclusion of the third earl, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise. The benefits under heads 1 and 2 are so plain as to require no further notice. Under head 3 it would have been open to the third earl by the mere process of incurring debts and spending the sums borrowed, or by borrowing for the purpose of settling the sums borrowed and actually settling them in favour of other persons, to make the present earl liable to the full amount of the benefit taken by him under the deed. This would clearly be a benefit to the third earl, arising, at any rate, by contract, if not by way of charge upon the property granted and assigned. Although the power of revocation is not absolute, it cannot be doubted that the possibility of its being exercised was also a benefit to the third earl, not so great as if the power were unconditional, but which might be measured by the extent to which it derogated from the value to the present earl of the property granted and assigned, which would be very considerable. From the execution of the deed of 1885 down to the 26th of September, 1894, there was no moment of time in which the property for the time being subject to the deed of 1885 was held by the donee to the exclusion of any benefit to the third earl. The deed of the 26th of September, 1894, only varied this state of things by releasing the benefits arising under heads 1 and 4, leaving those under heads 2 and 3 in full force. I do not see how it would be possible to avoid the conclusion that the whole subject-matter of the gift, so far as it existed at the death of the third earl, would have been liable to be included in an account under section 38 of the Act of 1881, sub-section (a), amended as in the Act mentioned. It does not seem to me to be necessary to determine whether in the present case sub-section (c) of section 38 of the Act of 1881, amended as mentioned in the Finance Act, is or is not applicable. The result is that all property granted or assigned by the deed of 1885, and existing at the death of the third earl, is to be deemed to have passed on his death, and therefore to be liable to estate duty.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a case of some difficulty. There are several grounds upon which the Crown contends that the property in question is liable to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, as property passing on the death of a deceased. By the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, sub-section 1, "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include . . . (c) property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom."

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, sub-section 2: "The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions." I need not read it at length; it may be taken as having been read. Sub-section (a) relates to donatio mortis causâ, and (c) says, "Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property." Then by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, sub-section 1, "Sub-section 2 of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, is hereby amended as follows." Then (a), the amendment clause—I need not read the early part of it—concludes, "and the said description of the property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

Now, it is argued on behalf of the Crown that the property in question is liable to estate duty, first, as being property passed under a voluntary settlement whereby an interest in such property for life or some other period terminable by reference to death is reserved expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor has reserved to himself the right to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property; secondly, it is argued that the property is liable to estate duty as being property taken under a gift, whenever made, of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment has not been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise.

Now, with regard to the first ground the difficulty suggested on behalf of the appellant is that the property has not passed under a voluntary settlement within the meaning of clause (c) of sub-section 1 of section 2 of the Finance Act of 1894—that is to say, that the instrument passing the property on the death of the late Earl Grey is not a voluntary settlement within the meaning of section 38 of the Act of 1881 as a section enacted by reference in the Finance Act, 1894, and controlled by the definition in section 22 of the Finance Act, 1894.

Now, with regard to the second ground the difficulty suggested by the appellant is this, that the donee did "immediately upon the gift and thenceforward" assume possession and enjoyment of the whole of the property included in the gift to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him, because the annual rent-charge of £4,000 a year is not part of the property included in the gift; but an estate prior to and overriding the gift, and, because the covenant by the donee to pay all the debts of the donor to the full exhaustion of the real and personal property, is not an admission of the donor to any possession or enjoyment of the property included in the gift or of any benefit to him, the donor therein, and because that covenant by the donee does not amount to the admission of the donor to the enjoyment of the property or to any benefit thereout and certainly does not amount to a charge thereon in favour of the late earl.

These difficulties are serious. It may be that they can be got over when the meaning of the words in the Finance Act is properly construed—indeed, I am going to a certain extent so to hold—but in my judgment you have no right in the construction of that Act to say, as I understand the counsel for the Crown to invite us to do, that in a particular case property is subject to estate duty although such property does not fall within the words of the Act imposing the duty if construed literally, because the whole gist and scope of the Act leads to the inference that it is impossible that property of the character in question should have been intended by the Legislature to be excluded from liability to the duty imposed by the statute, and you have no right to refuse to give effect to a definition in the Finance Act on the ground that the context requires that a different meaning should be given to the words the subject of the definition from that contained in the definition, if the only ground for refusing to give to the word the meaning according to the definition is that so to do would be to defeat what appears to be the general intention of the Act of Parliament. I will say no more on this point because I do not mean to decide it, but I prefer to base my judgment on the gift of property in the present case falling within the later words of sub-section 1 of section 11 of the Act of 1889. Now, even apart from the rent-charge the decision in Crossman v. Reg., 35 W. R. 303, 18 Q. B. D. 256, shows that the covenant for the payment by the donee of the donor's debts would be a reservation of an interest within the meaning of section 38 of the Act of 1881, because it was held in that case that the covenant of the donee to pay the donor for his life interest at 4 per cent. on the capital value of the personalty transferred by the gift was the reservation of an interest within the meaning of section 38, and it seems to me that the fact that the covenant to pay the donor's debts is not an interest or benefit determinable on death does not prevent the decision in Crossman's case applying to show that the covenant to pay the donor's debts is the reservation of an interest, although not an interest determinable on death, and as such negatives the exclusion of the vendor from any benefit in the property the subject of the gift, and I therefore concur in the judgment of the court below on the ground that in this case there was a gift of the property within the meaning of the section of the Act of 1889, and that the donee was not intended to, and did not in fact, assume possession and enjoyment to the total exclusion of benefit to the donor. Such an interest is totally different from the prior estate created by the use in respect of the rent-charge, and I mention this because I am inclined to agree with the appellant that the rent-charge must be treated as something entirely outside the gift.

PARR'S BANKING CO. v. YATES. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Guarantee—Banking account—Principal advanced six years before action—Interest accrued within six years—Appropriation of payments on account.

The defendant gave a guarantee to the plaintiff bank, whereby, in consideration of the bank making advances to one of their customers, the defendant undertook to guarantee the payment of all moneys from time to time owing to the bank in account with the customer, with interest, commission, and other banking charges. The customer's account was made up every half-year, the amount which had become due for interest, commission, and banking charges during each half-year being added to the principal and carried forward to the next half-year. The bank made advances to the customer during four years. More than six years after the last advance, the bank brought an action on the guarantee. The customer had from time to time made payments on account down to a short time before action brought.

Held, that the bank's claim under the guarantee in respect of the advances was barred by the Statute of Limitations; but that they were entitled to recover in respect of interest, commission, and banking charges which had become due within six years before action.

Held, also, that the rule by which payments on account are appropriated to interest before principal did not apply to such a banking account as that in question.

Appeal from the judgment of Bruce, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover £1,000 upon a guarantee given by the defendant to the plaintiff bank to secure the current account of Duncan McLaren, who carried on business as D. McLaren & Co.

The guarantee was dated the 7th of February, 1887, and was as follows: "In consideration of your agreeing at my request to come under advances or liabilities to or for D. McLaren & Co. (the guaranteed party) in account current with you on condition that I should give this guarantee, I undertake to guarantee to you the due payment and satisfaction of all moneys and liabilities that may have been or may from time to time be owing to or incurred by you in account with the guaranteed party, with interest, commission, and other banking charges; and this shall be a continuing guarantee and shall not be withdrawn except at the expiration of six calendar months from the day of written notice being given by me to you for that purpose; but the amount ultimately recoverable hereunder shall not exceed £1,000 with interest thereon from the day on which the same shall be demanded from me until paid . . . and any settled or stated account by and between you and the guaranteed party or admitted by the latter shall from time to time be and be received in any court or under any circumstances whatsoever as conclusive and indisputable evidence against me of the balance or amount thereby appearing due from the guaranteed party to you."

Between the 8th of February, 1887, and the 3rd of December, 1890, the bank made advances to McLaren from time to time and debited his account therewith, and McLaren from time to time made payments which were put to his credit, but the account always showed a balance due from him to the bank. The account was made up every half-year, the amount which had become due for interest, commission, and bank charges during each half-year being added to the principal and carried forward to the next half-year.

On the 31st of December, 1890, the balance due to the bank was £3,247 14s. 5d. After that date the bank made no further advance, but the account continued to be debited each half-year with the amount which had become due for interest, commission, and bank charges. McLaren continued from time to time to make payments on account down to March, 1897, and on the 30th of June, 1897, the balance due from him was £1,979 1s. 6d.

The action was commenced on the 3rd of September, 1897. The defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

At the trial Bruce, J., found as a fact that there had been an account stated between the bank and McLaren in 1895, which took the case out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations, and on that ground he gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and W. F. K. Taylor, Q.C. (Tobin with them), for the defendant.—There was no account stated in this case. The plaintiffs' claim, as regards the advances, is barred by the Statute of Limitations, for their cause of action as to each advance arose when that advance was made: Reeves v. Butcher, 39 W. R. 626, [1891] 2 Q. B. 509. Interest being accessory to principal, their claim as regards interest is also barred. Moreover, the interest must be taken to have been paid by McLaren's payments on account; for it is a general rule that payments on account are to be appropriated to interest before principal: Lindley on Partnership, 6th ed., 235.

Carver, Q.C. (Horridge with him), for the plaintiffs.—The Statute of Limitations does not apply, for this is a continuing guarantee. At anyrate the plaintiffs can recover in respect of interest, commission, and charges which have accrued due within six years. The rule as to the appropriation of payments on account to interest is not applicable to a banking account such as that in the present case.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—On the facts I cannot agree with the finding of Bruce, J., that there was an account stated between the bank and McLaren in 1895. I must, therefore, deal with the other points which have been raised on this appeal. I am of opinion that as all the advances by the bank to McLaren were made before the 31st December, 1890, the claim of the bank as regards those advances is barred by the Statute of Limitations. But the guarantee was given not only in respect of the advances, but also in respect of interest, commission, and other banking charges. Interest, commission, and other banking charges have accrued due within six years before the action was brought; and inasmuch as they are guaranteed, I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such interest, commission, and banking charges as have accrued due within the six years. In my opinion the rule as to the appropriation of payments on account to interest before principal does not apply to the case of a banking account in which the amount which becomes due for interest every half-year is added to the capital and carried forward to the balance of the next half-year. I therefore think that the judgment of Bruce, J., must be varied.

RIGBY, L. J.—I agree in thinking that there was no account stated. I also agree that so far as regards the principal sums advanced the plaintiffs' claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations. For those sums became due, and the bank's right of action against the guarantor in respect of them arose, more than six years before the writ. I do not think that the words "continuing guarantee" mean that the guarantor is to remain liable for all advances made to the principal debtor as long as the principal debtor remains liable. With regard to interest the question is not so easy, but I am of opinion that the true construction of the document is that the guarantor is not merely to be liable for interest as accessory to the principal, but that he is to be liable for all sums due on the account whether they consist of principal or interest. The plaintiffs' claim, therefore, is not barred as to interest which became due within six years of the writ. I also agree that the rule as to appropriation does not apply to a case like the present.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L. J.—I am of the same opinion The plaintiffs' cause of action as to each particular item in the account, whether of advance, interest, or otherwise, arose when that item became due, and the Statute of Limitations ran from that time. I therefor agree that their claim, so far as advances are concerned, is barred. I also agree on the other points.

WADE v. WADE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Settled property—Fund charged with specific sum—Residue—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 14, sub-section 1.

A settlor assigned a policy of assurance for £5,000 on his own life to the trustees of his marriage settlement upon trust to raise out of the policy-moneys the sum of £4,000, to be held on the trusts therein mentioned, and upon further trust as to the residue of such moneys for the settlor's executors. The policy had been sold, and the proceeds of sale were now represented by a fund in court. The settlor died in 1898.

Held, that sub-section 1 of section 14 of the Finance Act, 1894, was intended as a protection to the person paying the estate duty, not as a provision for the incidence of that duty; and that the estate duty on the fund must be borne by the part remaining after payment of the £4,000.

Petition.

In this case there was a fund in court to the credit of the present action consisting of a sum of £4,496 2s. 3d. consols and £29 17s. 7d. cash. This fund represented the proceeds of sale of a policy of assurance for £5,000 on the life of Robert Craven Wade, who had by one of two settlements, both dated the 11th of August, 1858, and made upon his second marriage, assigned such policy to the trustees thereof upon trust to raise out of the policy-moneys a sum of £4,000 to be held by them upon the trusts in favour of the wife and children of the marriage declared and contained in the other settlement of even date therewith, and the surplus moneys were thereby directed to be held in trust for the settlor's personal representatives.

By a subsequent deed of the 7th of July, 1864, R. C. Wade purported to assign to the trustees thereof the said policy for the purpose of making up the portions of all his children to the sum therein specified.

The present action had been commenced for obtaining the execution of the trusts of the indenture of the 11th of August, 1858, so far as they related to the policy. In pursuance of various orders in the action the policy had been sold and the proceeds paid into court, invested in consols, and accumulated during the life of R. C. Wade.

R. C. Wade died on the 6th of April, 1898. The trust fund was liable to pay duty upon his death.

This petition was presented by the present trustees of the settlement of the 11th of August, 1858, and by the wife and children interested thereunder, and prayed—(1) that the costs of all parties might be taxed by the taxing-master as between solicitor and client; (2) that the £4,496 2s. 3d. consols might be sold; (3) that out of the moneys to arise by such sale and the £29 17s. 7d. cash on deposit the said costs might be paid, and the amount of the estate duty payable on the death of R. C. Wade might upon the requisition of the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue be transferred to the account of the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue at the bank; (4) that out of the residue of the moneys to arise by such sale £4,000 might be paid to the present trustees of the indentures of the 11th of August, 1858; (5) that the residue of the moneys to arise by such sale might be paid to the present trustees of the indenture of the Warrington, Q.C., and G. B. Hamilton, for the petitioners.

Medd, for the respondents.—By section 14 of the Finance Act, 1894, the estate duty must be borne rateably and not paid primarily out of the residue of the fund: In re Countess of Orford, 44 W. R. 383, [1896] 1 Ch. 257; In re Shaw, 43 W. R. 315, [1895] 1 Ch. 343. The prayer of the petition is not right.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that section 14 of the Finance Act, 1894, is not intended to provide for the incidence of estate duty, but is intended to protect the executor or other person who, as between himself and the reversioner, is called upon to pay the duty, and, having paid it, looks to be recouped by virtue of the provisions of that section. He may not be entitled to get it without taking some further legal proceedings against the person who has to bear his share of the duty. The Act does not say that contracts are to be interfered with in any way; it leaves them to the usual laws of construction and legal principles. It seems to me therefore here that the settlor provided a sum of £4,000 to be set apart for certain purposes in priority to the persons entitled to the residue. The trustees were to receive the policy-moneys on condition that they were to take £4,000, and the rest was to go in a different way. The intention of the deed of the 11th of August, 1858, would be altogether defeated if the trustees therefore took the £4,000 less duty. No doubt it was quite competent for the Legislature to impose the liability for the duty upon the £4,000 as well as upon the residue, but the question is whether the Legislature has said so. In my opinion there is no doubt that the duty must be paid in a lump sum, and I think that the prayer of the petition with respect to the £4,000 is right.

Summons.

This was an application for the opinion of the court upon questions of construction arising in the administration of the estate of the late George Hodgson.

The testator, by his will of May, 1895, after giving specific and pecuniary legacies and an annuity of £1,000 to his wife and disposing of the assets and goodwill of his business of a machine-maker at Bradford between his sons John and George, and, "subject to the option hereinafter given to my said sons successively in real and personal property belonging to me in the county of Lincoln," devised and bequeathed all the real and personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever of or to which he should die possessed or entitled or have power to dispose of as follows: Two equal seventh shares to his said son John, two other equal seventh shares thereof to his said son George, and the remaining three equal seventh shares thereof to his three daughters in equal shares. The testator then directed and declared that his said son John should have the option of acquiring at the sum of £185,000, and as part of his said two seventh shares, "all that my manor of Nocton with the freehold messuage known as Nocton Hall and with the grounds and outbuildings thereto belonging and the lands held with the same, commonly known as 'The Nocton Hall Estate,' all situate in the county of Lincoln, and all other my real estate in the county of Lincoln," with the furniture, pictures, and chattels therein at the time of his death, such option to be exercised in writing within three months of the testator's death. A similar option was then given to the second son George in the event of John's refusal of this gift; and on such option being exercised, then he devised and bequeathed the said hereditaments and premises in the county of Lincoln, and the said chattels in Nocton Hall aforesaid, to the son so having exercised the said option as aforesaid, subject to his accounting for the sum of £185,000, the value of the said premises, as part of his two seventh shares, but such son was not to be called upon to pay that amount, but should be merely debited with the same in ascertaining his share.

The testator died in June, 1895, and the son John duly exercised the option given him to acquire the Nocton Hall estate and the chattels at £185,000.

In 1890 the testator had purchased the perpetual rights of patronage and presentation of and to the vicarages of Nocton and Dunston, at the same time and under the same contract that he purchased the Nocton Hall estate, which contained 7,287 acres and the manors of Nocton and Dunston, and all these hereditaments were conveyed to him by one deed, dated the 24th of January, 1890. The testator subsequently purchased small portions of real estate adjoining or mixed up with these estates, and the whole was known as the Nocton Hall estate. The advowsons were not appendant to the manors of Nocton and Dunston. Both churches were in the county and diocese of Lincoln, and were practically surrounded by the Nocton Hall estates.

One of the questions decided by the court was that the wording of the will, as stated above, coupled with the exercise of the option by John Hodgson, amounted to a specific devise and bequest to him of the manors of Nocton and Dunston and the Nocton Hall estates and the chattels in Nocton Hall. The question was then argued whether the advowsons of Nocton and Dunston also passed to him under this devise.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, J.—This is an extremely doubtful point, in my opinion, but the conclusion I come to is, that these advowsons ought to be held to pass by this devise. The words in the will "all other my real estate in the county of Lincoln," like the words "hereditaments situate in the parish of Doncaster" in the case of Crompton v. Jarratt, are both expressions which might include advowsons, though I agree they are not apt words to include them. I refer to what was said by Cotton, L.J., in the report of that case at 30 Ch. D. p. 316, and to the observations of Bowen, L.J., at ib., p. 318. In Crompton v. Jarratt, the court, looking at the deed as a whole including the recitals, came to the conclusion that the words "hereditaments situate in the parish of Doncaster," though they might include the advowson in question in that action, did not pass it on the true construction of the deed of resettlement. They came to this conclusion looking at the deed as a whole, and considered that in that particular deed the words I have just mentioned ought not to be held to include the advowson.

Now, bearing that case in mind, I approach this will, and I think that I am entitled to consider these circumstances. It appears that this testator bought this property in 1890; it was a large estate, and he bought it as a whole, including the advowsons in question, and he held the estate, including the advowsons, as one estate up to the time of his death. The advowsons relate to two churches which are both surrounded by the estate, or, if I may use the expression, are situated on the estate. One church is within the park and close to the hall, the other is some little distance away. Now, looking at this will, am I not entitled to say here that the testator's intention was to put his son in his position as the owner of the estate as a whole? I think he did intend that; I cannot help thinking that the testator never contemplated that these two advowsons should be held separate and apart from the rest of this property; I think he intended his eldest son to hold this property as one as he himself has held it; and, indeed, I am not sure if the words "all other my real estate in the county of Lincoln" do not refer to these advowsons, to what they could refer. It does appear that after the date of his will, and after the date of the original purchase of the Nocton estates and these advowsons, the testator bought some four acres of land which were practically surrounded by this estate and added those acres to his property, but it appears to me that those acres would have passed under the earlier description in the will, "lands held with the same commonly known as the Nocton Hall estate," and would not have required those additional words which have been so much commented upon to pass them; so that if those words do not cover the advowsons it is difficult to say to what they could have applied.

But I do not rely so much upon that as I do upon the general tenor of this will construed, as I am entitled to construe it, with reference to the surrounding circumstances. I think that there is sufficient to enable me to say, in this case, being the case of a will with that general expression "all other my real estate in the county of Lincoln," that these words, though not apt words for the purpose, yet being such words as might pass them, do, in this particular case before me, pass these advowsons to the eldest son John; and I so hold.

CRAWFORD v. THE CITY OF LONDON ELECTRIC LIGHTING CO. (a.)

Electric light—Inspector—Fees and reasonable expenses—Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 15) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. ccxxxix.), s. 14.

Section 47 of the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 15) Act, 1890, provides that all fees and reasonable expenses of an inspector shall, in the absence of any agreement, be paid by the undertakers. There is a proviso by which such fees and expenses are chargeable to the consumer in the event of any default or negligence being shown against him.

Held, that the "fees and reasonable expenses" referred to in the first part of the section are limited to such fees and expenses as would be chargeable against the consumer under the proviso, and that, accordingly, the salary of the inspector, the expenses of an electrical laboratory, the wages of assistants, and the cost of the instruments, furniture, and fittings of the laboratory are not chargeable against the undertakers.

Case stated by an alderman of the city of London under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

The Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 15) Act, 1890, was enacted to confirm certain provisional orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to the city of London.

Section 35 provides as follows: "The local authority, so long as they are not themselves the undertakers for the purposes of this order, may from time to time appoint and keep appointed one or more competent and impartial person or persons to be electric inspectors under this order.

"If no electric inspector is appointed by the local authority, or if the inspection of electric lines and works is imperfectly attended to by the local authority, or if the local authority themselves become the undertakers for the purposes of this order, the Board of Trade, on the application of any consumer, or of the undertakers, may from time to time appoint and keep appointed one or more competent and impartial person or persons to be electric inspectors under this order.

"The duties of an electric inspector shall be as follows: (a) The inspection and testing, periodically and in special cases, of the undertakers' electric lines and works and the supply of energy given by them; (b) the certifying and examination of meters; and (c) such other duties in relation to the undertaking as may be required of him under the provisions of this order or of any regulations under this order.

"The local authority, with the approval of the Board of Trade, or the Board of Trade, if the inspector is appointed by them, may from time to time prescribe the manner in which and times at which any such duties are to be performed by an electric inspector, and also the fees to be taken by him, and such fees shall be accounted for and applied as may be directed by the local authority or the Board of Trade, as the case may be."

Section 36 is as follows: "The local authority may pay to any electric inspector appointed by them under this order such reasonable remuneration (if any) as they may from time to time determine, and such remuneration may be in addition to, or in substitution for, any fees directed to be paid to electric inspectors in respect of their duties under this order or any regulations of the Board of Trade made in pursuance of this order or the principal Act, according as the local authority shall so determine."

Section 47 is as follows: "Save as otherwise provided by this order, or by regulations under this order, all fees and reasonable expenses of an electric inspector shall, unless agreed, be ascertained by a court of summary jurisdiction or (where the inspector is appointed by them) by the Board of Trade, and shall, in the absence of any agreement, be paid by the undertakers.

"Provided that where the report of an electric inspector, or the decision of the Board of Trade, shows that any consumer was guilty of any default or negligence, such fees and expenses shall, on being ascertained as above mentioned, be paid by such consumer or consumers as the court or board, having regard to such report or decision, shall direct, and may be recovered summarily as a civil debt. . . ."

An application was made by the appellants on behalf of the corporation of the city of London to the alderman sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction to ascertain the amount of fees and reasonable expenses of an electric inspector. The statement of expenses included the rent of an electrical laboratory, the gas, electricity, cleaning, coals, and insurance of the same, the wages of two assistants, the depreciation on the value of instruments, furniture, fittings, &c., and the salary of the electric inspector. The whole amounted to £1,226 2s. 7d. From this was deducted £84 fees received by the electric inspector from the respondents, making the total sum claimed £1,142 2s. 7d. The expenses were spread over a period of upwards of two years.

The inspector was appointed by the corporation at a salary of £250 a year. Two-thirds of his time was given to the work of inspection and the remainder to other duties connected with the corporation. All fees received by him were accounted for to the corporation.

The alderman held that the items of the account over and above the £84, admitted fees, could not be properly included in the expression "fees and reasonable expenses of an electric inspector" within the meaning of section 47. He found, further, that if the court should be of opinion that the other items could be included, they were reasonable, except the salary of the electric inspector, which he reduced by one-third.

Rose Innes, for the appellant.—The duty of the alderman is ministerial. He had no right to adjudicate whether or no the expenses were payable. His duty was merely to say whether the expenses were reasonable in themselves. The expenses referred to in section 47 are such expenses as are reasonably incidental to the office of inspector.

Roskill, for the respondents.—The expenses and charges claimed are not the "fees and reasonable expenses of an electric inspector" within section 47. The proviso shows what these fees and expenses are, for, by virtue of the proviso, in certain eventualities the consumer is to pay "such fees and expenses." How is it possible to say that the expenses of the laboratory, &c., can be apportioned so that a consumer shall pay it in the event of his making a default? The expenses intended are, no doubt, hotel expenses and cab fares incurred in the course of a particular inspection.

DAY, J.—I am inclined to think there is no ground for disturbing the decision of the alderman. At the same time, as the case is of importance, I shall be happy to facilitate any appeal if it is within our power to give a right of appeal.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. I think that when you come to look at the whole of section 47 it becomes necessary to consider what expenses can reasonably be put upon the consumer. If it were not for the second paragraph, which says that the expenses may be put upon the consumer who is in default, it might be more difficult to read and to give a proper definition of the words "all fees and reasonable expenses" in the first paragraph of section 47; but when you follow that up and find that in case the consumer is in default the fees and expenses are to be paid by him, I do not think it possible to say that such expenses as are included in the list which the alderman has disallowed are expenses which could be charged on the consumer. It seems to me that the fees and expenses intended by the section are the fees and expenses connected with the inquiry or the testing of meters, wires, &c., which are upon the consumer's premises in respect of which the consumer may have been guilty of a default. There is no default of which a consumer could have been guilty which has any bearing on the expenses which the alderman has had to deal with. I think the decision of the alderman was right.

Appeal dismissed.

BENFORD v. SIMS. (a.)

Animal—Cruelty—Summary conviction—"Cause" act of cruelty—"Knowingly advise and counsel" commission of offence—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 5—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 2.

By section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, a person who shall counsel the commission any offence which is punishable on summary conviction shall be liable to be proceeded against and convicted, either together with the principal offender or before or after his conviction.

Therefore a person who knowingly counsels the owner of a horse to perpetrate an act of cruelty upon the animal may be convicted upon an information under section 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, for causing to be cruelly ill-treated the horse, although his advice to the owner was the remote, and not the proximate, cause of suffering to the animal, and no proceedings had been instituted against the owner.

Case stated by T. W. Lewis, Esq., a stipendiary magistrate for the county borough of Cardiff.

An information was laid by the appellant, Frederick Benford, under section 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, against the respondent, Hugh Sims, a veterinary surgeon of Cardiff, for that he in December last did unlawfully cruelly ill-treat a horse by causing it to be overworked while in an unfit state.

The charge was heard by the learned magistrate on the 24th of January and dismissed, but on the application of the present appellant, he stated a case for the opinion of the High Court.

It appeared that early in 1897, Alfred Hunt, a coal merchant, who was the owner of the animal in question, consulted the respondent with reference to its lameness. Mr. Sims examined the animal, and advised that she should be turned out to grass for the summer. And this was accordingly done.

(a. Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In November, Hunt asked the respondent again to see the mare, and he then gave a written certificate, dated the 18th of November, 1897, in the following terms: "I have this day examined a bay mare, 'Kit,' the property of Mr. A. Hunt, and find the said mare to be renewing her hoof on the near fore foot. Nevertheless, the mare is free from pain and quite fit for her work.—(Signed) HUGH SIMS, M.R.C.V.S." The mare was then very lame. Having obtained the certificate, Hunt proceeded to work the mare from then until the 13th of December, when she was stopped by the appellant, an inspector for the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The mare was then in charge of a driver, and was drawing a load weighing 34cwt. She was very lame on the near fore foot, which was deformed and extensively diseased, and was evidently in great pain.

On the following day she was examined by two veterinary surgeons, who stated she was suffering from laminitis, or fever in the feet, of long standing, and that even light work would cause her great pain, on the 18th of November, when the certificate was given. The appellant thereupon interviewed the respondent, who said: "The mare is suffering from navicular disease, and is growing a new hoof. She is better at work than standing in the stable or turned out to grass. She is in the same condition now as when I gave the certificate in November. She is working under my directions, and I accept full responsibility." The respondent pleaded not guilty and called witnesses.

The magistrate found as facts (1) that working the mare on the 13th of December was an act of cruelty; (2) that the act of cruelty was knowingly perpetrated by the driver, and knowingly caused to be perpetrated by the owner; (3) that the owner was a person in a position of authority to direct the driver to work the mare; (4) that the respondent was not a person in a position of authority to direct the owner to cause the mare to be worked; (5) that the respondent knowingly counselled the owner to cause the act of cruelty to be perpetrated; and (6) that the owner was in some degree influenced by such counsel to cause the act of cruelty to be perpetrated.

The magistrate dismissed the information, being of opinion that the act of cruelty proceeded from the exercise of the authority of the owner of the animal upon the driver in sending him to work the mare and so inflicting pain; that the respondent exercised no power, influence, or authority over the driver; that the advice or opinion of the respondent to the owner need not have caused him to work the animal; that, although his advice in some degree influenced the owner to work the mare, such advice was the remote cause of the cruelty in some degree, and not the approximate cause in any degree, and therefore not the "cause of cruelty" within the meaning of the statute, and that the respondent was charged with the offence committed by the owner, and not charged with the offence disclosed by the facts—namely, knowingly counselling an act of cruelty to be caused.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in acquitting the respondent of the offence charged.

Colam, for the appellant.—The decision in this appeal is one of great importance to the society because magistrates will not convict, if the owner of a horse, who is summoned for working the animal in an unfit state, can put in a veterinary surgeon's certificate that the horse is better at work than standing in the stable. Owners know that this is a fact, and rather than run the risk of a conviction get a certificate first from some small veterinary surgeon. [RIDLEY, J.—A horse may be fit enough to do light work and yet it may be an act of cruelty to make him pull two tons.] As a rule the magistrates will not go into the facts at all. Section 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, makes it an offence to cruelly beat, ill-treat, over-drive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, ill-treated, &c., any animal, and I submit that there is no logical distinction between "cruelly causing or procuring" an act of cruelty to be done, and the words in section 5 of Jervis's Act which are "aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of" any offence. If, as I submit, the words in the Act of 1849 do not limit the offence to the person who is the direct cause of the cruelty, then as Jervis's Act enables an accessory to be proceeded against as a principal the magistrate ought to have convicted the respondent. Wilson v. Stewart, 11 W. R. 640, 3 B. & S. 913, was referred to.

The respondent did not appear.

RIDLEY, J.—I should have been glad if there had been arguments on behalf of the respondent, as they might have assisted us in forming our conclusion; but that not being so, we are compelled to give our decision upon the materials before us. The magistrate has found that the respondent knowingly counselled the owner to cause the act of cruelty to be perpetrated, but that he has not caused the horse to be ill-treated within the meaning of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, for the reason that although the advice of the respondent in some degree influenced the owner to cause the animal to be worked, such advice was the remote cause of the cruelty in some degree, and not the proximate cause of the cruelty in any degree, and therefore not the "cause of the cruelty" within the meaning of the statute. I think it is probably correct to say that the word "cause" used in section 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, is used in a stricter sense than the word "procure" or "counsel" used in section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and that it is proper to inquire whether the person charged has been the immediate cause of the offence being committed; and I think that there is no evidence in the present case on which the magistrate ought to have found that, in that sense, the respondent was the cause of this act of cruelty. It might very well be that the veterinary surgeon in certain cases and on certain facts might be found to have actually caused the act of cruelty to the animal in question, although not the owner of it, and not in a position to order the owner to do anything. But it does not appear to me that such a state of circumstances existed in this instance. The magistrate proceeds to say that as the respondent was charged with the offence committed by the owner, and was not charged with the offence disclosed by the facts, he must be discharged. And the question now arises whether, under section 5 of the Act of 1848, it was not competent for the magistrate to proceed upon this information and upon the facts that he has found, and to convict the respondent.

The magistrate appears to have thought that the information should not have stated the principal offence, but the aiding, abetting, counselling, or procuring the commission of the offence, in order to enable the proceedings to properly result in the conviction of the respondent. In my opinion section 5 of the Act of 1848 ought to be read as meaning that the person who knowingly counsels such offence to be committed is to be proceeded against and convicted for the same either together with the principal offender or before or after his conviction, and may be treated throughout as the principal offender. It is true that in the analogous section in the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94)—namely, section 1, which deals with accessories and abettors, the words used are that the accessory "may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon," whereas in section 2 of the Act of 1848 the words are "liable to be proceeded against," and in order to make the sections precisely analogous the words in the latter section should be "informed against," so as to expressly enact that the form of the information may be the same in the case of an abettor as in that of the principal. But I do not think that that distinction is sufficiently marked to compel us to say that section 5 of the Act of 1848 must be read as meaning that the abettor must, in the preliminary proceedings, be treated in form as a counsellor and abettor, and that he may then be convicted as a principal. The effect would be that in the information the offender must be treated as counselling and abetting the offence, and afterwards be convicted as though he was a principal offender. If the words were clear and certain we should be compelled to say that such was their meaning, but I do not find that that is so. The words are "to be proceeded against," and primâ facie I should be inclined to think that a preliminary proceeding such as the information might be included in those words, although not expressly referred to in the same way as the indictment is in section 1 of the Act of 1848.

It therefore appears to me that the magistrate might have convicted and might have found the respondent guilty under section 5 of the same offence as if he had been a principal offender. The case therefore must go back with an intimation of that opinion to the magistrate, directing him to convict.

CHANNELL, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that if in this case the driver and veterinary surgeon had been charged together with committing this offence they might have been convicted, and the respondent would not have been able to establish a defence by saying that he did not commit the act himself, but only aided and abetted it. If that be so then it follows that the respondent ought to have been convicted. I desire to point out that this decision proceeds on the very special finding in this case, and that there is no ground whatever for supposing that a veterinary surgeon who gives a wrong opinion, and commits an error in judgment, is liable to be convicted of cruelty if the effect of his opinion being followed is that the act of cruelty did in fact result. If in such a case he acted honestly he would not in my opinion be to blame.

Case remitted.

JENKINS & SONS v. COOMBER. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Acceptance—Indorsement by way of security—Subsequent indorsement by drawers—Incomplete bill—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 55, 56.

The plaintiffs agreed with C., who owed them money, to draw a bill on him, and that C.'s father should indorse it as a surety for its payment. They thereupon drew a bill on C. to their own order, and, without indorsing it, handed it to C., who accepted it and then obtained his father's indorsement. He returned it to the plaintiffs, and they then indorsed it beneath the indorsement of C.'s father. The bill was dishonoured at maturity, and the plaintiffs then sued C.'s father as the indorser.

Held, that he was not liable as indorser under section 55 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, nor was he liable under section 56, as the bill was not negotiable at the time he wrote his name on it, as it was irregular and incomplete, owing to the plaintiffs not then having indorsed it.

Held, further, that he was not liable as guarantor, since the requirements of the Statute of Frauds had not been complied with.

Steele v. McKinlay, 29 W. R. 17, 5 App. Cas. 754, is still a binding authority, and the principles therein laid down have not been altered by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the Westminster County Court.

The action was brought by the holders of a bill of exchange against the indorser. The bill was in the following form:

"London, August 5, 1897.

"£57.—Three months after date pay to our order the sum of fifty-seven pounds for value received.

"J. Jenkins & Sons.

"To Mr. A. Coomber.

"Accepted; payable at the London and County Bank.—Arthur Coomber."

Indorsed "Alfred Coomber, J. Jenkins & Sons."

Arthur Coomber, the son of Alfred Coomber, the defendant, owed money to Jenkins & Sons, the plaintiffs, and by an arrangement between him and the plaintiffs the latter drew upon him a bill at three months to their own order, it being agreed that the defendant should indorse the bill to guarantee its payment. The plaintiffs without indorsing the bill gave it to Arthur Coomber, who took it to his father, the defendant, and got him to indorse it. He then returned the bill to the plaintiffs, who afterwards indorsed it.

The bill not being paid at maturity the plaintiffs brought an action against Alfred Coomber as indorser.

The learned county court judge, acting on the authority of Steele v. McKinlay, 29 W. R. 17, 5 App. Cas. 754, gave judgment for the defendant.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

C. L. Attenborough appeared for the appellants.—The decision of the learned county court judge was wrong. Steele v. McKinlay is now no longer an authority since the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882: see the remarks of Lord Herschell in the case of Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers, 39 W. R. 657, [1891] A. C. 107, where at p. 144 he says, "I think the proper course is, in the first instance, to examine the language of the statute, and to ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view." The plaintiffs became holders in due course, and even if they are not so, they are the holders within the definition in section 2. The defendant was an indorser. He put his name on the back of the bill and then completed the endorsement within the meaning of section 2 by delivery to his son.

Abrahams appeared for the respondent.—The question here is not whether the defendant is the indorser, but whether the plaintiffs have a right against him under the circumstances of the case and the order of the indorsements. The defendant merely wrote his name on the back of the bill as a surety for his son. It was not intended that the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, should alter the law merchant under which an indorser is not liable to a drawer who is a prior party to a bill. Further, he cannot be made liable as a guarantor as the Statute of Frauds has not been satisfied in this case. The plaintiffs were not holders in due course as defined in section 29, and the defendant's signature, therefore, did not impose any liability upon him. The bill was never complete and regular on the face of it: Wilkinson v. Unwin, 29 W. R. 458, 7 Q. B. D. 636.

Attenborough in reply.—Steele v. McKinlay is distinguishable from this case, as here it is admitted that it was the intention of the parties that the defendant should be liable, and he ought not to be able to escape that liability merely because the plaintiffs indorsed the bill after instead of before the defendant.

He also cited Holmes v. Darkee, 1 Cab. & Ell. 23.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the county court judge was right. There was no notion of repealing by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the law laid down in Steele v. McKinlay, and I think that that case is still a binding authority. It is clear that section 56, which would give the plaintiffs a right of action against the defendant, has not been satisfied in this case, for this bill was irregular and incomplete. Section 56 provides that a person who signs a bill otherwise than as drawer or acceptor incurs the liabilities of an indorser to a holder in due course. But section 29 says that a "holder in due course" is a holder who has taken a bill complete and regular on the face of it. Section 56 therefore does not apply here. Then it was said the defendant is liable under section 55, sub-section 2, because he indorsed the bill. It is clear that every writing on the back of a bill is not an "indorsement" within the meaning of the Act. The Act does not clearly define what actually constitutes an indorsement, but section 2 says "an indorsement means an indorsement completed by delivery." In Steele v. McKinlay Lord Watson points out the distinction there exists between an indorser of a bill and a person who writes what if he had a right to indorse would be an indorsement on the bill, although he has no right to the contents. And he says that a person who, intending to become a party to a bill, indorses it, should by the law merchant be held as much liable as a proper indorser. The difficulty in Steele v. McKinlay, as in this case, was that, though the person who wrote his name on the back of the bill may have intended to become a party to the bill, nevertheless he never did in fact become so because the bill was not then made complete by the indorsement of the drawer. In the cases cited on behalf of the appellants the bills were complete when the indorsements in question were made, but in the present case the bill was not negotiable as it had not been indorsed by the drawers. The result of those cases is that where there is an agreement between the parties which precludes the notion that the holder is liable to the indorser the holder is not prevented from suing the indorser on the ground of circuity of action. The general principle is examined and laid down in Steele v. McKinlay, and the contract of indemnity is not one which is recognized by the law merchant, but arises solely from an agreement between the parties. As Lord Watson points out in that case, it does not give a primary liability upon the bill as against the defendant. If there is a contract of suretyship it must conform with the requirement of the Statute of Frauds, but the alleged agreement here does not satisfy those requirements. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It has been suggested that Steele v. McKinlay is no longer a binding authority, and that the principles therein laid down have been varied by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. I see nothing to justify that proposition. This bill was irregular according to the law merchant, and as an agreement of suretyship it does not satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds, and therefore it is clear that the defendant is not liable upon it to the plaintiffs.

Appeal dismissed.

Lunacy.

(Lindley, M.R., and Chitty and Collins, L.JJ.) June 14, 1898.

In re THE EARL OF SEFTON. (a.)

Lunatic—Directing committee to accept a devise to lunatic upon condition of resettling other property—Jurisdiction of court—Benefit of lunatic—Pecuniary benefit—Statute Prerogativâ Regis (17 Edw. 2, stat. 1, c. 10)—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5).

The court has jurisdiction to order that the committee of a lunatic shall accept a devise made to the lunatic upon condition of resettling certain other property, and shall execute the resettlement. This jurisdiction arises from the inherent authority of the court, and is not affected by the Statute Prerogativâ Regis or by the Lunacy Act, 1890.

The court, in exercising its jurisdiction, ought to be guided by a consideration of what is for the benefit of the lunatic, but, semble, is not bound to regard only his pecuniary benefit.

Lunacy application.

The Earl of Sefton had become a lunatic in consequence of a serious accident which he sustained, and was not likely to live long. His father, the previous Earl of Sefton, who died in June, 1897, was tenant for life of settled estates producing a net rental of about £30,000 a year, and was also absolute owner of estates producing about £21,000 a year. The present earl had, before he became a lunatic, and before his father's death, barred the entail, but without the consent of his father as the protector of the settlement, and had therefore acquired only a base fee. By his will the late earl gave his settled estates, subject to a term of 1,000 years given to trustees for certain purposes, to the present earl for life, with remainder to his issue in tail male; and then for similar estates to a younger son of the late earl and his issue; with remainders over. The will directed that every person who should thereunder become entitled (subject to the term of 1,000 years) as tenant for life or tenant in tail male by purchase to the possession of the devised estates, and who should also become entitled as tenant in tail male or in tail, whether by purchase or by descent, to the possession of the settled estates should, within one year after becoming so entitled under both the will and the settlement (or, if he was an infant, within a year after attaining twenty-one), disentail the settled estates and re-settle them on the same trusts as the devised estates. If the person so becoming entitled did not do this, the estate devised to him was to cease and determine. The testator also bequeathed a sum of £10,000 to the present earl if he should execute the re-settlement, and directed that in that event the present earl's debts (which were stated to amount to £31,000) should be paid by the executors.

Some of the next-of-kin of the present earl took out a summons asking that the committee might be directed to execute, in the name of the lunatic and on his behalf, a re-settlement in accordance with the testator's will. The master refused the application, which was then made to the Lord Justices in Lunacy. It was opposed by the earl's next younger brother, the Hon. Osbert Mollineux, who would be a loser if it were successful.

Farwell, Q.C., replied

LINDLEY, M.R., said: I do not think we are in a position to do what we should like to do—take a little more time to consider this case. Time presses. If this election is to be made at all, it must be made practically at once; and, having had an opportunity of considering the matter, I have come to a tolerably clear opinion that we have jurisdiction to make this order, and that we ought to exercise that jurisdiction. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] Bearing in mind that under his father's will the present earl gets not only a large estate, but also other benefits—the legacy of £10,000 and the payment of his debts—it is obvious that from one point of view, and that one which the court will take into consideration, it is to his advantage to accept this devise. What, then, ought to be done? If this gentleman is in the least degree likely to live, and is actuated by the feelings by which sons usually are or ought to be actuated, there can be no question that he would, if he could exercise any choice, accept the Sefton estates on the conditions stated in the will. There are obvious family advantages in so doing. I am not at all prepared to say that it is the duty of the court to look only to the question of the lunatic's pecuniary benefit. It is for his benefit to do what his father wished, and to keep the two estates together. It is in this case for his pecuniary interest, because he will get a great deal more money if he accepts the devise. It is for the benefit of the lunatic that he should perform the condition upon which alone he can obtain, or at least can keep, the Sefton estate. I say keep it, rather than get it, because under the will he has got it, and he will lose it if he does not resettle it. Let us look at the matter, first, apart from the Lunacy Act, 1890. I go by steps. Speaking generally, without reference to the Statute De Prerogativâ Regis, I take it that these propositions are elementary and indisputable: first, a lunatic can accept a gift of property, or a bequest or a devise of property; second, a lunatic can accept a gift or legacy upon conditions, provided that the gift and those conditions are for his benefit; thirdly, if a lunatic is entitled to property upon conditions it is the duty of his committee to do all that is necessary to preserve the property by performing the conditions. Authority for the last of these propositions will be found in Collinson's Lunacy, vol. 1., p. 294: "If any part of the estate be liable to forfeiture, or held upon conditions, it is his [the committee's] duty, if possible, to protect it from the forfeiture, to satisfy the conditions, and, when necessary, to apply to the chancellor for directions." All that I take to be perfectly settled law. Now, suppose one of the conditions is that the lunatic shall give up some interest in real property to which he is entitled, the general principle just laid down will apply to that case. There is nothing I know of in the statutory law contrary to that view, except the provision in the old Statute De Prerogativâ. That Act has been construed in such a way as to prevent the court from selling or mortgaging the estates of lunatics for the purpose of raising money, even when the lunatic was in danger of arrest under a ca. sa., or was in prison. That was rather a narrow construction, perhaps. But the language of the Act is important. The purpose of the enactment is that if the lunatic recovers, what is not required for his maintenance will be handed over to him, and if he dies it will go as his property ought to go. In no way is it to be alienated. The courts have held that they had no power to alienate the lunatic's property, even for the lunatic's benefit, the object of the Act being to preserve the property for him or his representatives. But it seems to me that we shall be introducing for the first time a still narrower construction, if we say, under the stress of this Act, which was passed for a totally different purpose, that we are incompetent to sanction giving up a small part of the lunatic's real estate for the purpose of saving for him a far larger part of it. I agree it would not do to say that because we think our predecessors made a mistake we are going to construe the Act differently. But I am not disposed to press a narrow construction beyond what is necessary. It seems to me we should be making a very bad precedent if we were to hold that this statute of Edward 2, passed to preserve the property of lunatics, prevented us doing what is for the advantage of the lunatic, even in relation to property, and also in other ways. If, then, we have jurisdiction in the matter, it seems to me it follows as a matter of course, in these circumstances, without invoking the Act of 1890 at all, that we ought to exercise that jurisdiction.

I will now say a word or two about the Lunacy Act, 1890. It was very strenuously contended by Mr. Farwell that certain sections in that Act authorized the court to make the order here asked for. I think we should be making a bad precedent if we were to say that. We cannot, I think, bring this case within the language of the Act of 1890 without unduly straining that language; and I base my judgment upon the inherent jurisdiction of the court, which is not bounded by the cases enumerated in that Act. With respect to section 124, of which we have heard so much, and which enacts that "the committee of the estate, or such person as the judge approves, shall in the name and on behalf of the lunatic execute and do such assurances and things for giving effect to any order under this Act as the judge directs, and every such assurance and thing shall be valid and effectual, and shall take effect accordingly," I do not invoke that at all. That section, I think, is put in to supply a possible defect or remove a possible doubt. That view does not, however, prevent the court from doing the very same thing under its general jurisdiction. I look upon that section simply as an enabling clause. I cannot help thinking that we should be doing quite wrong were we to give effect to any contention which cuts down the power of the court in this matter.

If the case had not been so pressing I should have liked to look at some authorities, to make sure that I have not made any mistake. As to the principles upon which I have proceeded I do not feel the slightest doubt. I think this application ought to be granted.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion upon the question whether to grant this application would be for the benefit of the lunatic. I have no hesitation in stating my conclusion that it will be for his benefit. I think we ought not in these cases simply to take a narrow view of pecuniary benefit, but ought to act for the lunatic as he, if a person of sound mind, would probably act for himself. He would be guided, as a reasonable man, by a desire to comply, if possible, with his father's wishes. But I am satisfied that even in a merely pecuniary sense it is for his benefit. If he accepts the devise and complies with the conditions he will get a legacy of £10,000, and his debts, to the amount of £31,000, will be paid. The lunatic has a base fee under a settlement, in an entailed estate, which will endure as long as there is issue male of his body. The Sefton estates are stated to be of about equal value with those devised to the lunatic by his father's will. Now, that will imposes upon him the condition that he shall resettle the lands in which he has this base fee, so as to make those lands follow the limitations of the estate settled by the father's will. Those limitations are usual, ordinary, and proper. Now, the lunatic cannot in any circumstances hold the entire interest which he now has in the Troxteth estate and also take the estate limited to him under the will. The case is therefore not simply one of aliening the lunatic's estate, but rather of giving him the largest measure of benefit he can in the circumstances obtain in real estate.

This short statement now brings me to the Statute De Prerogativâ. I premise that I have no hesitation in saying that a lunatic can accept a devise if it be for his benefit; and that the question whether it is for his benefit is for this court, which has been entrusted with the custody of lunatics, to determine. The object of the Statute De Prerogativâ seems to have been to preserve the estate for the benefit of the lunatic, and to prevent it being wasted. That has been construed as a prohibition against alienation, as one method of dealing with lands which would not be for the benefit of the lunatic. I think a somewhat narrow construction was put upon that statute when it was held that lands could not be aliened by way of sale, or in other cases where it might be plainly for the benefit of the lunatic that such an alienation should take place. But the law is settled by the older decisions. I think, however, that those decisions do not drive us to the extreme length contended for. It is quite consistent with the language of the statute, that in order to keep the greater, better, and more valuable part of the property to which the lunatic is entitled there should be jurisdiction in the King, and in this court, which has been entrusted with the custody of lunatics, to throw away the worse and less valuable part. These constitu e the short grounds on which I think that, quite apart from the Lunacy Act, 1890, we have in these circumstances jurisdiction to elect, for the benefit of the lunatic, that he shall take under the devise and comply with the conditions it imposes.

I will add one word about the Act of 1890. There is no advantage in going through all the various clauses to which we have been referred under Part IV. I state the sum of my opinion when I say that none of those clauses apply to this particular case. At the same time I think these specific provisions have not cut down the general jurisdiction of this court. As to section 124, that does not in terms refer to such a case as this, but is an enabling section. It does not cut down the right of this court, where it has the jurisdiction, to give effect to that jurisdiction by directing that the proper conveyances should be executed. I do not think, although I have referred to it during the argument, that it is necessary to pursue, in any detail, the question of the working of the jurisdiction in cases where it is simply equity that insists upon a man who takes under a will observing some condition of the gift. Here there is a condition at law.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot doubt that if the lunatic were now in possession of his senses he would regard it as for his benefit, and moreover as a duty, to make the election. The court has now to make that election for him. It is only by taking the narrowest view of the meaning of "benefit" that the order asked for can be said not to be for his benefit. Indeed, assuming that there is no possibility of his recovery, it can in no sense be said that it is not for his benefit. I am quite satisfied that in making the order we are acting for the benefit of the lunatic. Having listened carefully to the argument on the Act of 1890, I was not satisfied that under that Act we had power, without unduly straining its words, to do what is here asked. But on the large question of the jurisdiction under the Statute Prerogativâ Regis, I have not myself been able to entertain any doubt that were we to refuse this application we should be defeating the purpose of that Act. The obvious purpose of the Act is to preserve for the lunatic his lands and tenements, so that they may be handed back to him on his recovery, or properly disposed of after his death. I can imagine that, on a narrow construction of the Act Prerogativâ Regis, alienation even for payment of the lunatic's debts might be disallowed. Here the case stands thus. If we do not elect the lunatic must lose some of the property to which he is entitled; if we do he will keep more. That is the only way I can understand the central provision of the Act. Therefore I have had no difficulty about that part of the case.

I rejoice that my brothers, who know so much about the machinery of the Lunacy Acts, have been able to arrive at the conclusion that the order asked for can be made.

Application granted.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, M.R., and Chitty and Collins, L.JJ.) — Aug. 10, 1898.

JOHN v. JOHN. (a.)

Practice—Receiver—Ejectment action—Disputed title—Defendant in receipt of rents—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 8.

The appointment of a receiver in an action pending to recover possession of land is discretionary on the part of the court, and on all such applications the surrounding circumstances must be considered. If on the evidence before the court it is satisfied that the plaintiff has shown a good title, and that the tenants are in jeopardy through the defendant being in possession, a receiver will be appointed.

Appeal of the defendant from North, J.

The plaintiff in the action claimed to be entitled, as tenant in tail male, to real estate in Cornwall under the will of his great-grandfather, George John, who died in 1847. A great-grandson of the testator, George Dennis Trevelyan John, had been in possession or receipt of the rents for forty-two years before his death on the 31st of January, 1898. The plaintiff alleged that G. D. T. John took an equitable estate for life only, and that on his death the property passed to the plaintiff as tenant in tail male.

On the death of G. D. T. John, his mother, the defendant, went into possession and receipt of the rents, claiming that her son had been entitled in fee, and that she was now entitled as his devisee in fee.

The plaintiff moved in the action of ejectment for the appointment of an interim receiver of the rents.

North, J., being of opinion that the plaintiff had shown a clear title, made the order appointing a receiver.

The defendant appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., Macnaghten, Q.C., and Carson, for the appellant.—The court will not appoint a receiver in an ejectment action to the prejudice of a defendant in possession unless there are special circumstances, such as a scramble for possession, as in Foxwell v. Van Grutten, [1897] 1 Ch. 64, 45 W. R. Dig 127; or where the property is being wasted. There are several questions in dispute here, and the plaintiff has not established his title. If an order is made the result will be that in every ejectment action a plaintiff, by moving for the appointment of a receiver, will be able to force a defendant in possession to disclose his title before the trial.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Stock, for the respondent.—Foxwell v. Van Grutten laid it down that the appointment of a receiver in an ejectment action was in every case discretionary. Here it is quite clear that the defendant has no title, and therefore a receiver ought to be appointed.

Haldane, Q.C., in reply, referred to Talbot v. Hope Scott, 6 W. R. 269, 4 K. & J. 96.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that we shall be introducing any revolutionary practice if we affirm the decision of North, J., which I am convinced is right. The only difficulty is occasioned by the decision in Foxwell v. Van Grutten. We must first look at section 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873. Sub-section 8 of that section applies to what are called ejectment actions, such as actions for the recovery of land. Therefore we have to consider in each particular case whether it will be just or convenient to appoint a receiver. In considering each case we must first look at the person who is in possession, and consider how long he has been in possession, and the title by which he holds, if he chooses to disclose it, and then at all the other circumstances which may be material; and in doing this the risk to which the tenants may be exposed of having to pay their rents a second time must not be lost sight of. Whether that point was taken into consideration in Foxwell v. Van Grutten does not appear, but the key to the conclusion at which I have arrived in this case is that I do not believe in the title of the defendant. I do not decide against her, and it may be that at the trial of the action I shall be converted by the arguments of counsel, but at present I do not believe that on the construction of this will the defendant has a title. As I am of that opinion, and I believe in the title of the plaintiff, I think it would be wrong to refuse the appointment of a receiver. Those are the short grounds for dismissing this appeal.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The jurisdiction of the court under section 25, sub-section 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873, is discretionary, and every judge in exercising his discretion must exercise it judicially and not arbitrarily. I think it is "just or convenient," or, as Sir G. Jessel used to read it, "just and convenient," that in the circumstances of this case a receiver should be appointed, and that this conclusion is consistent with the function which the Legislature has cast upon the court in these cases of saying whether the appointment is just or convenient. One element which must not be lost sight of is the position of the tenants. They have not appeared in any way or asked to be protected, but it is apparent that they are exposed to a double claim at this moment. It may be that if any leases have been granted by G. D. T. John, he having held the property in such a manner that he had a leasing power under the statute, the plaintiff would have the right to distrain for rent; so the tenants are in jeopardy. I do not rest my decision on that ground alone; it is only a circumstance which has to be considered. North, J., has looked at the will and come to the conclusion that the defendant cannot make out any title at all. I do not think it is necessary to go so far as that; there may be some learned arguments to be urged at the trial. But as the case stands at present I agree with North, J. These are the two main circumstances which we must take into consideration. Another is that the defendant is not in possession of any mansion-house, and will not be turned out of actual possession. She is only living in furnished rooms, and that shows that she is a person of small means and that the tenants are in jeopardy. Therefore, in my opinion, a receiver ought to be appointed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I was impressed by Mr. Haldane's argument that the exercise of this discretion in cases of ejectment must involve to some extent an interference with a defendant's rights, inasmuch as he is entitled simply to stand on his possession. Therefore his position is a strong one, and it is recognized and safeguarded by the Judicature Act. But the court has a discretion to appoint a receiver in such cases, and I cannot see how we can work the two principles together without one infringing to some extent on the other. The discretion does affect the position of a defendant in an ejectment action. The court has to exercise a discretion, and that must be on the facts, and the right of the court to exercise it will involve a change, and may compel the defendant to give up the advantage she now holds, and may make it necessary for her to disclose to some extent her defence. The plaintiff will go into his own title, and it will be very difficult for the defendant to avoid doing so. That is the logical effect of the discretion given by the Act, and we must accept the conclusion that the Legislature has done that intentionally. We are bound to bear in mind the fact that the Legislature has tried to preserve to a defendant his former position, and the other circumstances on which the court would act, but the essential matter is the view which the court takes as to the probability of the plaintiff's success. We cannot decide it now, but we ought to form an opinion; and if the view we take of the defendant's case is adverse to her, we ought to affirm the conclusion at which we have arrived on the materials before us. Though that conclusion is not final, it is convenient to act on it. That is the governing factor in the question of discretion. If the defendant is thoroughly solvent, and it is likely that the plaintiff will succeed, and that the rents will be recovered from the defendant, that will be one reason for not treating so seriously the position of the tenants. But if the defendant is impecunious and her title is so shadowy that she is not likely to succeed, then the position of the tenants is a very important factor—a factor which does not appear to have been taken into consideration in Foxwell v. Van Grutten. Therefore, having the duty cast on us of exercising our discretion, we are bound to uphold North, J., in interfering for the protection of the tenants and the plaintiff.

In re GRINDEY.
CLEWS v. GRINDEY. (a.)

Trustee — Breach of trust — Debt left outstanding — Liability — Ambiguous will — No application to court — "Acted honestly and reasonably" — Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

The executors and trustees of a will did not call in a debt belonging to their testator, and did not apply to the court for directions. It was doubtful, on the construction of the will, whether the testator had or had not directed them to "maintain" the debt, which was producing 5 per cent. in its existing condition; and they acted on the view that he had. Eventually part of the debt was lost.

Held, that the trustees had acted "honestly and reasonably," both in not calling in the debt, and (its amount being small) in not incurring the expense of an application to the court, and were therefore, under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, entitled to be relieved from personal liability.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

Sampson Grindey, a farmer, by his will dated the 9th of April, 1892, appointed his two sons, Isaac and Sampson, who were farmers, and one Templeman, a bank manager, to be trustees and executors, and proceeded as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath to them all my real and personal estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, hereinafter called my trust estate, upon trust to maintain the same and every part thereof in the like mode of investment as the same shall be at my decease, until my said son Sampson Grindey shall attain the age of twenty-four years; and for this purpose I empower my trustees to carry on my farming and grazing business in the same manner as it has been hitherto carried on by me, and to employ in the said businesses any portion of my said trust estate as they may deem necessary, and without any liability for any loss whatever which they may sustain in doing so." When Sampson Grindey attained twenty-four the trustees were to stand possessed of the whole of the trust estate upon trust as to certain specified parts thereof for the testator's wife during widowhood, and at her death they were to sell and convert the same, and hold it upon the trusts therein declared. The residue was to be equally divided among all the testator's children except Isaac Grindey. The will also contained an investment clause, and a power to the trustees to postpone sale or conversion of any part of the estate so long as they should think fit. The testator died in 1892, and his will was duly proved by the three executors. Sampson Grindey attained twenty-four in 1895. At the time of the testator's death there was due to him from one Thomas Fernihough a sum of £166, secured by a promissory note dated in 1890, payable on demand, and bearing 5 per cent. interest. Interest had been regularly paid during the testator's life, but after his death the trustees never called upon Fernihough to pay either interest or principal. The debtor was agent of the owner of farms on which the testator, and afterwards his two sons, Isaac and Sampson, were tenants. He continued in excellent credit to the end of his life, but after his death in 1894 it was found that his estate had been insolvent since before the testator's death. The greater part of the debt was thus lost.

Two children of the testator, beneficiaries under the will, brought an action against the executors and trustees for the purpose of having them declared liable, on the ground of breach of trust, to make good the loss of principal and interest.

Kekewich, J., held that the trustees had acted honestly and reasonably, within the meaning of section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, in leaving the debt outstanding, and relieved them from liability in respect of the capital, but held them liable to make good the loss of interest.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and J. M. Stone, for the appeal, cited In re Brogden, Billing v. Brogden, 37 W. R. 84, 38 Ch. D. 546; and In re Stuart, Smith v. Stuart, 46 W. R. 41, [1897] 2 Ch. 583.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendants.

Warrington, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This case is not altogether free from difficulty, but I rather think that the conclusion at which the learned judge has arrived is the right one; though I am not prepared to give the same reasons as he did for that decision. I start with the Act of Parliament which governs the case, the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896. Section 3 of that Act was inserted for the benefit and protection of trustees who have committed a breach of trust, but have acted honestly and reasonably. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] The language used, "is or may be personally liable," appears to me to point to doubtful questions of construction. I shall allude to that matter presently.

The facts of this case are simple enough. [His lordship stated them, and proceeded:] The persons beneficially interested now say that the trustees ought to have called in the money within twelve months after the death of the testator, and that as they did not do so they are responsible for the loss, and must make it good. That might have been the trustees' position if it had not been for the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896. They had a curiously-framed will, and it was their duty to carry out the trusts of that will. Looking at the will, I cannot say that a reasonable business man would have been to blame if he had thought that it was no part of his duty to call in this money, at least until one of the legatees required him to do so. I think a business man might fairly come to the conclusion that it was not the intention of the testator that this promissory note should be called in. Now, if that was a reasonable view to take, then, whether it is, absolutely, right or wrong, it appears to me that section 3 does apply, and the case is one in which the court has power to relieve the trustees from liability. The sum at stake is too small for us to say that it would have been right and proper for the trustees to ask the court for directions. This is not like a case in which, a big sum being at stake, you might say that it was unreasonable for the trustees to take such a risk on themselves. In a case like this it is reasonable to save the expense of an application to the court.

The will is very peculiar. There is no specific direction to get in anything: that is left to the ordinary law. [His lordship read the clause above set out, and proceeded:] Now, what does the testator mean by "maintain the same and every part thereof in the like mode of investment as the same shall be at my decease"? How can you apply that to a part of his estate which was not "invested" at all in any proper sense of the word? The language of the clause shows that the testator is using the words in a very loose sense; and it is difficult to ascertain exactly in what sense. I must say I think the testator did not look upon this money as invested; but considering the very loose language of his will, I am not prepared to say that he did not mean to treat it as invested. If we had to make up our minds upon that question, I should find considerable difficulty. But the question we have to decide is simply this: is it a reasonable and proper conclusion to arrive at, that the trustees must have seen from this will that it was their duty to call in this debt? I do not think we can say that it is. Having regard to the loose language of the will, I thing they might reasonably consider that it was no part of their duty to spend money in applying to the court. I think it follows, from the combined effect of the will and of the Act of Parliament, that Kekewich, J., was right in holding that the trustees ought to be relieved from personal liability for the loss of this money. I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The section is not very easy to construe, but in my opinion a narrow construction ought not to be put upon it, having regard to the language used, and of the general object of the enactment, which is plainly to relieve honest trustees who have acted reasonably. "Reasonably" must mean reasonably as trustees. In this particular case the testator has made a will in which he gives no specific directions to his trustees to call in debts. He was carrying on business, and of course had book debts. That was the state of things which existed at his death, and which would be contemplated by him when he made his will. The promissory note, having regard to the whole amount of his property, is for comparatively a small sum of money. This promissory note had, I think, been treated by the testator in his lifetime as an investment; because he had the interest for two years—in fact, a longer period than the trustees retained the security. In respect of that retainer the trustees are now charged with breach of trust. There is no difficulty in which trustees have been oftener entangled than in that of an obscure will. In dealing with this section I think we may properly take into consideration the nature of the will itself, and the difficulty in which it places the trustees. There is a possible construction of this will which I think could reasonably be entertained by ordinary business men; I will not say by men in the position of farmers, because I am not satisfied that the Act is meant to apply to any particular class of trustees, or to their special knowledge or business qualifications. But the opening sentences, in which the testator gives all his property, "whatsoever and wheresoever, . . . upon trust to maintain the same and every part thereof in the like mode of investment as the same shall be at my decease"—I think ordinary business men might reasonably, having regard to what the testator had done, consider that this debt was intended to be part of the estate which is to be maintained in the same condition as it was, until it was necessary to have the money in hand for the purpose of division. Therefore, when I come to the question, what is the effect of the Act, and have to construe the words "acted honestly and reasonably," I think the court is justified in taking into consideration, in deciding whether the trustees have acted reasonably, the fact that the will gives rise to a question of construction, on which I think it unnecessary for the court itself to pronounce a final opinion. The money was laid out in this way by the testator himself, the security was a debt bearing interest; and, on the whole, I think the trustees' view that it ought to be treated as an investment was reasonable.

Then, that being so, I turn back for a moment to the prior question, whether they acted honestly. Mr. Warrington argued that they had not acted "honestly," because they were actuated by motives arising from their own interests. The debtor was agent for two farms of which two of the executors were tenants. But it would be straining language against the trustees to say that they were actuated by any sinister motive. Without pursuing that matter further, I am satisfied that these trustees acted honestly. It is said that they might have obtained the directions of the court as to whether they should or should not call in this debt. The practice of the present day does no doubt enable trustees to apply to the court for its direction or opinion at a comparatively small expense, contrasted with the old method of filing a bill and administering the whole estate; but, even so, something like £50 would have been expended in an inquiry which would have involved considering the position of the debtor and other matters of that class. I have no ground for saying that it was not a proper motive in the trustees to say, in regard to this small matter, that they would not put the trust estate to that expense. Moreover, they were getting 5 per cent on the loan, and they could get only about 3 per cent. on the money if they called it in.

The result is that I think this is a case in which the trustees "ought fairly to be excused," having acted honestly and reasonably, for their breach of trust, and for failing to obtain the direction of the court. I think the decision of Kekewich, J., ought to be affirmed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

In re ALLEN.
BASSET v. ALLEN. (a.)

Administration—Locke-King's Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113) — Republication — Statute of Limitations— Money charged on land—Presumption of payment— Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.

A testator made a will in 1845, leaving real estate on trust for sale, and, after directing payment of his debts, directed that the income should be paid to his widow during her life. By a codicil in 1855 the testator specifically devised certain portions of the real estate to his wife for life, with remainder over, and in other respects confirmed his will. The testator's whole property was subject to a mortgage for £3,000, not created by the testator, and also to charges created by him.

The testator died in 1855, and in 1865 the real estate (other than the specifically-devised portion) was sold, and the mortgage debt of £3,000 and the charges paid out of the proceeds. The widow died in 1895. After the sale, and until her death, she received the income of the residue of the proceeds of sale, and also the rents of the unsold specifically-devised real estate.

Held, that the property specifically devised by the codicil was liable to contribute towards payment of the £3,000, as it was not a debt of the testator; and, as the codicil confirmed the will, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113 applied.

But held, that, owing to the delay from 1865 to 1895, the liability was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Adjourned summons.

By his will dated the 16th of February, 1839, James Martin devised all his real estate upon trusts in favour of Mary Martin for life and from and after her decease devised the same to trustees for a term of 500 years upon trust to raise the sum of £3,000, and subject thereto devised his real estate to John Allen in fee simple. James Martin died in 1843, and Mary Martin died on the 13th of November, 1864.

John Allen created mortgages amounting to £2,700 in all. By his will dated the 11th of January, 1845, he devised all his real estate upon trust for sale and directed that the income of the proceeds of sale after payment of his debts should be paid to his wife Martha Allen for her life, and from and after her decease that the same should be divided among his children living at her death or the issue of those who had then died leaving issue per stirpes.

John Allen made a codicil to his said will on the 30th of January, 1855, and thereby revoked the devise of Ladywell and 6½ acres of land and the bequest of a leasehold house and 12 acres at Whetstone, and devised and bequeathed the same to the use of Martha Allen for life with remainder to John Perkins Allen and Thomas Perkins Allen in equal shares, and in other respects the testator confirmed his said will.

The testator died on the 13th of February, 1855, and his will was proved on the 5th of May, 1855, by his widow alone. The only real estate which the testator had was that devised to him by James Martin.

In 1865 the real estate, other than the specifically-devised portion, was sold for £7,860 15s. 11d., and the mortgage of £3,000 and the charges were paid off out of the proceeds.

Martha Allen died on the 28th of May, 1895.

The question now arose whether the property specifically devised by the testator's will was liable to contribute towards the testator's debts.

E. P. Hewitt, for the trustees.

Ingpen, for the widow and devisee in trust of John Perkins Allen.—As regards the property specifically disposed of, the charges were properly paid out of residue. Locke-King's Act only applies to wills made after 1854. Even if it were applicable, there is here a blended fund given on trust to pay debts, and this is a "contrary intention" within the Act. The second Act (Locke-King's Amendment Act, 1867) does not apply, and I escape from the first Act.

He cited Maxwell v. Hyslop, L. R. 4 Eq. 407, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 155; Maxwell v. Maxwell, 19 W. R. 15, L. R. 4 H. L. C. 506; Newman v. Wilson, 31 Beav. 33, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 129.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Smith, for Martha Perkins Batchelor (a daughter of the testator and mortgagee of the son's interest under the will).—The £3,000 at least was not a debt of the testator, and there can be no "contrary intention" as to this, which was charged on the property the testator took. He, in fact, only took an equity of redemption, and there could be no claim against him personally, as he merely took the property cum onere. The will was before Locke-King's Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113), and the codicil comes within the proviso. In Rolfe v. Perry, 11 W. R. 674, 3 De G. J. & S. 481, the republication consisted of the appointment of executors.

T. H. Attwater, for another beneficiary in the same interest.

NORTH, J.—The will was made before the Act (Locke-King's Act), and if there had been no codicil the Act would not have applied. The codicil confirms the will except as regards specific bequests. The question is if a direction to pay debts includes mortgage debts, and there is no doubt that if the testator had not made the codicil the mortgage debts would have been paid out of personal estate, and not out of the property specifically devised. The effect of the testator confirming his will by a codicil after the Act came into operation is exactly the same as if he had made a codicil in the same language as the will. The second Locke-King Act only applies after 1867. The residuary estate and the estate which is not specifically devised has to bear the burden. The £3,000, however, is in a different position, for the estate came to the testator charged with that sum; he only, in fact, took the equity of redemption. He was not personally liable to pay that sum, so that the direction to pay debts does not apply.

The question whether the liability of the specifically-devised property to contribute towards the payment of this sum of £3,000 had been barred by the Statute of Limitations was then argued.

Ingpen.—The mortgages were paid off in 1865, and no capital or interest was paid from 1865 to 1895. The widow was legal tenant for life under the codicil, and there are no trustees. The trustees of the will are now barred by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 8.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Smith.—The statute did not begin to run until the widow's death. If the widow had paid interest upon a proportionate amount of the charge, she must have paid herself. As the person entitled to the rents was also entitled to the interest, the rights of the trustees are not barred: Topham v. Booth, 35 W. R. 715, 35 Ch. D. 607; Burrell v. Earl of Egremont, 7 Beav. 205. In re England, 44 W. R. 119, [1895] 2 Ch. 820, turned on the fact that a devisee in fee was not under any obligation to persons coming after him.

Ingpen, in reply.—To keep the charge alive it must be brought within the proviso in section 8. The persons claiming under the codicil are not liable. The debt was gone in 1865, and it has not been shown that there was any intention to keep it alive for the benefit of the residuary estate.

NORTH, J.—I think that In re England does apply. The whole estate was charged with this sum of £3,000. In 1865 the estate was sold, and nothing was done to keep that charge alive. The widow died in 1895, and the question is whether the £3,000 paid out of residue ought to have been paid partly out of the property which was specifically devised. It is suggested that there was something equivalent to payment of interest on it by the widow, but I do not see how anything of the sort is made out in this case. The widow did not keep down the interest. She was under no obligation to pay what nobody required her to pay. In my opinion, the claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

LONG v. THE VESTRY OF THE PARISH OF FULHAM. (a.)

Metropolis—Management—Trespass by vestry—Laying of new drain—Compensation—Damages—Consent of London County Council—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 57, 59, 60, 69.

Where a metropolitan vestry acting on the reports of its officers had passed resolutions recorded on its minutes, and, in accordance with such resolutions, but without obtaining the leave of the county council, entered upon the plaintiff's premises and inserted a new system of drainage:

Held, that, on the proper construction of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the vestry had committed a trespass, and had done an illegal act for which they were liable in damages; but, the plaintiff not having suffered injury, and having consented to the work, judgment was given for the vestry, the defendants, with costs.

Summons.

This was an action brought by Henry Long, the owner and occupier of certain freehold premises in Farm-lane, against the Fulham Vestry, claiming damages for the trespass of the defendants, for digging and undermining the earth in the said premises and laying a sewer therein, for depriving the plaintiff of the use and occupation of the said premises for several days, and for the depreciation in value of his said premises in consequence of the illegal construction of the said sewer. The plaintiff also claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from repeating their acts.

It appeared that for thirty years prior to September, 1897, during the whole of which period the plaintiff had owned the premises, the sewage of the same had been discharged by a short pipe at the back into the drain of the adjoining premises on one side, and the rain and refuse waters discharged by a short pipe at the back into the drain of the adjoining premises on the other side, nor was there any drain or sewer under the plaintiff's dwelling-house.

The acts complained of by the plaintiff were done during the months of September and October, 1897, and were carried out by a gang under a foreman instructed by the vestry's surveyor, who took his authority from the resolutions entered on the minutes of the sanitary committee of the vestry. The plaintiff, so far from refusing his consent to the doing of the work, himself attended to the necessary removal of furniture.

Some time after the completion of the work, the plaintiff, by his solicitors, sent to the vestry a request for compensation, and the vestry wrote to deny all liability. The plaintiff then brought this action for damages for trespass and for an illegal act.

Cooney, for plaintiff, said that the work, which was not the relaying of an old sewer, but the construction of a new one, was done without his consent and without the previous approval of the London County Council and in excess of the powers conferred on the vestry by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 69: Brownlow v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 12 W. R. 871, 33 L. J. C. P. 233, and Broadbent v. The Imperial Gaslight Co., 5 W. R. 272, 26 L. J. Ch. 276; and that the vestry and its officers had not complied with the requirements of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 57, 59 and 60: Vestry of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch v. Holmes, 50 J. P. 132 (where such acts as were complained of were held illegal by Day and Smith, JJ., even though there a statutory notice had been served by a statutory officer). The plaintiff sued for damages for illegal acts.

Macaskie and Walsh, for defendants, who had previously offered forty shillings to the plaintiffs as sufficient to satisfy the whole of the claim and had paid that sum into court, alleged that the plaintiff had given his verbal consent to the work.

KEKEWICH, J.—On the construction of the Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), I am in favour of the plaintiff; old drainage cannot properly be described as a sewer so as to bring it within the Act in favour of the defendants. Even if it were a sewer, there has been no "diversion," but a construction of a "new drain," which required the consent of the London County Council, the absence of which in the present case is fatal. The vestry having done without authority that for which they wanted authority, have committed a trespass, in point of law. Therefore there can be no compensation, but they are liable in damages, if the plaintiff can prove that he has suffered; but this he has failed to do. As a result of this unjustifiable insertion of a new system of drainage into his house, there has been no diminution in its letting value, and, on the balance of evidence, none in its selling value; the probability is rather the other way. The plaintiff has therefore proved a technical trespass but no damage. If the case rested there, judgment would be for defendants, but without costs. But it has been proved to my satisfaction that the plaintiff did consent to the work being done, and was not coerced in any way of duress. Therefore, judgment is for defendants, with costs.

COLEMAN v. NORTH. (a.)

Contract—Voluntary trust—Intended transfer of property—Representations influencing conduct.

N., a promoter of, and vendor to, an unsuccessful mining company, publicly and in good faith promised to create a trust, under which the company and its shareholders would have benefited, but died before the trust was created.

Held, that a person who heard of the contemplated trust could not, in virtue of the fact that he bought or held shares of the company in confidence of N.'s promise being carried out, establish a case of contract as against N., and, in the absence of any fraud or special representation, neither N. nor his executors would be estopped from denying liability, notwithstanding that N. himself might have benefited by the promise having been made.

Action.

This was an action by the shareholders of the Londonderry Gold Mine against the executors of Colonel North, to enforce Colonel North's undertakings or promises to place any profits made by him as promoter and vendor at the disposition of the shareholders in the event of their incurring loss through failure of the adventure.

It appeared from the plaintiffs' statement of claim that the Londonderry Gold Mine was a company incorporated in November, 1894, for the purpose of acquiring and working certain gold claims near Coolgardie, Western Australia.

Lord Fingall and Colonel North were the promoters of and vendors to the company.

All the shares of the company offered for public subscription were applied for and duly allotted, and the company proceeded to work the mine.

Shortly afterwards bad news from the mine was received and published in England as to the value of the mine. Colonel North thereupon offered by several letters published in the newspapers to vest his share of the net profits accruing to the vendors on the sale to the company, in trustees for the benefit of the shareholders until the company had earned profits equal to 100 per cent. of the issued capital; and affirmed his belief in the value of the property.

After considerable delay a draft deed of trust was prepared. In May, 1896, and before the execution of the deed, Colonel North died, and at his death the profits, the subject of the draft trust deed, had not been transferred to the trustees. The plaintiffs alleged that on the faith of the letters of Colonel North they refrained from taking proceedings against him and his co-vendors, and continued to hold their shares and to acquire others, and that the fall of the shares was thereby checked and that large dealings in the shares took place on the London and Paris Stock Exchanges; they contended that, in these circumstances, Colonel North or his executors were bound by the representations made by Colonel North, and must carry out the trust.

ROMER, J.—I may repeat for myself in this case what Turner, L.J., said in Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. & J., 264, at p. 274, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 120, that under the circumstances it would be difficult not to feel a strong disposition to give effect to the settlement that was contemplated, and that certainly I have spared no pains to find the means of doing so consistently with what I apprehend to be the law of the court; but after full and anxious consideration I find myself unable to do so, for, after all is said and done, the circumstances of this case, in my opinion, only show a promised gift, not completed at the death of the man who promised, and which cannot be enforced against his executors. The case only differs from others of the class in matters of degree—that is to say, in the great publicity given to the promise, the number of persons interested in its performance, and the great reliance placed by them upon its being performed. The plaintiffs, however, try to establish a contract, and, by their counsel, urge that there was sufficient consideration for it. But before going into nice questions as to what is or is not a sufficient consideration, I must find a contract, and that is precisely what I am unable to do in this case. As Lord Blackburn said, dealing with a point of this kind in Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467, at p. 487: "To make a contract there must be a bargain between both parties." And here I can find no bargain and no parties to any bargain.

It was suggested on the plaintiffs' behalf that Colonel North bargained with the company or with its shareholders, or some of them, that they should refrain from taking certain proceedings against him in consideration of his settling the profits made by him, as vendor to the company of the mines the company was formed to buy and work. There was no bargain of any sort between Colonel North on the one hand, and any company or person or persons on the other, that any proceedings or claims against him should be abandoned in consideration of his settling his profits.

There was, further, a suggestion that, because Colonel North publicly promised to settle the profits, any person who acted on the faith of that promise by holding or buying shares in the company became entitled to say there was a contract between him and Colonel North. What Colonel North had, in my opinion, publicly promised to do was to make a gift under which the company and the shareholders would have benefited. This promise was made in good faith, and I have no doubt that, had Colonel North lived long enough, he would in some shape or form have substantially carried out his promise. But a person who heard of the contemplated gift could not, because he bought or held shares of the company, in reliance on Colonel North as a man of honour carrying out his promise, say that thereby he had established a contract between him and Colonel North that the promised gift should be completed. The shares of the company generally rose, or may have risen, in market price because Colonel North had promised, and bonâ fide intended, to make a gift to the company or the shareholders; and Colonel North, when selling some of his shares, may have got the benefit of this rise in the market; but these facts did not alter the nature of Colonel North's promises, or, in the absence of any fraud or special representations, estop Colonel North or his executors, or put him in the position of a person who had entered into a contract with the company or its shareholders generally. A person who in good faith announces certain contemplated gifts by him may thereby derive many advantages, but this will not, apart from some special case made of contract or estoppel, make him liable if he does not complete his gift. I have already pointed out that no case of contract has been established before me, and I can find here nothing in the nature of an estoppel, either at law or equity, which would prevent Colonel North's executors from raising their present contention against the company and its shareholders. As to equitable estoppel, I may refer to what Lord Selborne said in Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans, 22 W. R. 194, L. R. 6 H. L. 352, at p. 360.

The only remaining contention of the plaintiffs is that Colonel North had declared himself a trustee of his profits, and therefore nothing was necessary to be done to complete the gift, and the trusts can be enforced. But here, again, the facts will not enable me to uphold the plaintiffs' contention. So far as I can see, Colonel North never contemplated making himself a trustee, and never, in fact, made himself a trustee of the profits. Throughout he contemplated having trustees of his gift appointed and the exact trusts carefully settled. From time to time he appears to have changed the nature of the trusts he proposed to create in many important particulars, and up to the time of his death the form of the trust deed he proposed to execute was never finally settled. As Turner, L.J., said in Milroy v. Lord, after observing that a voluntary settlement might be created, either by the settlor transferring the property to a trustee, or constituting himself a trustee of it, "the cases, I think, go further to the extent that if the settlement is intended to be effectuated by one of the modes to which I have referred, the court will not give effect to it by applying another of those modes. If it is intended to take effect by transfer the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, for then every imperfect instrument would be made effectual by being converted into a perfect trust" (4 De G. F. & J., at p. 274). In the present case there is really nothing to lend any support to the view that he made himself a trustee beyond certain general remarks by him at a meeting of the company on the 16th of August, 1895, as to his having given his profits back to the shareholders, and so forth. But at the same meeting other observations by him show what he meant—namely, that he proposed to hand over the profits to trustees upon some trusts which would practically be for the benefit of the shareholders, and in that sense the shareholders might regard the matter as if he had handed back the profits. It is clear that no terms of trust were ever finally settled by Colonel North up to his death, and that throughout he acted as one having the ordinary right of a voluntary donor who had not completed his gift, to amend the terms of that gift as he thought best to attain the general objects he had in view. For these reasons it appears to me that the action fails and must be dismissed, but, under the circumstances, I dismiss it without costs.

In re FISHER AND GRAZEBROOK'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract—Trustees for purposes of Settled Land Act—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 22.

Where, to the knowledge of a purchaser from a tenant for life selling in exercise of powers conferred on him by the Settled Land Acts, there are no trustees for the purposes of the Act, the purchaser cannot be compelled to pay the purchase-money into court or to accept the title, unless such trustees are appointed.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for the determination of a question arising under section 22 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

In March, 1898, Fisher entered into a contract with Grazebrook for the sale of a freehold house known as Caenwood Grange, Beulah-hill, Norwood. The said house formed part of the residuary estate of William Hayes and Fisher was entitled thereto in fee subject, to an executory gift over in the event of his death without issue. He had contracted to sell the house as a person having the powers of a tenant for life. On examining the title the purchaser's advisers took the objection that there were no trustees within the meaning of and for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and that the purchaser was bound to see that at the time of completion at least there must be such trustees duly appointed. The vendor's advisers contended that whether there were such trustees or not, and even if the purchaser knew there were no such trustees, yet if the purchase-money was paid into court in accordance with the provisions of section 22 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the purchaser would get a good title, and insisted on his carrying out the purchase without trustees being appointed. The purchaser objecting, the vendor took out this summons for a declaration that a title in accordance with the contract had been shown by the vendor, and that the purchaser on paying the purchase-money into court to a proper account under the provisions of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, would obtain a good discharge for the same.

W. B. Coltman, for the vendor, for the summons.—The purchaser will get a good title if he pays the purchase-money into court in pursuance of section 22 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

H. D. Grazebrook, the purchaser, appeared in person and contended that he was not bound to take the title unless trustees were appointed for the purpose of the Settled Land Acts. Section 22 of the Settled Land Act of 1882 presupposes the existence of trustees.

He referred to the judgment of Kay, J., in Hatten v. Russell, 36 W. R. 317, 38 Ch. D. 334; also Mogridge v. Clapp, 40 W. R. 663, [1892] 3 Ch. 382; Wheelwright v. Walker, 31 W. R. 363, 23 Ch. D. 752; Hughes v. Flanagan, 30 L. R. Ir. 111, 40 W. R. Dig. 228.

ROMER, J.—Before the time for completion, the purchaser wanting to get a discharge from his purchase-money, has notice that there are no trustees in existence. The vendor, the tenant for life, then requires him to pay his money into court under section 22 of the Act and to take a conveyance. In my opinion the tenant for life is not entitled to require under these circumstances the purchaser to do so. Section 22, which provides for payment into court of the purchase-money, presupposes the existence of trustees. That was pointed out and decided first in Hatten v. Russell, where Kay, J., as he was then, points out "that that option cannot properly be exercised and cannot really be exercised at all if there are no trustees." The same point arose in the case of Mogridge v. Clapp. In that case again Kay, L.J., at p. 400 ([1892] 3 Ch.), says: "By section 22 capital money arising under the Act must be paid to trustees or into court at the option of the tenant for life. But he can only have such option primâ facie when there are trustees, so that the purchaser could hardly pay his purchase-money without ascertaining that there were trustees to whom it might be paid." I quite agree that if the purchaser in this case thinking that there were trustees and in ignorance of the fact that there were no trustees, had paid his money into court, he would have got a good title. But he has notice that there are no trustees, and he refuses to complete. In my opinion in those circumstances such a title as the tenant for life requires him to take ought not to be forced upon him. I was referred to the observations made by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Mogridge v. Clapp, where he said, "Even if the plaintiff had known that there were no trustees it would not follow that his title would be bad." But he was dealing with the special case of a lease, and on the very same page (395) the Master of the Rolls, with reference to a sale, after observing that Wheelwright v. Walker, was a case of sale and that the purchaser did not propose to pay the money into court, says this, "I also think that the omission to take these steps might prevent the tenant for life from obtaining specific performance against an unwilling lessee." Still more, it appears to me, would the tenant for life have been unable to compel a purchaser to take a conveyance in the case where the purchaser knew before he paid his money and got a conveyance that there were no trustees in existence. Such a title as this, in my opinion, ought not to be forced upon a purchaser having regard to the very great doubt whether or not in such a case he would not get a defective title. The case of Hughes v. Flanagan, although not a binding authority upon me, is a strong case for showing, to say the least of it, that the purchaser in this case, if he did pay his money into court under the circumstances with the knowledge he had and obtained a conveyance from the tenant for life, would obtain a doubtful title. Such a title as that ought not to be forced upon him. For these reasons I dismiss the application with costs.

LORD HASTINGS v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Rent—Way-leaves—Rent or sum in gross—Tenement—Statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34—Railway Company.

Way-leaves over land are an incorporeal hereditament and a tenement, and sums of money covenanted to be paid for such way-leaves granted for a term of years are not sums in gross, but are rents, the right to which follows the reversion after the term, under the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34.

This is the case even where some of such sums are payable to the lessor in respect of traffic passing over the lands of others and not over any part of his own.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action for sums payable in respect of wayleaves granted for a term to a railway company; and it involved the question whether such sums were or were not in the nature of rents following the reversion of the property.

By the Blyth and Tyne Railway Act, 1852, the Blyth and Tyne Railway Co. were empowered to agree with any party empowered by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 to sell lands, for granting to the railway company rights of way and other rights for the purpose of maintaining or improving the railway thereby authorized, and persons so empowered were enabled to make grants to the company accordingly.

At the date of the indenture next mentioned a Bill was pending in Parliament for enabling the said railway company to make and maintain various branch railways. This Bill subsequently became law as the "Blyth and Tyne Railway Consolidation and Extensions Act, 1854," and one of the said branch railwas was "the Morpeth branch" railway.

By an indenture of the 18th of May, 1854, Jacob Lord Hastings, over whose land the new railways were to pass, covenanted with the Blyth and Tyne Railway Co. and their assigns, and the company covenanted with the said Lord Hastings, his heirs and assigns, that immediately after the passing of the said Bill, Lord Hastings by indenture under his hand and seal would make, and the company would accept, a grant of way-leave and right and liberty of way and passage over and along such portion of the lands of Lord Hastings as thereinafter mentioned. The orm of the indenture to be executed was then set out, and it witnessed that in consideration of the rents reserved and covenants contained, the said Lord Hastings granted to the company and their assigns full way-leave or right of way, and liberty, power, and authority to and for the company to make the said branch railways, or such parts thereof as were to pass through the lands of Lord Hastings, upon those lands, to hold the same to the company and their assigns for the term of 1,000 years, yielding and paying certain sums therein mentioned, being (amongst others) on coals, coke, culm, and cinders conveyed over and along any part of the railways comprehended in the Blyth and Tyne Railway Consolidation and Extensions Act, 1854, which should be shipped at the Port Blyth (other than certain coals, &c., therein mentioned) the sum of 3s. per ton, each ton consisting of 18 chaldrons and ½ chaldron. And the said form of indenture contained the usual powers of distress and entry upon the said railways in case "the said rents or sums hereby reserved" were unpaid for thirty days or forty days respectively, and a covenant by the railway company with Lord Hastings, his heirs and assigns, to pay to him and them "the said several rents and sums of money hereinbefore reserved" in manner therein mentioned.

The defendants were the statutory transferees of the Blyth and Tyne Railway Co., and they had recently conveyed over the Morpeth branch railway coals, coke, and cinders which had been shipped at the Port Blyth. The plaintiff, upon whom the lands of the said Lord Hastings had devolved, brought this action for an account of such coals, &c., and for payment of 3s. upon every "ton" thereof.

The case was heard by Byrne, J., on the 11th and 13th of June, and on the 27th of June his lordship decided that the 3s. was payable upon all coal, &c., passing over any part of the Morpeth branch railway (and shipped at Blyth), and not merely upon such as passed over the lands of the plaintiff; and he gave judgment for the plaintiff on all points except upon the question whether the sums sued for were rents which passed with the ownership of the lands and of the reversion after the said term of 1,000 years, or whether they were payments in gross not issuing out of the land and not payable in respect of it, and consequently not due to the plaintiff.

The action now came on for argument upon this point.

The land was not parted with; there was merely a liberty or licence given over it; Clifford v. Hoare, 22 W. R. 828, L. R. 9 C. P. 362; Burton's Compendum, chap. 6, sec. 2, p. 333.

July 7.—BYRNE, J.—The interest conferred upon the railway company—viz., a way-leave over land of the grantor, with the right to make a railway thereover, and with the other powers given to them, is, in my judgment, an incorporeal hereditament, a property, and an estate capable of being inherited by the heir (if granted to an individual) and of being assigned to a purchaser. It is a "tenement" within the definition of Lord Coke, 1 Inst. 20A being an inheritance concerning or annexed to or exercisable within a corporate inheritance. I have nearly followed the judgment of the court in the case of Martyn v. Williams 5 W. R. 351, 1 H. & N. 817, at p. 827, and following the further reasoning in the same case, I think that the plaintiff is the owner of the reversion within the statute of 32 Hen. 8. To quote from p. 830 of the report: "There is in reality the relation of reversioner and owner of particular estate between them; there is exactly the same privity of estate as exists between reversioner and tenant properly so called, and upon the determination of the term the entire interest in the land would revert to the plaintiff as upon the expiration of an ordinary lease. In the ordinary case of owner in fee simple and tenant for years, in which the relationship of reversioner and tenant within the statute certainly exists, the owner of the fee, upon the determination of the term, has vested in him a larger and more extensive interest in the corpus of the land than the tenant for years had. His interest in the minerals and timber, and, indeed, in the soil itself, is very different from that of such tenant." In the case of Norval v. Pascoe, 12 W. R. 973, 34 L. J. Ch. 82, the decision in Martyn v. Williams was followed by Kinderslay, V.C., who dealt with other authorities bearing on the matter. In both the cases I have referred to the subject-matter was a lease or licence for a term to dig china clay, with ancillary powers; and in the present case the subject-matter is a lease or licence for a term of a way-leave for a railway to be made and used for traffic over the grantor's land. In general structure it follows the form of what is called "Lease of a way-leave" given in Mr. Davidson's Precedents, 2nd ed., vol. 5, part 1 (Leases). I think that the subject-matter in the present case is such as to bring it within the principle of the decided cases, and I refer particularly to Buckeridge v. Ingram, 2 Ves. jun. 652, and The Earl of Portmore v. Bunn, 1 B. & Cr. 694, for instances of analogous rights. In the latter of these an action was brought to recover rent against the assignee of the licence for a term to cut a channel to the River Wey, and, although the actual decision turned upon a variance between the declaration and the evidence, it was distinctly held that a mere easement upon the soil of others to make channels and towing-paths is a real hereditament. The covenant to pay rents or annual sums in the present case is in favour of the grantor, his heirs and assigns, and although it is quite true that some of such rents or sums are, as I have held, payable, even although the traffic does not pass over any part of the plaintiff's lands, and that they are calculated in part on such traffic, nevertheless I consider that the rents are payable in respect of the hereditaments leased, and that the plaintiff is entitled to sue exactly as the original lessor might have done.

ALTREE v. ALTREE.
STAFFORDSHIRE FINANCIAL CO. (LIMITED)

Bill of sale—Validity—Address of grantee—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9, schedule.

A bill of sale given by way of security for the payment of money is void, under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act of 1882, if the address of the grantee be omitted. It makes no difference that the grantee is a registered company.

Appeal from the Lichfield County Court.

Goods taken in execution were claimed in an interpleader issue under a bill of sale, of which the claimants were the grantees. The bill of sale was given by way of security for the payment of money by the grantor thereof. The material words were as follows: "This indenture, made the 12th day of March, 1898, between John Altree, of Triangle Farm, Chase Town, in the parish of Hammerwick, in the county of Stafford, farmer, hereinafter called 'the borrower,' of the one part, and the Staffordshire Financial Co. (Limited), hereinafter called 'the lenders,' of the other part . . ." No other description, and no address, of the grantees appeared in the bill of sale.

The county court judge held that the bill of sale was void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, provides: "A bill of sale made or given by way of security for the payment of money by the grantor thereof shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule to this Act annexed." The form given in the schedule begins as follows: "This indenture, made the —— day of ——, between A. B., of ——, of the one part, and C. D., of ——, of the other part, witnesseth . . ."

J. B. Matthews, for the claimants.—As long as the variation in the form is not a material variation the bill is not invalidated: Ex parte Stanford, In re Barber, 34 W. R. 237, 287, 507, 17 Q. B. form provided, but in accordance with the form. All that is essential is that the grantee shall be described sufficiently for identification. In the case of a registered company the name alone is sufficient, because no two companies can be registered under the same name. The address would therefore have been mere surplusage. It has been the practice of conveyancers to describe a company by giving its name only. Parsons v. Brand, 38 W. R. 388, 25 Q. B. D. 110, and Sims v. Trollope & Sons, 45 W. R. 97, [1897] 1 Q. B. 24, are not in point since they refer only to the address and description of the attesting witnees.

Counsel referred also to Simmons v. Woodward, 40 W. R. 641, [1892] A. C. 100; Murray v. Mackenzie, 23 W. R. 595, L. R. 10 C. P. 625; Parsons v. Brand; Dolcini v. Dolcini, 43 W. R. 542, [1895] 1 Q. B. 898; Smith v. Hammond, 44 W. R. 478, [1896] 1 Q. B. 571.

Disturnal, for the execution creditor, was not called on.

DAY, J.—The objection taken to this bill of sale is well founded. Section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act of 1882 provides that a bill of sale shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act. When one looks at the form in the schedule one finds that the grantee is described as "C.D. of ——." The county court judge held that the bill was not in accordance with the form because the blank space after the name of the grantee was not filled up, and no description or address was given of the grantee. I think the county court judge was right and that the bill of sale is bad.

Ex parte THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Discharge — Bankrupt convicted under Debtors Act—Special reasons for not refusing discharge—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 8 (2)—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), ss. 14, 15.

By section 8 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "The court shall refuse the discharge in all cases where the bankrupt has committed any misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869, . . . unless for special reasons the court otherwise determines."

The court has no discretion to grant a discharge in cases falling under the above section, unless there are circumstances in the case upon which special reasons can clearly be founded, and such circumstances should be particularly set forth in the order of discharge.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal by the Board of Trade against a decision of his Honour Judge Whitehorne, Q.C., in the county court at Birmingham, granting the bankrupt his discharge subject to a suspension of two years.

The bankrupt had been adjudicated in 1892, and had been convicted of misdemeanours under sections 14 and 15 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and undergone a sentence of six months' imprisonment.

He applied for his discharge in 1898, and the official receiver's report on the application not only set out the conviction, but several other circumstances, such as assets under ten shillings in the pound, which would have made it impossible, even in the absence of any conviction, for the judge to have given a less suspension than two years.

By section 8 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "The court shall refuse the discharge in all cases where the bankrupt has committed a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869, . . . unless for special reasons the court otherwise determines." In the present case the judge found that there were special reasons for not refusing the discharge.

The order of discharge stated no facts on which "special reasons" could be based, except that some of the jury at the criminal trial had recommended the bankrupt to mercy. The judgment stated that the bankrupt was a young man, and had been sufficiently punished by the sentence he had undergone. In a note appended to the judgment the learned judge stated that he had questioned the bankrupt himself and come to the conclusion that his crime was largely due to "confusion and distress"; and that it would be for the benefit of his creditors to grant him his discharge as soon as possible.

The Board of Trade appealed against the order of discharge.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants.—The judge cannot find that there are special reasons for not refusing a discharge without there being facts upon which to ground those reasons. The official receiver's report in this case disclosed no special reasons, and the only fact on which they were based seems to have been the statement made in court on the hearing of the application that some of the jury had recommended the bankrupt to mercy. The judge's opinion that the bankrupt's crime was due to confusion and distress is no fact upon which special reasons can be founded.

He cited In re Richardson and Webster, 4 Morr. 22; Ex parte Castle Mail Co., Re Payne, 35 W. R. 89, 18 Q. B. D. 154; and In re Hedley, Ex parte The Board of Trade, 43 W. R. 464.

F. C. Willis, for the bankrupt.—There were the special reasons in this case that the bankrupt had been undischarged since 1892, and that his conviction rendered it difficult for him to obtain employment; and the official receiver did not contend in the court below that there were no special reasons.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case the learned judge's order recites the proceedings and the fact that the debtor was convicted of misdemeanours under the Debtors Act, 1869, therefore by section 8 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, primâ facie the court would have no power to grant his discharge. The enactment, however, is qualified in this way: "Unless for special reasons the court otherwise determines." Now, it seems to me that in a case where the court finds there are special reasons, it should clearly specify upon what those reasons are based.

The order in this case assigns as a special reason, and as the only special reason, that the jury strongly recommended the bankrupt to mercy. It seems to me that that would not be a special reason in any case, and, as it turns out here that the recommendation was only made by some of the jury, there is really nothing in it at all.

Yet the order may have been carelessly drawn up, so we will look at the judgment; but in the judgment no particular ground for special reasons can be found; it only states that the bankrupt is a young man, and has been punished for his crime by the imprisonment he has undergone. Then, in a note appended to the judgment, the learned judge states that he examined the bankrupt, and came to the conclusion that his crime was the result of confusion and distress, that he had resolved to live an honest life and pay his creditors, and that it would be for the benefit of his creditors to grant him his discharge. I cannot see how the creditors would benefit by his discharge, and on the whole I conclude that the learned judge gave more weight than he was entitled to to the circumstances which inclined him to mercy, and that in strictness the discharge should have been absolutely refused.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

"THE FULHAM." (a.)

Ship—Salvage—Detention of salved property by receiver of wreck—Services rendered to property within British waters—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 510, 546, 547, 548, 552, 565, 571—Meaning of "salvage due under this Act."

It is provided by section 552 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, that, where salvage is due to any person under this Act, the receiver shall, if the salvage is due in respect of services rendered in assisting any vessel, or in saving life therefrom, or in saving the cargo or apparel thereof, detain the vessel, or cargo, or apparel.

Held, that the words "salvage due under this Act" in this section, were not confined to cases where salvage was made payable by the express enactments of the Act, but extended to cases where salvage might become payable under the decree of any court having jurisdiction recognised or conferred by the Act to decree the payment of salvage.

This was an action instituted on behalf of the Britain Steamship Co. (Limited), the owners of the British steamship Fulham, against Thomas Hudson, receiver of wreck and collector of customs in the port of Plymouth, to recover the sum of £60 as damages sustained by them by reason of the detention of The Fulham from the 18th of December, 1897, when the vessel was ready to proceed to sea, until the 20th of December, 1897, when the said steamship was released; such detention being alleged to have taken place in consequence of the action of the defendant in the circumstances mentioned in the statement of claim.

On this point the statement of claim stated that about the 14th of December, 1897, The Fulham, whilst on a voyage from Salina to Dunkirk, was short of fuel, and on or about the 16th of December, when in the English Channel at a distance of about twenty miles from the port of Plymouth, The Fulham was taken in tow by the steam-tug Flying Buzzard and brought into Plymouth on the same day; that, acting on the suggestion of the master or owners of The Flying Buzzard, the defendant directed and secured the arrest and detention of The Fulham as from the 16th of December by placing a man on board her; that no legal proceedings were taken by or on behalf of the owners of The Flying Buzzard until the 20th of December, 1897, when a writ was issued in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice claiming salvage remuneration; and that on the 18th of December bail was tendered to the defendant in any amount required by the claimants and an undertaking for bail was further offered by solicitors acting for the owners of The Fulham, but the defendant refused to accept any such undertaking as aforesaid or allow the release on any bail whatever. The statement of claim further alleged "that the said detention and arrest of the said steamship was wholly illegal, and was not to any extent warranted or justified by the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, or any other statute having relation to the function of a receiver of wreck, and that the defendant in arbitrarily refusing to accept bail or the solicitors' undertaking for bail on the 18th of December was guilty of gross dereliction of duty, and was legally liable for the consequences thereof.

The defendant appeared and delivered a defence wherein, after admitting the statements in the statement of claim as to the services rendered by The Flying Buzzard, and the towing of The Fulham into the port of Plymouth, and that he had detained that vessel while in Plymouth Harbour, pleaded that he had detained her at the request of the master of The Flying Buzzard to whom salvage was then due under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for services rendered in assisting The Fulham, and otherwise; that on the 18th of December, 1897, two sureties were proposed to the defendant as security on behalf of the plaintiffs by the plaintiffs' solicitors, but the proposed security did not satisfy the defendant and he so informed the said solicitors, and refused to release the said vessel; that save as aforesaid no bail was tendered, nor was an undertaking offered by the plaintiffs' solicitor, nor did the defendant refuse to accept any such undertaking or allow the release of the vessel on any bail whatever, but the plaintiffs' solicitors were informed by the defendant that the vessel could be released on bail being given to his satisfaction, and that on the 20th of December, 1897, security was given by the plaintiffs to the satisfaction of the defendant, and the defendant accordingly released the vessel on that day. The defence further alleged that the defendant would rely on section 552 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

June 10.—The suit was heard before Barnes, J., when one witness was examined on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the defendant gave evidence on his own behalf.

Robson, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant had no jurisdiction or power to arrest or detain The Fulham. The power conferred by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 552, is limited to cases where salvage is "due under the Act"—that is, to cases where salvage is claimed by life salvors under sections 544 and 545 of the Act, which make life salvage payable in certain cases; or where salvage is made payable by section 546 of the Act in the cases of services rendered to wrecks or vessels stranded or in distress in or near the coasts of the United Kingdom. Now, the services rendered by the owners, master, and crew, of The Flying Buzzard were not life salvage services: The Cargo ex Woosung (2nd suit), 3 Asp. Mar. Cas., N. S. 50, 44 L. J. Adm. 45; and were not services to property stranded or in distress in or near the coasts of the United Kingdom, but services to property in distress on the high seas twenty miles from the coast. The expression "on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom" must clearly be limited to services rendered within a marine league from the coast—[They referred to The Leda, 4 W. R. 322, Swa. 40; The Mac, 7 P. D. 126, 30 W. R., Dig. 106]—and The Fulham being safely in tow of The Flying Buzzard when she was within that distance of the coast cannot be said to have then been in distress. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover the damages they claim, the detention of their vessel being without jurisdiction.

Sir Robert Finlay, S.G., and Sutton, for the defendant.—The defendant acted in every respect legally when he detained The Fulham, inasmuch as a claim for salvage "due under the Act" was made against her by the owners of The Flying Buzzard. The expression "salvage due under the Act" does not only refer to life salvage claims within the Act and claims for salvage rendered to wrecks or vessels stranded or in distress in or near the coasts of the United Kingdom, but refers to every claim for salvage on property within the district of the receiver which may become due and payable by the judgment of any of the courts or tribunals on which the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 confers jurisdiction, or which are mentioned therein as courts or tribunals before which salvage claims may be determined: see Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 544 to 550 and 571. Especially is this the case as to claims for salvage over which the Admiralty Division is given jurisdiction by section 565, as that section really deals with all claims for salvage to property whether in or near the coasts of the United Kingdom or otherwise. There is nothing in the Act leading to the narrow construction for which the plaintiffs contend being put on the powers of detention given to receivers of wreck, and the Legislature has in fact given the receiver of wreck of the district under the 552nd section the power of detention on behalf of the salvor which the salvor himself had by virtue of his common law lien for salvage, a lien which existed wherever the services were rendered. [They referred to Harford v. Jones, 1 Lord Raymond 393; Williams and Bruce Admiralty. Practice, 2nd ed. p. 132.] By section 551 the receiver in whose district salved property is found may, on application of either party, appoint a valuer to value the property where any dispute as to salvage arises, and by sections 523-526 a receiver may deal with any unclaimed wreck found in any part of her Majesty's dominions, including therein any derelict found in or on the shores of the sea in any part of her Majesty's dominions. If the powers of a receiver as to the detention of salved vessels was meant to be confined to salvage earned on or near the coast these last-mentioned sections would equally have been limited to cases where the dispute was as to such salvages and to derelicts abandoned on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom. But the services rendered to The Fulham were salvage services rendered to the lives of those on board The Fulham, as well as to herself and her cargo, and the defendant was, in fact, justified in detaining her even under the construction the plaintiffs put on the 552nd section—a greater salvage reward always being due where lives and property are saved by salvors. Moreover, there was a continuous salvage service to property performed by the salvors as long as The Fulham was in tow of The Flying Buzzard and until she arrived in safety at Plymouth, and salvage services were rendered to her—a distressed vessel—when she was "on or near coasts of the United Kingdom" even if these words are confined to services rendered within the territorial limits. The words "near the coasts" are wider than the words "on the coasts" and may well include services rendered within twenty miles of the shore.

At the close of the arguments Mr. Justice Barnes intimated that the opinion of the court was, that in arresting and detaining The Fulham the defendant had acted justifiably if he had had, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, jurisdiction to so arrest and detain her, and that as to the question of jurisdiction the court would take time to consider.

July 7.—BARNES, J.—[His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:]

Upon these facts the question is raised as to whether or not the defendant was entitled to arrest and detain The Fulham under the powers conferred on him under the 552nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. There was a further point made at the hearing before me that the defendant on the 18th of December improperly refused to accept security on the undertaking of the plaintiffs' solicitors to give security, but after hearing evidence on both sides on this point I decided that, assuming the defendant had power to arrest and detain the vessel at all, he did not improperly detain her. The plaintiffs' case was that their solicitors offered sureties or an undertaking to put in bail and that the defendant improperly refused to accept either. The defendant stated that he required the sureties to justify or the assent of the salvors to the sureties. The sureties did not justify and the assent of the salvors was not given until the 20th of December, when the vessel was released. I was of opinion that the defendant was entitled to act as he did. He was bound in the interests of the salvors to take the proper steps to satisfy himself that the security offered was adequate, and the usual course is to require the sureties to justify unless the salvors dispensed with justification, and as soon as the salvors assented to the sureties he released the ship. Until then security to the reasonable satisfaction of the defendant under the 552nd section had not been given.

The question now to be decided depends entirely upon the construction of certain sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The plaintiffs' contention is that no salvage is "due to any person under the Act," and that therefore the defendant had no right to detain the vessel. The argument in support of this view is that by the words in section 552 "salvage due to any person under this Act" is meant salvage made payable by sections 544, 545, and 546; that the operation of the 552nd section is confined to such salvage, and that the salvage in question in this case did not become payable under any of these sections. Sections 544 and 545 consolidating the sections of earlier Acts make salvage payable for saving life in certain cases, and section 546 is in these terms: "Where any vessel is wrecked, stranded, or in distress at any place at or near the coasts of the United Kingdom or any tidal water within the limits of the United Kingdom, and services are rendered by any person in assisting that vessel or saving the cargo or apparel of that vessel or any part thereof, and where services are rendered by any person other than a receiver in saving any wreck there shall be payable to the salvor by the owner of the vessel, cargo, apparel, or wreck a reasonable amount of salvage, to be determined in case of dispute in manner hereafter appearing." Apart from any argument as to life salvage the argument is that The Fulham was not in distress at any place "on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom," because the spot where she was found was twenty miles off the coast, and that such a spot is not within the meaning of the words "on or near the coast." The broad contention on behalf of the defendant is that section 552 is applicable not only to cases of salvage made payable by sections 544, 545, and 546, but to all claims for salvage which may become payable by the decree of any court having jurisdiction under the Act to determine disputes as to salvage. The point is not free from doubt, though the doubt is less to my mind than it would have been had a similar point been raised under the Acts consolidated by the Act of 1894, which differs somewhat from the earlier Act. On the whole I am of opinion that the defendant's contention is correct. Under section 547 of the Act of 1894 disputes as to the amount of salvage, whether of life or property, and whether rendered within or without the United Kingdom, are, if not settled by arbitration, agreement, or otherwise, to be determined summarily as provided by the Act—that is to say, in England, in certain cases of consent or limited amounts, by a county court having Admiralty jurisdiction, otherwise by the High Court in England. By section 565 the High Court, and in Scotland the Court of Session, are to have jurisdiction to decide upon all claims whatsoever relating to salvage, whether the services in respect of which salvage is claimed were performed on the high seas or within the boundary of any county, or partly on the high seas and partly within the boundary of any county, and whether the wreck in respect of which salvage is claimed is found on the sea or on the land, or partly on the sea and partly on the land. This section comprises the general jurisdiction which the Admiralty Court, now forming part of the High Court, exercise in salvage cases in respect of services on the high seas, and repeats the provisions of earlier statutes under which the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was extended to cases of salvage occurring within the boundary of a county. The words in section 552, "where salvage is due to any person under this Act," can hardly be construed literally because whether a claim is made for salvage the right to recover which is expressly conferred, or for salvage recoverable in courts which have jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Act, in either case the salvage award strictly speaking becomes due by the judgment of the court. The term "due under the Act" appears to have been used as a general expression to cover any salvage which the Act contemplates being awarded by the courts mentioned in it, the jurisdiction of which is conferred or recognized by it. Moreover, since the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction within the boundary of a county, it is difficult to see in what cases a claim for salvage can be made under section 546 which could not have been made without it; so that it seems unreasonable to limit section 552 to one class of salvage and not to extend its provisions to salvage claims generally for which process may be issued.

Two other points were taken by counsel for the defendant. The first was that in any view of the case the defendant was entitled to detain the vessel because the salvage services in question had been rendered partly in saving life. The Fulham was in a position in which there would be some risk to the lives of those on board her. In the salvage suit against her and her cargo and freight, which was heard by me, an award of £900 was given to the salvors for bringing her into Plymouth, and I found, on the advice of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, who assisted me, that there was risk of her going ashore and being lost. So that as there was some risk of life which would form an element in considering an award on a claim substantially made for saving the property, it cannot be said that the defendant had no jurisdiction whatever to detain the vessel. The plaintiffs' counsel made no effective answer to this point.

The other point was that The Fulham was in distress at a place on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom because she was, it was contended, "near" the coasts within the meaning of section 546, and also because part of the assistance rendered to her was rendered within the three-mile limit as she was towed into Plymouth. I cannot, however, read the words "near the coasts" as covering a place twenty miles off the coasts. The same language is to be found in other sections of the Act, particularly sections 511 and 535, and I am of opinion that when the terms of these sections are considered the words "near the coasts" do not apply to such a case as that before me. Some limit must be placed on the term, and having regard to all the sections dealing with wreck and salvage as at present advised I think the limit should be the territorial limit, though it is not necessary in this case to express a final opinion upon the point. Nor is it necessary to decide whether section 546 would apply because part of the services was rendered within the territorial limit. It is in my opinion extremely doubtful whether the section could be made to apply on this ground to the facts of this case. I, however, uphold the defendant's main contention, and give judgment for him with costs.

CARLTON STEAMSHIP CO. v. CASTLE MAIL PACKETS CO. (a.)

Ship — Charter-party — Berth for loading—Order by charterers—"To load always afloat"—Detention—Tides—Liability.

A charter-party provided that a ship was to proceed to a certain dock at M., or so near thereto as she could safely get, and there load, always afloat, as and where ordered by the charterers. The character of the harbour at M. was such (as both parties were aware) that it was impossible to load always afloat. The ship proceeded to the named dock, and was ordered by the charterers to a berth where she loaded part of her cargo, but, in consequence of falling tides, left the dock for the necessary interval, and then returned and completed her cargo.

Held, that the charterers were not liable for the detention of the ship.

By Lord Herschell. — The obligations and rights created by the charter-party must be construed with reference to the natural conditions of the particular harbour specified as the place of loading by the charter-party.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (46 W. R. 68, [1897] 2 Q. B. 485) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Rigby, L.J.; A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting), reported 46 W. R. 68, [1897] 2 Q. B. 485, reversing that of Mathew, J., at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was brought by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Carlton, against the charterers, to recover damages in respect of detention of their ship.

The facts are set out at length in Lord Watson's judgment.

Robson, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the appellants.—The obligation under this charter to load began when the ship entered dock, and the reasonable time for loading must be calculated from that time. The charterer had made no provision to keep berth vacant. He could have done so had he pleased, and the onus of proof is on him, and here there is an absence of evidence. [They referred to Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., 23 W. R. 169, L. R. 10 C. P. 125; Geipel v. Smith, 20 W. R. 332, L. R. 7 Q. B. 404; Tapscott v. Balfour, 21 W. R. 245, L. R. 8 C. D. 165, 27 W. R. Dig. 199.] The respondents should have loaded continuously: Nielsen v. Wait, 34 W. R. 33, 16 Q. B. D. 67. The berth was not one suited for the purpose: The Alhambra, 29 W. R. 655, 6 P. D. 68; Shield v. Wilkins, 5 Exch. 304.

J. Walton, Q.C., and J. Fox, for the respondents, were not heard.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HERSCHELL.—[His lordship went through the facts of the case, and continued:] It is said that the charterers were bound to know the condition of the harbour, and that they were under some obligation in that respect which did not rest on the shipowner. I do not propose to discuss the extent of the knowledge of one party or the other. But I cannot see that the obligation is different in one case or the other, or that the charterer is specially bound to know the conditions of the harbour; because, without inquiring into the actual knowledge possessed, I can entertain no doubt that the obligations and rights created by the charter-party must be construed with reference to the natural conditions of the particular harbour, which is the place of loading according to the charter-party. It was suggested that there are cases in which particular berths are less favourable than others for loading cargoes, and that where the charterer has the right to name the berth it would be unreasonable that he should name a berth which would prolong the loading to the detriment of the shipowner. That is a question which I do not think it necessary to consider, because considerations would arise in that case which have no place in the present. The difficulty in the present case existed in respect not of a particular berth, but of the entire dock. The charter-party provides no lay days. The obligation, therefore, was to load within a reasonable time. The question is, What elements are to be taken into account where a vessel is to load within a reasonable time? The judgment in the case of Hick v. Raymond, in this House, clearly lays down the conditions, and it was there held that the obligation is performed within a time which is reasonable when the circumstances which caused delay are not imputable to personal fault or negligence; and Lord Watson stated that the rule as to reasonable time is not to be confined to contracts for goods to be carried by sea, but that a party must be held to have fulfilled his obligation so long as the delay is attributable to causes beyond his control, and he has acted neither negligently nor unreasonably. If that be the true test, it is difficult to see why the natural conditions of the harbour, which prevented the loading except after some delay, are not to be taken into account in determining whether there was unreasonable delay or not. It is said that you are not to take that into account, because the stipulation is inserted for the protection of the shipowner, and you ought to discuss the question of reasonable time as if there were no such stipulation. But there is no such thing as "reasonable time" in the abstract. The question is whether, having regard to all the stipulations of the contract and to all the conditions, there has been anything like negligence or wilful delay. It is quite inadmissible to shut out consideration of the actual circumstances. You must not exclude any terms of the contract between the parties. Taking the law to be as I have stated, is there any case here made out that the charterer took more than a reasonable time to load this vessel? It is admitted that the vessel could not by any human being have been loaded before she was in fact loaded. Then it is said that by this charter-party the charterer was bound as soon as the vessel arrived to name a berth where she could lie always afloat. But where is any such obligation to be found in the charter-party? There is no provision to that effect. If it exists, it can only be because that must be inferred to have been the intention of the parties. But it is impossible to find by implication in this contract any such condition. It is obvious that the time of the arrival of the vessel in the port depends largely upon the shipowner. Until she arrives the charterer has no control over her, and it is clear that in such a port the ship might arrive at a time when it would be impossible to name a place where she could load a cargo. It would be unreasonable to suppose that the parties contracted to accomplish the impossible. I am disposed to surmise that these contingencies were not foreseen. But we must consider the charter-party according to its terms. It is urged that it was hard upon the shipowner; that is naturally his view, but it can have no effect on the rights of the parties as they are to be ascertained. For these reasons I confess that I am unable to see any ground for differing from the decision of the Court of Appeal, and I move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—The respondent company had, on the 1st of February, 1897, contracted to provide steam tonnage for the conveyance of a quantity of material to be used in the construction of the Pretoria-Pietersburg Railway, from Maryport, and other ports in the United Kingdom or the Continent, to Delagoa Bay. With a view to part fulfilment of that contract, they, on the 22nd of February, 1897, chartered from the appellant company the steamship Carlton, about 4,000 tons burden. At the date of the charter-party The Carlton was at Barry, taking in her bunker coal, and by its terms she was to proceed "to Senhouse Dock, Maryport, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load in the customary manner (Sundays and holidays excepted), always afloat, as and where ordered by the said charterers, a full and complete cargo of rails and (or) accessories, say about 2,850 tons, and not more than 3,000 tons, and therewith proceed to Delagoa Bay." No time is specified for the arrival of The Carlton at Maryport beyond the expectation that she would reach that harbour on Wednesday, the 24th of February; but it was stipulated that in the event of the ship not being at their disposal at Maryport not later than the 5th of March, the charterers should have the option of cancelling the charter. It was by the charter-party provided that demurrage, if any, was to be paid for at the rate of £30 for each working day, "except in cases of strikes, lock-outs, labour disturbances, trade disputes, accidents, or other hindrances beyond charterers' control." The depth of water in the Senhouse Dock, Maryport, depends upon the state of the tides, and may be affected to some extent by the winds which happen to prevail at the time. Each period of high water lasts for about a fortnight, during which there may be a depth of upwards of 17 feet relied on. Between these periods there is an interval of six or seven days, during which the depth of water in the dock may not exceed 14 feet 6 inches in the morning, or 14 feet 7 inches in the evening. The Carlton arrived in the basin of Maryport Harbour on the night of Saturday, the 27th February, and on the morning of Sunday, the 28th, she went into the Senhouse Dock. At that time, owing to her bunker coal being on board, the ship was not upon an even keel, her draught forward being 11 feet and aft 17 feet 5 inches. On Monday, the 1st of March, the charterers' agent gave an order to the master in these terms, "You will please place your steamer into the middle berth east side Senhouse Dock, where your cargo is waiting shipment." From that time the controversy began which has developed into this litigation. On the evening of Friday, the 5th of March, The Carlton was admitted by the harbour-master to the berth to which she had been ordered, which had just been vacated by The Abermaed. At that date the current period of spring tides had so far elapsed that it had become impossible to begin and complete the loading of the ship before the return of the neaps. Between the Friday evening and the morning of Tuesday, the 9th of March, 675 tons of cargo were put on board, after which the ship drew 15 feet 9 inches forward and 16 feet 11 inches aft. The tides were then gradually ebbing, and even with the amount of cargo already on board, The Carlton could not have lain afloat in the dock during the neaps. Accordingly, on the Tuesday morning The Carlton left Maryport Dock and went to Barrow, where she offered to ship the remainder of the cargo. Whilst matters stood in that position an application was made to Mathew, J., to determine the relative rights and obligations of the shipowners and the charterers, but a compromise was effected, by which it was arranged that, without prejudice to the rights of either party, The Carlton should return to the Senhouse Dock at Maryport, there load the remainder of her cargo, and get away by the next spring tides after the 17th of March. In pursuance of that arrangement The Carlton returned to her berth in the Senhouse Dock upon the morning of Tuesday, the 16th of March, and immediately commenced loading. On Saturday, the 30th of March, she left the dock with 2,860 tons of rails on board. On the 12th of March, 1897, the appellants brought the present action, in which they claim demurrage or damages, in respect of (1) detention of their ship for fifteen days; (2) port and other charges during that period; and (3) dead freight upon the cargo short shipped. The third of these claims is not now insisted on, and need not be further noticed. Mathew, J., entered judgment for the appellants, for an amount to be agreed upon by the parties, or, in the case of their differing, to be settled by the court. His order was set aside, and judgment entered for the respondents, by a majority of the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Esher, M.R., and Rigby, L.J., Smith, L.J., dissenting. If The Carlton had reached Maryport, as their owners anticipated, on Wednesday, the 24th of February, she would, if her berth had been then available, have been able to lie afloat from the commencement to the completion of her loading; and it is clear that, had her loading not commenced until the 16th of March, the whole cargo might have been put on board continuously whilst she was afloat. The appellant company maintain that, under the charter-party, as soon as The Carlton arrived at Maryport it was the duty of the respondents forthwith to provide a berth for her, in which she could at once, and without any delay, proceed to take on board her cargo continuously, and then remain afloat until her loading was completed and she left her port. I do not think that any such obligation is imposed upon the respondents by the language of the charter-party, which is exceptional; and in construing the terms of that instrument it appears to me to be legitimate to take into account the fact, which was not disputed, that the character of the harbour of Maryport was known to the appellants as well as to the respondents. As was pointed out by Rigby, L.J., the correspondence produced shows that the owners of The Carlton were quite alive to the risk, if not the certainty, to which their ship was exposed of touching and resting upon the ground at some states of the tide. In my opinion the construction for which they contend is unreasonable and objectionable. It makes the nature of the obligation incumbent upon the charterers variable, and entirely dependent upon the time at which The Carlton might find it convenient or possible to arrive at the harbour. If she arrived about the commencement of a period of spring tides, it might not be difficult to find a berth for her at which she could begin and complete the loading of her cargo, she being during the whole time afloat. On the other hand, if she arrived towards the termination of the same period, it would be simply impossible to provide a berth for her in the Senhouse Dock where, if she began to take in cargo at once, she could remain afloat until her loading was completed. The charter-party does not contain any provision to the effect that the ship shall "lie afloat" at all times whilst she is in the harbour of Maryport. It merely provides that she is to "load in the customary manner, always afloat." These words, according to their natural meaning, go no farther than to impose a qualification of the charterers' right to load by negativing his right to put cargo on board except at times when the ship is afloat. In these circumstances I concur in the result which commended itself to the majority of the Appeal Court. I think that The Carlton was rightly directed to a berth where, if she had chosen to wait, she could have continued afloat until the whole of her cargo was continuously shipped; and that the respondents cannot be held responsible for delay occasioned by natural and physical causes which were beyond their control.

Lord MACNAGHTEN. — I am of the same opinion. Maryport is a tidal harbour. Tables are published showing the expected height of water for every day of the year. A shipowner may be presumed to know the draught of his own ship with the c rgo on board which he proposes to carry. It must, therefore, be taken that the shipowner in this case entered into the charter-party with the knowledge that in the ordinary course of navigation his ship, if she arrived at her destination at certain states of the tide, would be delayed in shipping her cargo, assuming that she was going to ship it (as provided by the contract) "always afloat." The substantial question is, Who is to suffer for that delay—the shipowner or the charterer? There is no special provision throwing the loss on the charterer. The loss has arisen in the ordinary course of navigation. And therefore, as it seems to me, the shipowner must bear it. I quite agree with the Court of Appeal in their view of the order which was given to the shipowner to proceed to the berth in Senhouse Dock. It seems to me to have been a proper and a reasonable order. It was for the shipowner to consider, having regard to the state of the tides, whether he would go to the berth at once and take in part of his cargo, or wait until he could ship the whole of it continuously "always afloat." To complete the loading, whether he began it at once or not, he would have to wait till the next spring tide—that, say Mathew, J., and Smith, L.J., is an unreasonable time to wait. I cannot understand how it can be unreasonable when it is the period required by the character of the harbour, the laws of nature, and the regular recurrence of spring tides. Having regard to the known accommodation of this harbour and upon this contract, it seems to me that it would be most unreasonable to hold that at the time when this vessel arrived, and in the state of the tides, the charterers were bound to provide a berth with a depth of water which both parties knew was physically impossible. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The port of Maryport is one at which vessels of a large draught can only be loaded at intervals, when high spring tides occur, and consequently a vessel of large tonnage arriving at an unsuitable time may have to submit to considerable delay before getting a cargo on board, if the owner requires that the loading shall be carried on and completed while the ship remains "always afloat." It appears to me that those who contract as charterers and shipowners in regard to such a port must alike be held to make their contract of charter-party with reference to the natural condition of the harbour. If they have failed to inform themselves, and to provide for circumstances which from the nature and configuration of the harbour may delay the loading of a ship, because the requisite depth of water can only be had at intervals when specially high tides occur, they may enter into improvident arrangements and agreements, but this cannot affect the legal construction of the contracts entered into as having reference to a harbour which has known disadvantages. Again, I further think that in the construction of the contract of carriage or charter-party no distinction can be drawn between the charterer who is to supply the cargo and the shipowner who is to load the ship. The latter has undertaken to ship and carry the cargo from a port where from the nature of the harbour delay more or less may occur according to circumstances, and particularly the time of arrival, and the berths or means of loading available, and the charterers' obligation, in the absence of special stipulation, is to furnish the cargo within a reasonable time on the ship's arrival. In my opinion the legal construction and effect of the charter-party in this case, in which the charterer is by the shipowner restricted as to the loading by the provision that during the loading the ship shall be "always afloat" is that, after notification that the ship has arrived at the port ready to receive cargo, the charterer became bound to furnish the cargo at a suitable berth when that could be had within a reasonable time; where, having regard to the draught of the ship and the depth of water which is available, the loading could be effected without causing the ship to ground; but that his obligation goes no further. The shipowner has stipulated that his vessel shall be loaded only when she can be kept afloat, and as from the nature of the harbour this can be done only when certain high tides occur, it seems to me to be clear that time lost after the arrival of the ship in waiting for the necessary tides and depth of water must be lost to the shipowner. The charterer has done all that is possible, and all that can, I think, be inferred from his obligation under the charter-party if he provides the cargo as soon as, having in view the nature of the harbour, the loading can be proceeded with and effected without grounding the ship. Accordingly I have only to add that the respondent in this case fulfilled this obligation. The contract admitted of being fulfilled in its very terms, although in certain contingencies delay would certainly occur in the loading. I can find no breach of contract on the part of the charterer. He could not, consistently with the shipowner's stipulation that the loading should take place only when the ship was afloat, do more than he did. The unfortunate delay was the result of a stipulation by the shipowner, necessary no doubt for the safety of his ship, but having made the stipulation he must bear the loss consequent on its fulfilment. The learned judge in the Court of Appeal who differed from the majority of the court, put the case of a delay in the loading which might last for six months, or one month, under such a charter-party as the present. It is difficult to suppose that any shipowner would make a contract so improvident as to produce this result. But with the utmost deference to the very learned judge, I can only say that even in such a case the responsibility of the charterer would not thereby be enlarged. The shipowner must still bear the consequence of the delay. But it may very well be that as the consequence of the adventure was found to be so disastrous to the shipowner, on the authority of the cases cited by Mr. Robson, he might be held entitled to abandon the contract and leave the harbour unloaded—a course which would certainly not entitle him to make a claim of damages like the present, in which no provision is made for such a contingency, nor even for a limited number of lay-days on the lapsing of which a claim for demurrage would arise.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith and Collins, L.JJ.) — Nov. 8.

WATSON v. PETTS. (a.)

Practice—Appeal from chambers—Court of Appeal—Matters of practice and procedure—Prohibition to county court—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 4.

Where a judge at chambers has made an order either granting or refusing an application for a writ of prohibition to a county court, the appeal from such order lies to the Divisional Court, and not direct to the Court of Appeal.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of Lawrance, J., at chambers, refusing to grant a writ of prohibition to restrain a county court judge from proceeding further on an order made by him.

The order of the county court judge directed the defendant to pay costs in a matter which, the defendant alleged, was beyond the jurisdiction of the county court judge.

Clarke Hall, for the plaintiff, took a preliminary objection.—The appeal lies to the Divisional Court and not to this court. The refusal to grant a writ of prohibition is not a matter of practice or procedure within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894.

He referred also to section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

J. M. Stone, for the defendant.—The appeal is rightly brought to this court. This is a matter of practice and procedure within the meaning of the Act. It involves an important question as to the practice and procedure of the county court.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We have had an opportunity of consulting with our brother Lords Justices, with the exception of Rigby, L.J., on the point raised, which is whether, when an application is made at chambers for an order to prohibit a county court judge from proceeding further in a matter before him, and that application is refused, the appeal is to the Queen's Bench Division or direct to the Court of Appeal. This depends on the question whether an application for a prohibition to restrain an inferior court from exceeding its jurisdiction is a matter of practice or procedure within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894. We are of opinion that it is not, and that the appeal therefore is to the Divisional Court and not to this court in the first instance. The practice and procedure mentioned in the section covers matters of practice and procedure in connection with a cause or matter in the High Court, and not a matter in which a county court judge is sought to be prohibited from exceeding his jurisdiction in his court. In this case it is said that the county court judge did something in his court without jurisdiction, and an application is made to a judge at chambers, not in any cause or matter in the High Court, but in relation to that which the county court judge did in his court. Sub-section 4 does not apply, and the appeal from the order made on that application must go to the Divisional Court and not to this court, because it is not transferred by that sub-section direct to this court.

Preliminary objection allowed.

REG. v. THE JUDGE OF THE NORTHALLERTON COUNTY COURT. (a.)

*Bankruptcy—County court—Jurisdiction of county court judge in bankruptcy—*Certiorari—Order for arrest of debtor—"Has absconded or is about to abscond"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 25, 100, 102 (2)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 7.

A writ of certiorari does not lie to bring up an order made by a county court judge sitting in bankruptcy.

The effect of section 25 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as amended by section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is that an order may be made for the arrest of a debtor if, after a bankruptcy notice or a bankruptcy petition, it appears to the court that there is probable reason for believing that the debtor has absconded before, or has absconded or is about to abscond after, the notice or petition for any of the purposes mentioned in the section.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wright and Darling, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash a warrant issued by the judge of the Northallerton County Court for the arrest of a debtor under section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On the 23rd of April, 1898, a petition in bankruptcy was presented against the debtor, Frederick Herbert Skinner, in the Northallerton County Court.

On the 9th of May a receiving order was made, and on the same day the official receiver posted a notice to the debtor's address requiring him to attend a meeting of his creditors on the 11th of May.

The debtor having made default in attending the meeting, an application was made to the county court judge on the 13th of May for an order directing a warrant to be issued for his arrest under section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Sub-section 1 (a) of that section enacts that the court may by warrant cause a debtor to be arrested, "if after a bankruptcy notice has been issued under this Act, or after presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him, it appears to the court that there is probable reason for believing that he is about to abscond with a view of avoiding payment of the debt in respect of which the bankruptcy notice was issued, or of avoiding service of a bankruptcy petition, or of avoiding appearance to any such petition, or of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs, or of otherwise avoiding, delaying, or embarrassing proceedings in bankruptcy against him."

Section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, enacts as follows: "Section twenty-five of the principal Act (relating to the arrest of a debtor under certain circumstances) shall be read and construed as if the words 'believing that he has absconded or is about to abscond' were substituted for the words 'believing that he is about to abscond.'"

On the hearing of the application evidence was given showing that on the 12th of April, 1898, the debtor was insolvent and was being pressed by his creditors, and that on that day he departed from his dwelling-house for the purpose of delaying his creditors and escaping payment of his debts.

The county court judge made an order directing a warrant to be issued for the arrest of the debtor, and a warrant was issued accordingly. The warrant recited that "by evidence taken upon oath it hath been made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that there is probable reason to suspect and believe that the said Frederick Herbert Skinner is avoiding examination in respect of his affairs, and is otherwise delaying or embarrassing the proceedings in bankruptcy against him."

The debtor was arrested under this warrant on the 31st of May, but three days later he was released on his making an affidavit of apology and undertaking to give all information which might be required.

The debtor then obtained a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari on the grounds that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to order the warrant to be issued, and that it was irregular on the face of it.

The Divisional Court discharged the rule, on the ground that by section 100 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a county court judge exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction had all the powers of a judge of the High Court, and therefore, on the principle of the decision in the case of In re New Par Consols (Limited), 46 W. R. 369, [1898] 1 Q. B. 669, a writ of certiorari would not lie to bring up an order made by a county court judge exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction.

The debtor appealed.

R. G. Glenn and Horridge, for the debtor.—The warrant was issued without jurisdiction. First, there was no evidence that the debtor had absconded or was about to abscond for any of the purposes mentioned in section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act. Secondly, if he did abscond at all, it was not after the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, as required by sub-section 1 (a), but before it. The words "after a bankruptcy notice has been issued under this Act, or after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him" are words governing the whole of the sub-section, even when it is amended by section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. The warrant is also bad on the face of it, in that it does not state that the debtor absconded or was about to abscond. This case is not governed by In re New Par Consols (Limited), for in that case the county court judge was not acting outside his powers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 31.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The question in this case is whether the Divisional Court was right in refusing a certiorari to bring up to be quashed a warrant of arrest under which the applicant, Skinner, had been arrested and subsequently discharged. I agree with what my brother Wright said as to the inutility of the application, for Skinner, long before the motion was made on his behalf, had been discharged from custody; but as the point is brought up here upon appeal, and stoutly argued for the applicant, it must be determined. Skinner is a solicitor, and in the month of April, 1898, he was in embarrassed circumstances and upon the 12th of that month he left his home. His uncle gave evidence, which was before the learned county court judge, that Skinner was upon the 12th of April hopelessly insolvent, that his creditors were pressing him, and that the uncle believed that Skinner had departed from his dwelling-house for the purpose of delaying his creditors and escaping payment of his debts. This and other like evidence being before the county court judge sitting in bankruptcy, he had ample evidence upon which to find as he did that Skinner had absconded, which gave him jurisdiction to order the issue of a warrant for the arrest of the applicant, under section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as amended by section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, assuming that those sections taken together have not the limitation now contended for on behalf of the applicant. It is said that these sections gave no jurisdiction to the learned county court judge to order the issue of a warrant — first, because there was no evidence to give ground for believing that Skinner had absconded or was about to abscond with a view of avoiding payment of his debts; but this point is totally untenable in fact; and secondly, because the county court judge sitting in bankruptcy could only order the issue of a warrant of arrest if a debtor was about to abscond after a bankruptcy notice had been issued or after presentation of a bankruptcy petition, and, as Mr. Skinner left his home before either the one or the other, his arrest was ordered without jurisdiction. In my judgment, section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was enacted by way of amendment to section 25 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to meet this point. Section 25 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, coupled with section 7 of the Act of 1890, reads thus: "If after a bankruptcy notice has been issued under this Act, or after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, it appears to the court that there is probable reason for believing that the debtor has absconded or is about to abscond," then a warrant may be granted. The words "has absconded," when taken in conjunction with "about to abscond," are in my judgment without limitation as to time, and mean has absconded before, or has absconded or is about to abscond after the notice or petition; and, indeed, what good reason is there to induce the court to hold that there is no jurisdiction to order the issue of a warrant if the debtor has absconded the day before the notice or petition, whereas there is jurisdiction if he absconds or is about to abscond the day after? I see no sense in this, and in my judgment the Solicitor-General is right upon his construction of these two sections taken together. A third point was then taken for the applicant, and it was said that the warrant was bad upon its face, because it did not show the offence committed by the debtor. Be it so. But the county court judge was sitting in bankruptcy when he made the order for the issue of the warrant, and this is beyond dispute. Now, what is his jurisdiction when sitting in bankruptcy? By section 92 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it is enacted that "the courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy shall be the High Court and the county courts." By section 93 (1) it is enacted, "From and after the commencement of this Act the London Bankruptcy Court shall be united and consolidated with and form part of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and the jurisdiction of the London Bankruptcy Court shall be transferred to the High Court." By section 100, "A county court shall for the purposes of its bankruptcy jurisdiction in addition to the ordinary powers of the court have all the powers and jurisdiction of the High Court, and the orders of the court may be enforced accordingly in manner prescribed." By section 102 (2),

"A court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act shall not be subject to be restrained in the execution of its powers under this Act by the order of any other court, nor shall any appeal lie from its decisions except in manner directed by this Act." And by section 104 (1), "Every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act may review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction." In my judgment the result of these sections is that the position of a county court judge sitting in bankruptcy and exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction and acting within that jurisdiction is a position similar to that of a judge of the High Court exercising his jurisdiction, and that, as long as a county court judge is exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction, the remedy by which to question an order made by such a judge, when exercising such jurisdiction, if such order requires alteration or amendment, is by application to the judge himself sitting in bankruptcy, and then perhaps by appeal to the Divisional Court, and not by certiorari to bring up the order into the Queen's Bench Division. This is the procedure which this court held in the case of In re New Par Consols to be the proper procedure under sections in the Winding-up Acts, which as to this are equivalent to section 100 in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The present case appears to me to be even a stronger case than In re New Par Consols, and for the reasons above given I think that this appeal should be dismissed, and with costs.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: Having regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of In re New Par Consols, a decision which binds this court, I do not see how it can possibly be said that the order of the county court judge can be made the subject of a writ of certiorari by the Queen's Bench Division, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed. In that case it was held by the Court of Appeal that, inasmuch as a county court judge had jurisdiction to wind up the company and had for the purposes of that jurisdiction all the powers of the High Court, and was therefore for that purpose placed on an equal footing with the judge of the High Court, the prohibition would not lie, and I agree with A. L. Smith, L.J., that on the principle of that decision a writ of certiorari cannot be issued to bring up the order of the county court judge exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and, I think, could not be brought up, even though the county court judge might have misconstrued the section under which he purported to issue the warrant in question, or even though the warrant in question might have been bad on the face of it as being based ex facie and by its terms on facts which, under the Bankruptcy Acts, would not have justified the issue of the warrant of arrest, or had been based upon affidavits which did not disclose any conduct of the debtor justifying the arrest. It is sufficient to say that the Queen's Bench Division has no power to prohibit a judge of the High Court or to issue a certiorari to bring up his order, nor, according to the decision in the New Par Consols case, to prohibit the county court judge or bring up his order in a matter in respect of which he is by statute invested with the powers of the High Court, and therefore placed on an equal footing with a judge of the High Court. The cases in which a certiorari has gone to bring up the order of an inferior court exceeding its jurisdiction, even when a certiorari has been taken away by statute, do not seem to me to touch the present case, because the basis of the decision in the New Par Consols case was that the judge of the county court exercising jurisdiction in a matter in which the statute gave him seisin was not an inferior court, because in such a matter the statute gave him all the powers of a judge of the High Court. This being so, it is not necessary for me to express any opinion on the decision which binds me or upon any of the contentious impeaching the order of arrest to which I have referred, or as to how far the issue of the writ is discretionary. A judge of the High Court in the exercise of his jurisdiction cannot be controlled by writs of prohibition or certiorari, but only by appeal, and if the county court judge in the exercise of bankruptcy jurisdiction is, as would seem to be the case from the decision in In re New Par Consols, placed on an equal footing, he is judge of law and fact, and his judgments are subject to appeal only and cannot be reviewed by certiorari. This is not a case in which it is, or could be, suggested that the particular bankruptcy is a matter not coming within the cognizance of the particular county court, the judge of the county court being, according to the principle of the decision in In re New Par Consols, a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction with the judges of the High Court. The question whether this particular debtor has by his conduct rendered himself liable, under the Bankruptcy Acts, to be arrested is a question depending partly on law and partly on fact, which question, according to the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts, the county court as a High Court is to decide, subject only to that appeal to the Divisional Court or with leave to higher courts which is given in the matter. If the first step is right—that is, if In re New Par Consols is rightly decided in principle—all the rest seems to follow of necessity.

Appeal dismissed.

WOOLF v. HAMILTON. (a.)

Gaming—Betting—Horse-racing—Cheque given in payment of bets—Holder for value with notice—Illegal consideration—9 Anne, c. 14, s. 1—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 1.

A cheque was drawn by the defendant in payment of bets lost by him to the payee upon horse-races, and was indorsed for value by the payee to the plaintiff, who had notice of the consideration for which it was drawn.

Held, that the cheque must be deemed to have been drawn upon an illegal consideration, and that the plaintiff, who had notice thereof, could not recover upon it.

Appeal from the judgment of Darling, J., in favour of the defendant at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover £84 3s. 9d. upon a dishonoured cheque which had been drawn by the defendant, payable to the order of Wilson, and indorsed by Wilson to the plaintiff for value. The cheque was given to Wilson in payment of bets lost by the defendant to him upon horse-races, and the plaintiff took the cheque with knowledge thereof. Darling, J., held that, as the plaintiff took the cheque with notice of the consideration, he could not recover, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Ritter (F. W. Sherwood with him), for the plaintiff.—The cheque, being given for a bet on a horse-race, must be deemed to have been given for a void consideration—that is, without consideration, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18. But a holder for value can recover on it. A horse-race is not a game within 9 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, which makes bills and other securities given for money won at gaming at cards, &c., or other game or games, or by betting on the games, void. Horse-races were expressly mentioned in 16 Car. 2, c. 7, and section 3 of that statute made bills and other securities for bets exceeding £100 void. That Act has, however, been repealed by section 15 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 1, repealed so much of the statute of Anne as enacted that any note, bill, or mortgage should be absolutely void, and enacted that every note, bill, or mortgage which would have been absolutely void under those statutes should be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed for an illegal consideration. There are certain old cases—Goodburn v. Marley, 2 Stra. 1159; Lynall v. Longbothom, 2 Wils. 36; and Blaxton v. Pye, 2 Wils. 309—which decided that horse-racing was a game within 9 Anne, c. 14, but those cases were wrongly decided, and are not binding upon this court. Applegarth v. Colley, 10 M. & W. 723, merely followed the older authorities upon this point.

He also referred to Lilley v. Rankin, 56 L. J. Q. B. 248, 35 W. R. Dig. 169.

F. Shewell Cooper (G. A. Cave-Orme with him), for the defendant, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action upon a cheque given in payment of bets lost on horse-races, the plaintiff being an indorsee for value who took the cheque with notice of the above fact. The learned judge held that the plaintiff could not recover. It has been decided in more than one case that horse-racing is a "game" within 9 Anne, c. 14. Horse-racing was expressly mentioned in 16 Car. 2, c. 7, a statute which has now been repealed, and the cases have decided that the games contemplated in the statute of Anne are the same as those referred to in the statute of Charles 2. Therefore horse-racing comes within the statute of Anne. We cannot overrule those authorities even if we did not agree with them, seeing that Parliament has been legislating about these matters upon several occasions, and has never touched those decisions. That being so, the case becomes clear. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 1, has repealed so much of the statute of Anne as declared that any note, bill, or mortgage should be absolutely void, and enacted that every such bill, note, or mortgage should be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed for an illegal consideration. The effect of that is that a person who gives value for a bill or note with notice that it was originally given for an illegal consideration cannot recover upon it. A cheque given in payment of a bet lost upon horse-racing is deemed to have been given for an illegal consideration, and the person who takes it with notice, though he gave value for it, cannot recover upon it.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I will only add one passage from the judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J., in Hay v. Ayling, 16 Q. B. 423, at p. 431: "As the law now stands the illegality of the gaming consideration would be immaterial to a bonâ fide holder without notice of the consideration; but the plea goes on to allege (what was distinctly proved) that the plaintiff, before and at the several times when the bills were made and accepted, had notice of the premises aforesaid, and took the said bills from the defendant with the said notice." In that case the bills of exchange were given in payment of a bet lost upon a horse-race.

SEA INSURANCE CO. v. BLOGG. (a.)

Insurance, marine — Steamers "sailing on or after the 1st of March"—"Sailing," what constitutes—Attachment of risk.

The plaintiff company were reinsured on flour in steamers "sailing on or after the 1st of March." A steamer completed her loading alongside a wharf in a river about 10 p.m. on the 29th of February. The steamer was then moved a short distance out into mid-stream, where she anchored till 8 a.m. on the 1st of March, when she proceeded down the river on her voyage. By leaving the wharf on the previous evening the steamer was placed in a more advantageous position for making a start, but the master's sole intention in moving the steamer was to prevent the crew from leaving the steamer during the night. The steamer and her cargo having become a total loss,

Held, that the steamer sailed on the 1st of March, and not on the 29th of February, and that the loss was covered by the policy.

Appeal of the defendant from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover a total loss on cargo per steamship Massasoit under a policy of reinsurance subscribed by the defendant and other underwriters. By that policy the plaintiffs were reinsured "at and from ports in the United States to ports in Europe" on flour per "steamers as attached sailing on and after the 1st of March, 1896." Amongst the declarations attached to the policy was one on flour per The Massasoit on a voyage from Newport News, James River, Virginia, to London.

In February, 1896, The Massasoit was loading her cargo alongside a wharf at Newport News. The loading was finished between 9 and 10 p.m. on the 29th of February. By a rule of the pilotage authorities of the port foreign-going vessels are not allowed to go to sea after dark, owing to the difficulties of navigation and the absence of leading lights in the river. After the loading was finished the master moved The Massasoit about five hundred yards out from the wharf into mid-stream where the vessel remained at anchor until the following morning. This was done in order to prevent the crew from going on shore and getting drunk. The Massasoit had cleared at the custom house before she finished loading, but in accordance with the usual practice of the port a custom house officer was on board when she left the wharf and he remained on board until about 8 a.m. on the 1st of March, when he went ashore and the vessel proceeded to sea. The Massasoit and her cargo eventually became a total loss.

By being anchored in the stream a vessel would gain an advantage of a few minutes in getting under way as against another vessel starting from alongside the wharf, but the master, when he moved the vessel on the 29th of February, was not influenced by that consideration.

Mathew, J., held that The Massasoit sailed on the 1st of March, 1896, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Pickford, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the defendant.—The question is, did the vessel sail on the 29th of February or on the 1st of March. When she left the wharf on the 29th of February she had finished loading, and was ready for sea, and she was placed in a more advantageous position for proceeding down the river on the following day. That is sufficient to constitute the leaving of the wharf an act of "sailing." It is immaterial that the master knew that he could only proceed a short distance that evening, or that one of his objects in leaving the wharf was to keep the crew on board during the night.

They cited Pittegrew v. Pringle, 3 B. & Ad. 514; Cockrane v. Fisher, 2 Cr. & M. 581, 1 Cr. M. & R. 809; Moir v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., 3 M. & Sel. 461; "The City of Cambridge," 22 W. R. 578, L. R. 5 P. C. 451; "The Cachapool," 7 P. D. 217, 30 W. R. Dig. 190; Lang v. Anderdon, 3 B. & C. 495.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Carver, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The question whether any particular act constitutes a "sailing" or not depends on the intention with which that act was done. In this case the learned judge has rightly inferred from the evidence that when the master left the wharf on the 29th of February he had no intention of sailing.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether the ship, the goods on which were reinsured by the defendant, sailed before the 1st of March. If she did the loss is not covered by the policy. Cockrane v. Fisher and the other cases cited show that the question to be considered is, What was the intention with which the particular act was done which is said to constitute the sailing? That is, I think, quite clear. We must see, therefore, whether there is any evidence on which it could be found that when the master moved the ship from the quay side on the 29th of February it was his intention that the ship should then sail. In my opinion the evidence shows conclusively that there was no such intention, but that the intention was to sail on the 1st of March. It has been suggested on behalf of the defendant that because the ship went 500 yards out into the stream on that evening, she must be regarded as having then commenced her voyage. I agree that a ship may move from alongside a wharf and go a short distance and then stop, and nevertheless be held to have begun her voyage, but I think that in this case there was no intention to sail before the 1st of March. In my opinion the judgment of Mathew, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. The question is one of intention. It cannot be said that whenever a ship goes a short way from her moorings she has commenced her voyage. If that were so, I do not see how any question could have arisen in the case of Cockrane v. Fisher. I agree that if a ship goes out of port and anchors near the bar in order to get the utmost advantage from the tide, the voyage must be considered to have begun when the ship first started.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I think that in these cases the intention with which the act was done should be deduced as far as possible from the facts of the case and not from the evidence as to what was afterwards said to have been the intention. Further, I think that if a ship is ready to start on her voyage, with her loading completed and her crew all on board, and she moves from alongside the wharf where she has been loading, and goes a short distance on her voyage and is prevented by some physical reason from going further, then, in the absence of any further evidence, the inference to be drawn is that the ship has sailed within the meaning of that word in a policy of insurance. But I entirely agree that there must be a sailing which is intended to be a commencement of the voyage, and if a ship is not ready to start, that is evidence to show that the sailing is not a commencement of the voyage. It seems to me that although a primâ facie case of sailing has been established in this case by showing the condition of the ship at the time she started from the wharf; and by showing that her stay during the night in the river was caused by the regulations of the port, yet in my opinion the inference as to the voyage having commenced on the 29th of February is negatived when the whole of the evidence is looked at. The facts account for the moving of the ship into the middle of the river quite independently of any intention to commence the voyage at that time; under these circumstances I think that the inference drawn by Mathew, J., from the evidence was right.

WAUTON v. COPPARD. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Restrictive covenant—Construction—Injurious or offensive or disagreeable noise or nuisance—Carrying on school—Action for rescission of contract.

W. entered into negotiations with the defendant's agent for the purchase of a house for the purpose of carrying on a boys' school, and was induced to enter into a contract to purchase the house by his representing that there was no covenant which would interfere with W's carrying on his school there. W. subsequently discovered that the house was subject to a covenant which, after specially restraining certain trades or businesses from being carried on, provided that there should not be carried on upon the premises any trade or business or occupation whatsoever whereby (inter alia) any injurious or offensive or disagreeable noise or nuisance should or might be occasioned, caused, or made. He thereupon brought an action for rescission of the contract, and return of the deposit made by him, with interest.

Held, that the covenant was not limited to trades or businesses ejusdem generis as those specifically mentioned; that the carrying on of a boys' school would come within the prohibition of the covenant; that the agent's representation was as to a fact, and not a mere statement of law; and, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed in his action.

Wauton, a schoolmaster, entered into negotiations with the defendant's agent for the purchase of a freehold house and grounds at Tunbridge Wells for the purpose of carrying on a boys' school there. He made particular inquiries of the defendant's agent as to whether there were any covenants affecting the premises which would prevent his using the place as a boys' school, and he was in substance informed by the agent that there was no covenant which would interfere with his so doing.

He had several interviews with the agent, in the course of which the existence of a deed of covenants of the 3rd of November, 1851, relating to the property of which the said premises formed part was disclosed, but the plaintiff was told that he could not inspect the deed, which was in London, and was assured that it imposed no restriction which would interfere with the plaintiff's carrying on a boys' school on the said premises. The plaintiff thereupon signed an offer written upon certain particulars and conditions of sale of the said premises, which contained a statement that the property was subject to the covenants contained in the said deed of the 3rd of November, 1851, and the purchase was to be completed on the terms of these conditions so far as they applied to a sale by private treaty. On the day after this offer was made, it was accepted by the defendant "subject to the conditions named."

After the plaintiff had contracted to purchase the premises and paid a deposit, the deed of covenants was produced, and was found to contain a covenant to the following effect—namely, that each of them the covenantor and the several other persons who might become parties thereto of the second part, his, her, or their heirs or assigns, or any of them (inter alia) should not and would not suffer to be exercised or carried on upon or in any part of the land therein referred to or any house or building thereon to be erected or built the trade or business of a melter or boiler of tallow or grease or resin or tar or any greasy substance or compound for any purpose whatsoever, gas maker or worker, blacksmith, tin worker, coppersmith, brickmaker, lime burner, slaughterman, catgut spinner, dog skinner, boiler of horseflesh, soap maker, beershop keeper, brewer, scavenger, cowkeeper, or any trade or business or occupation whatsoever whereby any unwholesome or offensive or disagreeable smell, or gas, or unwholesome or offensive or disagreeable matter deposit or fluid, or any injurious or offensive or disagreeable noise or nuisance should, or might be collected, occasioned, caused, or made.

The plaintiff thereupon gave the defendant notice to rescind the contract, and demanding a return of the deposit, which was refused. The writ in the above action was then issued claiming rescission of the contract and return of the deposit with interest at 4 per cent.

Neville, Q.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiff.—This covenant will be construed like the restrictive covenant in Tod-Heatly v. Benham, 37 W. R. 38, 40 Ch. D. 80, and the observations on the scope of that covenant show that it would not be safe to carry on a school on premises subject to such a covenant. The plaintiff had no fair opportunity of ascertaining that the property was subject to the restrictive covenant, and cannot be taken to have had notice of it: Reeve v. Berridge, 36 W. R. 517, 20 Q. B. D. 523. The defendant's agent stated that there was nothing to prevent the property being used for a school, but the covenant would be a substantial interference with such user, and the plaintiff, who relied on this representation, is entitled to rescission of the contract: Mullens v. Miller, 31 W. R. 559, 22 Ch. D. 194; see also Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., vol. 1, p. 106.

Warmington, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and Ribton, for the defendant.—Reeve v. Berridge does not apply to a covenant in a conveyance. It was a case of purchase of a lease, and the usual covenants in a lease are well known: see Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant, 16th ed., p. 127. But the purchaser was held not to have constructive notice of unusual covenants where he had not a fair opportunity of seeing the lease. The plaintiff was not misled by the statements of the defendant's agent, and on the true construction of the covenant there is nothing to prevent the use of the property for a properly-conducted school. The alleged misrepresentation, moreover, was in point of law merely, not in point of fact, and nobody can be made liable for it: Beattie v. Ebury (Lord), 20 W. R. 994, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 777, at p. 802. In Tod-Heatly v. Benham, Lindley, L.J., doubted Bacon, V.C.'s, decision in Harrison v. Good, 19 W. R. 346, L. R. 11 Eq. 338, that "nuisance" in a covenant meant legal nuisance; but the doubt was obiter, and the decision stands. Bacon, V.C., there held that the carrying on of a national school was not a legal nuisance. But the covenant here is against the carrying on of certain trades only, and the true construction requires the general words to be restricted to noise and nuisance arising from the trades mentioned or similar trades.

They also referred to Scott v. Alvarez, 43 W. R. 694, [1895] 2 Ch. 603.

Neville replied.

Nov. 8.—ROMER, J., held, on the evidence, that the plaintiff was induced to enter into the contract by the representation made to him by the defendant's agent, and that what the agent in substance represented, and what the plaintiff understood the representation to be, was that the covenants in the deed of covenants would not interfere with the plaintiff in carrying on his school on the property. [His lordship then stated the covenants, and said as follows:] In my opinion, as a matter of construction, the deed means what it says, and the covenants cannot be held limited to trades or businesses ejusdem generis as those previously specially mentioned: see Tod-Heatly v. Benham. The next question is whether the covenants will interfere with the plaintiff in carrying on his school in an ordinary and reasonable way. Now, I am satisfied that if the plaintiff should be compelled to carry out the contract and proceed to carry on his school in the ordinary way, he will immediately have an action brought against him by the adjoining proprietors to restrain him from doing so on the ground that thereby a disagreeable, if not an injurious or offensive, noise or nuisance is caused or made, and I think that action would succeed. But putting aside the evidence before me as to what action or actions particular adjoining owners have threatened or are likely to bring, what I have to consider is, following in substance the words of Cotton, L.J., in Tod-Heatly v. Benham, 40 Ch. D., at p. 94, whether I am satisfied by argument and the evidence before me that reasonable people living near, having regard to the ordinary use of their houses for pleasurable enjoyment, could and would regard the carrying on of this school in the ordinary way on these premises as causing an injurious, offensive, or disagreeable noise or nuisance. And after hearing the arguments and on the evidence before me I answer this question in the affirmative. But then it is said on the defendant's behalf that the agent's representation only amounted to a statement as to a point of law—namely, as to the true construction of the deed, and that though the plaintiff might successfully resist an action against him for specific performance, he is not entitled by reason of the agent's representation to have the contract rescinded. But, in my opinion, the agent's representation to the plaintiff, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, was a statement as to a fact. The agent was not asked by the plaintiff as to the construction of the deed, or on any question of law, but merely whether, as a fact, there were any covenants affecting the property having regard to the purpose for which the plaintiff wanted it. And the agent chose to take upon himself to answer this question in the negative. No doubt he did not intend to deceive the plaintiff, and believed his answer to be correct. But the plaintiff is not concerned with what induced the agent's belief, and even if that belief arose from the agent wrongly construing the deed or making a legal mistake, it would not concern the plaintiff, or enable the defendant to say that as between the agent and the plaintiff the misrepresentation was only one of law. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that in this case the contract has been induced by a misrepresentation of fact made by the defendant's agent, and this being so, it is clear that the plaintiff is entitled in equity to rescission of the contract, even though the misrepresentation was not made fraudulently. I therefore decree rescission of the contract, and order repayment of the deposit with interest at 4 per cent., and the defendant must pay the costs of the action.

MACLEOD v. POWER. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Action against two joint debtors—Judgment by consent against one defendant—Continuance of action against the other — Merger — Pleading—Costs.

If in an action brought against two joint debtors one of the two submits to judgment, the claim against the other is merged in the judgment, and the plaintiff cannot obtain a second judgment against the remaining defendant.

The rule in King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494 (as explained by Bowen, L.J., in In re Hodgson, 34 W. R. 127, 31 Ch. D. 177), applied.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff claimed against the two defendants, Power and Perrins, the principal sum of £1,000 and the delivery of 24,500 shares in the South African Saltpetre Fields (Limited), or their nominal value in cash, with damages for their detention, or, in the alternative, specific performance of the agreements between the defendants and plaintiff.

The facts of the case, so far as they relate to the only point in the action calling for report, are as follow:

The plaintiff delivered his statement of claim on the 14th of November, 1896. The defendant Perrins delivered a statement of defence on the 13th of January, 1897, and Power on the 26th of January, 1897.

Perrins subsequently admitted his liability, and on a motion for judgment, on the 7th of August, 1897, judgment was given against him. The action was continued against Power, who did not amend his pleadings by stating that judgment in the action had been given against Perrins.

Eve, Q.C., and H. Spensley, jun., for the plaintiff, opened the case.

Frank Dodd, for the defendant Power. — The plaintiff's cause of action is merged in the judgment which he has obtained against our co-defendant, and he cannot now proceed to obtain a further judgment: Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504. In that case the judgment had been given in another action; but the rule laid down is that if two persons are jointly liable, and judgment is obtained against one, the cause of action is merged in the judgment: King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494. This rule still holds, although there are two exceptions now admitted in the rules. Under R. S. C., ord. 13, r. 4, when a writ of summons is indorsed for a liquidated demand and there are several defendants, of whom one or more appear to the writ, and another or others of whom fail to appear, the plaintiff may enter judgment against such of them as have not appeared, without prejudice to proceed with his action against such of them as have appeared. Under R. S. C., ord. 14, r. 5, when one defendant has a good defence and the other has not, and ought not to be permitted to defend, the plaintiff may issue judgment against the latter without prejudice to his right to proceed against the former. [He also referred to ord. 16, r. 5: Odell v. Cormack, 19 Q. B. D. 223, 35 W. R. Dig. 35.] The very fact that these special exceptions are made, proves that the old rule still exists. [BYRNE, J., referred to the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in In re Hodgson, Beckett v. Ramsdale, 34 W. R. 127, 31 Ch. D. 177.]

Eve, Q.C., and H. Spensley, jun., for the plaintiff. —The rule on which the defendant relies is a highly technical one. The present case is distinguishable, however, from all the cases in which it has been applied. There is no recorded case in which this rule has been applied to a judgment obtained in the same action. They were all cases in which the judgment had been obtained in a former action. [They referred to Weall v. James, 68 L. T. 54.] As to In re Hodgson, the judgment of Bowen, L.J., deals with the liability of partners. The reason for the rule, and which, in fact, called it into existence, is that it was unfair to bring two separate actions against joint contractors. In the present case the defendant Power has in no way been prejudiced by the judgment against Perrins. [They also referred to Wegg Prosser v. Evans, 43 W. R. 66, [1895] 1 Q. B. 108; Munster v. Cox, 34 W. R. 461, 10 App. Cas. 680; and Hammond v. Schofield, [1891] 1 Q. B. 453, 39 W. R. Dig. 58.] In any case the defendant ought to have amended his defence under ord. 14, r. 5, and he is, in any event, not entitled to costs.

Dodd, in reply.—There cannot be two judgments for the same cause of action. Whether the action is brought against one or two debtors there can only be one judgment. As soon as a judgment is signed the cause of action is gone. The Rules of the Supreme Court have made certain exceptions; but these exceptions cannot apply to the present case, and therefore the old rule holds.

BYRNE, J.—The plaintiff sues in this action in respect of a claim against two co-contractors. The joint contractors are both made defendants, and before the action comes on for hearing, judgment is signed against one of the two. I have here to decide whether the old rule laid down in King v. Hoare, and recognized in Kendall v. Hamilton, is applicable to the present case. The rule is stated by Bowen, L.J., in In re Hodgson in the following words (31 Ch. D., at p. 188): "It appears to me to be of considerable importance to bear in mind exactly what Kendall v. Hamilton did and what it did not decide. Now, in order to do that in a few words I should like to consider the rights in equity, as distinguished from the rights in law, of the creditors of a joint debtor. The common law principle that a judgment recovered against a joint debtor is a bar to a further action to be prosecuted against another joint debtor is explained at length in the case of King v. Hoare. There is in the cases of joint contract and joint debt, as distinguished from the cases of joint and several contract and joint and several debt, only one cause of action. The party injured may sue at law all the joint contractors or he may sue one, subject in the latter case to the right of the single defendant to plead in abatement; but whether an action in the case of a joint debt is brought against one debtor or against all the debtors, or continued against one debtor or all the debtors—there is only one cause of action. This rule, though the advantage or disadvantage of it may have been questioned in times long past, has now passed into the law of this country. I should only wish to observe that, whether or no the rule by the light of pure reason, and unassisted by authority, might or might not have recommended itself to modern minds, the rule is by no means a technical rule. It is based, rightly or wrongly, on the idea that a joint debtor has a right to demand, if he pleases, that he shall be sued at one and the same time with all his co-debtors. To enforce this right he is only entitled to plead in abatement, but the right is one of considerable business value, and is so recognized by the law. In order to protect each of the joint debtors, the law treats the cause of action as being a joint one, and as capable of being merged whenever it is pursued to a judgment. It is absorbed and merged in the judgment which is secured against one of the debtors not only as against him but against all the rest, and the object is to prevent the prejudice which the law conceives might arise to a joint debtor who is not being sued if he were left with future litigation still hanging over his head."

This is a clear statement of the rule, which is also confirmed by other cases. The rule is now so established that it would be impossible to argue against it if it were the case of separate actions brought against joint contractors. It is, however, urged that the action having been properly conceived and properly brought, and both joint contractors having been sued for the same cause of action, that the mere fact of the plaintiff taking judgment against one of them by consent, ought not to stop the taking of judgment also against the other in the ordinary course. The rules, however, make it clear that he cannot do this. If a plaintiff obtains judgment against one defendant by reason of default he may proceed with his action against the other under ord. 13, r. 4; or where one defendant is refused leave to defend and the other is not, he is not thereby prevented from continuing his action against such defendant. The rules clearly provide in these two cases for the non-observance of the ordinary rule. But there is no rule which applies to such a case as the present, and I do not see why, although the original action was rightly conceived, the remaining defendant is not entitled to say that the debt against him has been merged in the judgment. It may be that it is a casus omissus in the rule, and it may be that when attention is called to the matter it will be remedied. As things stand, however, I am bound to hold that the plaintiff is disentitled to the relief that he asks.

It was very fairly and properly admitted that but for the rule which has been applied the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover on the evidence; and it is clear that the present defendant ought to have raised the issue in his pleadings. I have not, however, felt at liberty to refuse to allow him to take advantage of it as if he had pleaded it; but I do not think that it would be right to order the plaintiff to pay costs, which, if notice of this had been given to him, he might have avoided. The present defendant will, therefore, pay the costs of the action up to the time that judgment was obtained against Perrins, and there will be no further costs for either party.

Action dismissed.

A company in liquidation which owns shares on which unpaid calls are due in another company which is also in liquidation, and is also a creditor of that company for money lent, is not entitled to set off the debt against such calls, as the bankruptcy law as to set-off is not imported by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, into the law of companies so as to allow set off against calls.

But the debtor company is entitled, when paying a dividend, to retain such part of that dividend as is payable to the creditor company until the calls made on the shares held by the creditor company are paid in full.

The African Gold Properties (Limited) held 2,500 shares of the Auriferous Properties (Limited). In January and June, 1896, calls of 5*s.* a share were made on these shares (inter alia), but these calls were not paid by the Gold Co. In January, 1896, the Auriferous Co. became indebted to the Gold Co. to the amount of £2,775 for money lent.

On the 19th of December, 1896, the court ordered the Auriferous Co. to be wound up.

In January, 1898, the Gold Co. passed an extraordinary resolution for winding up, and on the 26th of June, 1898, the court made a supervision order.

The liquidator of the Gold Co. now took out a summons in the winding up of the Auriferous Co. claiming the right to set off the amount of the Gold Co.'s debt against the amount due on the unpaid calls.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Co.—As the Gold Co. is insolvent, by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the same rules prevail as in bankruptcy. Section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, enables mutual credit, debts, or dealings to be set off between the debtor and a person claiming against his estate. In re Overend, Gurney, & Co. (Limited), Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 528, does not apply here, as the shareholder was not a bankrupt and the calls were not made before the liquidation of the company. If the contributory is a bankrupt, the liquidator must prove in the bankruptcy for any balance: In re Duckworth, Ex parte Cooper, 15 W. R. 858, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 578; In re Universal Banking Corporation (Limited), Ex parte Strang, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 492, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 48. These cases were before 1875, and section 10 of the Judicature Act applies the rule so laid down as to bankrupts to cases of insolvent companies in liquidation. Gill's case, 27 W. R. 934, 12 Ch. D. 755, though after 1875, does not apply here, as there the contributory was solvent. In re Whitehouse, 27 W. R. 181, 9 Ch. D. 595, was also a case of a solvent contributory, and was moreover commented on adversely by Cotton, L.J., in In re Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 282, 674, 44 Ch. D. 534. Different considerations prevail where the contributory is solvent and where he is insolvent.

Howard Wright, for the liquidator of the Auriferous Co.—Grissell's case shows that a shareholder cannot set off a debt which the company owes him against a call on his shares. Whether the calls were made before or after the winding up has commenced makes no difference: In re Whitehouse & Co. Both that case and In re Pyle Works were decided after 1875, and Black & Co.'s case 21 W. R. 68, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 254, is treated in them as a binding authority. Section 101 of the Companies Act, 1862, does away with any set off in a case like this.

Northcote replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 4.—WRIGHT, J. — Both the Auriferous Co. and the Gold Co. are now in liquidation. Before the liquidation of either of them the latter company owed the former for calls made and in arrear, and the former owed the latter for money lent. The question is whether against the claim for the amount of the calls the claim for the money lent can be set off. If the Gold Co. had not been in liquidation it could not have set off its claim for money lent against its liability for the amount of the call. That was decided before the Judicature Acts in Grissell's case and in Black & Co.'s case with reference to calls made by a liquidator in a winding up under an order of the court, or (per Lord Selborne) in a voluntary winding up. And since the Judicature Act, 1875, it has been held in the case of In re Whitehouse & Co. that the same rule holds good whether the call is made before or in the liquidation, and whether the liquidation is compulsory or voluntary. The ground of the rule is that all contributions from shareholders enforceable in the liquidation are by the Companies Acts made applicable for the payment of the company's creditors pari passu (sections 38, 101, 133 of the Companies Act, 1862), and a person who is a creditor and also a contributory cannot be allowed to do what might amount to paying his own claim in full out of a fund which ought to be distributed rateably (see Black & Co.'s case and In re Pyle Works, where the decision in In re Whitehouse & Co. is approved, though some of the reasons given by Sir George Jessel are questioned). Whether the same rule would apply if the liquidator sought to enforce the call by action seems not to have been the subject of express decision; but the call, though made and payable before the liquidation, and therefore at one time a debt to the company, is also enforceable by the liquidator by balance order as a contribution to be made in the winding up for pari passu distribution, and in this aspect is not a subject of set off in the case of a limited company. But in the present case it happens that the Gold Co. is also in liquidation and the question is what is the effect of this. If the Gold Co. had been a bankrupt individual instead of being a company in liquidation the liquidator of the Auriferous Co. must have enforced his claim in the bankruptcy and according to bankruptcy law, which even before and apart from the Judicature Act would have allowed the set-off; see In re Duckworth, where the question arose in the bankruptcy of the creditor-contributory; Ex parte Strang, where it arose in the liquidation of the company. Here the creditor-contributory is not a bankrupt individual, but is a company in liquidation, and therefore the particular ground on which In re Duckworth was decided is not applicable. The liquidator of the Auriferous Co. is not driven to proceed in the bankruptcy or to submit to the rules of the Bankruptcy Court, but proceeds in the Chancery Division and is entitled to the benefit of the Companies Acts as there administered. And the simple question is whether section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, has introduced into the law of the winding up of companies the bankruptcy rules as to set off, so as to allow a set-off against liability for the amount of unpaid calls in the case of a company constituted with limited liability. It seems to me that this question is decided in effect in the negative by Gill's case, which was cited with approval in the Court of Appeal in In re Washington Diamond Co., 41 W. R. 681, [1893] 3 Ch. 95; and that the liquidator of the Auriferous Co. is entitled to prove in the winding up of the Gold Co. for the whole amount still due upon the shares, leaving the liquidator of the Gold Co. to his right of proof in the winding-up of the Auriferous Co. for the money lent. It is true that in Gill's case the creditor-contributory was not a company in liquidation, but that circumstance does not prevent it from being in point as a decision that the bankruptcy law of set-off is not imported by the Judicature Act into the law of companies so as to allow a set-off against calls; though for other purposes there may be the same right as in bankruptcy (see in Ex parte Theys, 32 W. R. 601, 25 Ch. D. 587) to a set-off of cross-claims as existing at the time of the bankruptcy. In re Duckworth has, therefore, no application. The view which I have taken seems to be consistent with all the decisions on section 101 of the Act of 1862 since the Judicature Act (see e.g., Ex parte Pelly, 31 W. R. 177, 21 Ch. D. 492 at p. 509, and In re Pyle Works, 44 Ch. D., at p. 585, per Lord Justice Lindley). I therefore hold that the applicant is not entitled to the set-off which he claims, but has only a right to prove. I think there is some difficulty in reconciling In re Duckworth with what Lord Selborne said in Black & Co.'s case (at p. 262) with reference to a "statutory trustee," but I do not think the House of Lords would now overrule what was said in In re Duckworth.

When the order consequent on this decision came to be drawn up the liquidator of the Auriferous Co. wished to have inserted in it a declaration that, in the winding up of the Auriferous Co., the Gold Co. could not take any dividend on the debt owing to them until they had paid up all calls in the winding up of the Auriferous Co. This matter came before the court on the 9th of June.

Howard Wright, for the liquidator of the Auriferous Co.—Till the Gold Co. has paid all calls made by the Auriferous Co. on the shares held by the former the latter company may set off the calls against the dividend which the Auriferous Co. is going to pay: Grissell's case. This question arises in the winding up of the Auriferous Co. and the liquidator of that company is therefore entitled to hold the dividend. If it prove insufficient he can then prove in the winding up of the Gold Co. for so much of the debt as remains over.

Northcote, for the liquidator of the Gold Co.—Here there is no right of set-off, only mutual rights of proof. If the Auriferous Co. have this right to retain the dividend they will be paid in full, and not pari passu with the other creditors of the Gold Co. Grissell's case is distinguishable, as there the question was between a company in liquidation and a solvent individual, here it is between two liquidating companies.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20.—WRIGHT, J.—I have already considered this case in one of its aspects, with the result that, in my judgment, the liquidator of the Gold Co. could not set off, against calls made by the liquidator of the Auriferous Co., the debt owed by the latter to the former company. A further question was not discussed on the first argument, and remains to be considered. The liquidator of the Auriferous Co. is paying a dividend to its creditors, and he asks for a declaration to the effect that he is entitled to hold the dividend due to the Gold Co. against the liability of the latter company for calls in arrear on its shares in the Auriferous Co. Primâ facie the Gold Co. is entitled to take its dividend. Its claim as a creditor has been duly ascertained in the appropriate proceeding, and it is primâ facie immaterial that the creditor happens to be also a debtor to the Auriferous Co. There is no contract for a set-off, nor do the articles of association of either company appear to contain any provision for it, nor do the general statutes of set-off apply. Nor, as it seems, is the doctrine of set-off in bankruptcy, which under section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, is extended to the liquidation of companies (Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, 32 W. R. 989, 9, App. Cas. 434), applicable to this case. That doctrine has been held to apply only to cross-rights existing at the commencement of the winding up (In re Milan Tramways Co. Ex parte Theys; but here the call has been made in the liquidation, and until it was made there was only a contingent liability which might never become enforceable and could not be set off, unless, perhaps, after some process of valuation. But in my opinion this case is governed by the principle established in Grissell's case, and is within the express terms of the Lord Chancellor's judgment in that case. If the creditor-contributory were allowed to take the dividend without paying the call he would be receiving payment of a part of the debt which the company owes to him without making his contribution to the fund out of which that debt, with the other debts of the company, was to be paid. "If," Lord Chelmsford says L. R. 1 Ch. App. at pp. 536-537, "the amount of an unpaid call cannot be satisfied by a set-off of an equivalent portion of a debt due to the member of a company upon whom it is made, it necessarily follows, in the last place, that the amount of such call must be paid before there can be any right to receive a dividend with the other creditors. The amount of the call being paid, the member of the company stands exactly on the footing of the other creditors with respect to a dividend upon the debt due to him from the company. The dividend will be, of course, upon the whole debt, and the member of the company will from time to time, when dividends are declared, receive them in like manner when either no call has been made, or, having been made, when he has paid the amount of it." THE QUEEN v. GARDNER. (a.)

Criminal law—Procedure—Prisoner sole witness for defence—Right of prosecution to sum up—Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), ss. 1, 2, 3—Criminal Procedure Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 18), s. 2.

Where, on the trial of a person charged with a criminal offence, that person is the only witness for the defence, the right given by section 2 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865, to the counsel for the prosecution to sum up the evidence is not taken away by the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, but is postponed until after the person charged has given his evidence, and in such summing up counsel is entitled to comment upon the evidence given by the person charged as well as upon that given for the prosecution.

Case stated by the chairman of the Oxfordshire Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was tried at the Oxfordshire Quarter Sessions on the 18th of October, 1898, for breaking into a warehouse and stealing goods therefrom. The prisoner was defended by counsel. At the close of the case for the prosecution the counsel for the prisoner announced that the prisoner applied to be called as witness, but that no other evidence would be called for the defence.

The counsel for the prisoner submitted (1) that inasmuch as the prisoner was required by the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 2, to be called "immediately after the close of the evidence for the prosecution," the counsel for the prosecution could not sum up the evidence at that stage of the proceedings, as he would have been entitled to do under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865, s. 2; and (2) that if his right to sum up the evidence was not altogether taken away by the first-mentioned Act, he was, at any rate, not entitled to comment on the evidence offered by the prisoner.

The chairman ruled, with the concurrence of the bench, (1) that inasmuch as it was enacted by section 3 that the calling of the prisoner as a witness should not confer upon the prosecution the right of reply, and as section 2 merely required the immediate calling of the prisoners on the close of the evidence for the prosecution, the Act did not, by implication, take away from the counsel for the prosecution the right to sum up the evidence conferred by the Act of 1865, but that he was entitled to sum up at the close of the prisoner's evidence; (2) that the counsel for the prosecution was entitled, in summing up the evidence against the prisoner, to deal with the evidence which he had given, as well as with the evidence which the prosecution had adduced.

The counsel for the prosecution summed up after the prisoner had given evidence, and dealt with all the evidence before the court. The counsel for the defence replied. The prisoner was convicted. The questions for the consideration of the court were: (1) Has the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, taken away the right of the prosecuting counsel to sum up in cases where a prisoner applies to give evidence but does not call witnesses? (2) If the prosecuting counsel is entitled to sum up at the close of the prisoner's evidence, is he entitled to comment on that evidence, or is he required to confine his summing-up to the evidence adduced by the prosecution?

The Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, enacts (section 2) that "Where the only witness to the facts of the case called by the defence is the person charged, he shall be called as a witness immediately after the close of the evidence for the prosecution," and (section 3) "In cases where the right of reply depends upon the question whether evidence has been called for the defence, the fact that the person charged has been called shall not of itself confer on the prosecution the right of reply."

The Criminal Procedure Act, 1865, s. 2, enacts that where a prisoner is defended by counsel, and his counsel does not, in reply to the question of the presiding judge at the close of the case for the prosecution, announce his intention to adduce evidence, "the counsel for the prosecution shall be allowed to address the jury a second time for the purpose of summing-up the evidence against such prisoner."

Turrell, for the prisoner.—The effect of section 2 of the Act of 1898 is to sweep away the period which formerly intervened between the close of the evidence for the prosecution and the beginning of the evidence for the defence, so that the prosecuting counsel cannot sum up, and the counsel for the defence cannot open his case. Even if the right of the prosecuting counsel to sum up is not taken away, but is postponed until after the prisoner has given his evidence, that evidence cannot be made the subject of comment in the summing-up; for the right given by the Act of 1865 is to sum up the evidence "against" the prisoner, and the prisoner's own evidence is evidence for the defence, and not evidence against the prisoner. And if the prosecuting counsel has the right to comment on the prisoner's evidence, his speech is in effect a reply and not a mere summing-up, and a right to reply is expressly negatived by section 3 of the Act of 1898 where the prisoner is the only witness for the defence. A voluntary statement made by the prisoner before the magistrate is commented on by the prosecution because it is considered to be evidence "against" the prisoner. [He referred to Reg. v. Holchester, 10 Cox C. C. 226.]

Biron, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In my judgment the court of quarter sessions took the right view and acted in the right manner in reference to each of the two points raised in this case. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The first question is, when is the prisoner's evidence to be given, before or after counsel for the prosecution sums up? for he has the right to sum up under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865. The answer is to be found in the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898. Under section 1 of that Act the prisoner is a competent but not a compellable witness for the defence. [His lordship then read sections 2 and 3.] Then, the evidence for the prosecution having closed and the prisoner having applied to give evidence, what is the proper course of the proceedings? It is clear: the prisoner is to be called immediately after the close of the evidence for the prosecution. Therefore the magistrates were right in saying that the counsel for the prosecution should not at that moment sum up the evidence, but that the prisoner's evidence should be taken. What is the effect of that? Does it operate as an extinguishment of the right to sum up, or only as a postponement of the time at which that right is to be exercised? If it were intended to extinguish the right the statute would surely have said so. In my judgment, the effect is merely to postpone the exercise of that right to a later period. That is the answer to the first question reserved.

The second question is, Has the counsel who sums up the right to comment not only on the evidence given for the prosecution against the prisoner, but also on the evidence given by the prisoner for the defence? It is suggested that his right is limited to summing up the evidence which he has called himself. The argument is based upon the construction of section 2 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865. [His lordship read the section.] When that statute was passed prisoners were not competent to give evidence, but since the Act of 1898 came into operation that has become possible. A prisoner may have given evidence before the summing-up takes place. Is it to be said that the prosecuting counsel must shut his eyes to the evidence of the prisoner where that evidence is (as it generally would be) wholly inconsistent with the evidence of the other witnesses? where, for instance, he swears an alibi, and thus completely contradicts the witnesses for the prosecution. Is counsel not to comment on that by pointing out the want of corroboration of the prisoner's story and criticizing it in the light of the previous evidence? That cannot have been intended. When one recollects the course pursued under the state of things existing before this Act was passed, it would be most unreasonable to hold that the counsel for the prosecution cannot now comment on the prisoner's evidence. I allude to the practice of putting in the prisoner's statement before the magistrate as part of the case for the prosecution, and of the prosecuting counsel, if necessary, pointing out any inconsistencies between it and the other evidence. In my opinion the magistrates were right as to the postponement of the right of summing up, right as to the time when it is to be exercised, and right as to the power of the prosecuting counsel to make proper observations on the evidence given by the prisoner.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the second point it seems to me possible to say that the prosecuting counsel may comment on the prisoner's evidence and yet be strictly within the words of the statute as to summing up the evidence "against" the prisoner. Suppose the prisoner to have given evidence with the object of weakening the force of the evidence for the prosecution, the object of the comments in the summing-up would be to show that the evidence for the prosecution is not really disturbed by the prisoner's evidence, but is in fact supported by it.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The second question is really answered by the reply to the first. If the right to sum up is not taken away the postponement in effect extends the meaning to be given to the expression "summing up," for it is impossible to think that the Act intends to confine the summing up to a portion only of the evidence which has been given.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BRUCE, J.—I agree.

Conviction affirmed.

THE QUEEN v. HOBBS. (a.)

Criminal law—Illegal betting—Sweepstakes on a horse-race—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3.

The defendant received subscriptions from a number of persons on the understanding that the money so received, after payment of the actual expenses of management, was to be distributed in certain shares or prizes of different amounts among such of the subscribers as should draw (at a drawing in which all the subscribers were to take part) a ticket bearing a number corresponding with the number attached to the name of a horse in a list of horses entered for a race called "The Derby Sweepstakes," the drawer of the winning horse receiving the largest share or prize.

Held, that the defendant could not be convicted of an offence under section 1 or section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853.

Semble, that the transaction was an illegal lottery.

Case stated by Hawkins, J.

The defendant was tried at the Lewes Summer Assizes, 1898, upon an indictment containing three counts. Hawkins, J., directed a verdict of not guilty in the third count for reasons immaterial to the question reserved. On the second and third counts he directed a verdict of guilty, subject to the opinion of the court on the question stated below.

The two material counts were founded upon the second branch of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and section 3 of the same statute. Of these, the first charged that the defendant, on the 18th of April and other days, in a certain parish in Hastings, "being then the occupier of a certain house known by the sign of the Yorkshire Grey, . . . unlawfully did use the said house for the purpose of money being received by and on behalf of him, the said L. I. Hobbs, the occupier, as and for the consideration for promises and agreements to pay thereafter money—to wit, a sum of £45" (and the other sums mentioned in the summing-up) "on certain events of and relating to a horse-race called the Derby Stakes to the great damage," &c.

The second count was in similar terms, except that the place alleged to be unlawfully used was "a certain place—to wit, the bar of certain licensed premises known," &c.

The defendant had been charged before a magistrate, and had claimed to be tried by a jury pursuant to section 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

The case, after stating the above counts, set out the learned judge's summing up to the jury, in which he stated all the material facts and the question of law which arose upon them. That summing up was as follows—"The question raised upon this indictment is whether the sale of and receipt of the purchase-money for tickets in an ordinary Derby Sweepstakes by a licensed victualler in the bar of the licensed house occupied by him amounts to an offence created by the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, the Betting Act, 1853."

The material facts are few and simple. The defendant Lewis Irvin Hobbs was from the 18th of April to the 11th of May, 1898, both days inclusive, the licensed occupier of "The Yorkshire Grey" at St. Leonards-on-Sea. He had been such occupier for some eight or nine years previously, and during each of those years a sweepstakes similar in all respects to that now in question had been promoted by him on the approach of the "Derby Day." It was a sweepstakes to consist of one thousand subscriptions of two shillings and sixpence each, which, assuming all the subscriptions were made, would raise a sum of £125, of which 10 per cent., amounting to £12 10s., was to be deducted for expenses, leaving a balance of £112 10s. for distribution among the subscribers in the following manner:

To the drawer of the first horse (that is, the winner of the race)	45	0	0
Second prize—i.e., the second horse . .	20	0	0
Third prize—i.e., the third horse . .	10	0	0
To the drawers of 100 non-starters, 5s. each	25	0	0
Remainder to be divided amongst runners	12	10	0

A ticket was on payment of 2s. 6d. issued to each subscriber for each ticket subscribed for by him. These tickets were, before issue, bound up in books (similar in form to bank cheque-books) of twenty-five tickets each, with counterfoils attached, on which to write the name of the purchaser. As each ticket was paid for it was detached from its counterfoil and handed to the purchaser, whose name and address were written on the counterfoil. The tickets were distributed, some in the "Yorkshire Grey" by the defendant himself and by his wife and barmaid, who assisted him in the conduct of his house, and some by other persons, to whom books were entrusted away from the premises, one of such books for this year's sweepstake, from which six tickets had been sold, having been found on the person of one Talbot, as hereinafter mentioned. The names of other recipients of other books containing 475 tickets being found entered in a memorandum-book of the defendant.

A man named Mawle, a porter, formerly in the service of the defendant, on the 18th of April last (having been employed by the police so to do) went to the "Yorkshire Grey" and there purchased a ticket from defendant's wife. On the 23rd of April a similar ticket was sold in the house to a customer. On Sunday, the 24th of April, two tickets were sold by the barmaid in the presence of the defendant, who, in reply to some observation, said, "You can spot [or find] the winner on Sunday as well as any other day." On the 26th of April more tickets were sold to customers in the bar, and on the 29th of April defendant himself sold Mawle, who paid 2s. 6d. for it, another ticket. The whole of these sales were openly made.

There was no drawing for the prizes in this present year, because, before the time had arrived, the "Yorkshire Grey" was raided by the police, which, of course, stopped further proceeding with the sweepstakes. But the drawings for each of the years 1896 and 1897 were held at Saxon-chambers, a house adjoining, but forming no part of the "Yorkshire Grey." At such drawing about twenty persons were present. The witness Mawle was doorkeeper on those occasions, and for his services he was paid by the defendant, who in fact paid all the other expenses connected with the sweepstake, including those of this year, and if the fact be important, I have no reason to think that the 10 per cent. deducted for expenses was an unreasonable amount for that purpose.

No other evidence was given or offered of any matter connected with the sweepstake than that I have mentioned. It was not even suggested that the defendant, who took no ticket, was either to receive any part of the money subscribed except his expenses as already mentioned, or to supply or make good any deficiency in the event of all the tickets not being sold, and he gave no guarantee or promise to pay anything to anybody, except to distribute the money actually subscribed among the subscribers according to the terms of the tickets.

On the 11th of May the inspector of police, under a search warrant issued under the Betting Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), searched the "Yorkshire Grey," but in the house found nothing beyond some books of tickets, some of which had been issued and torn from the counterfoils, and a book with names and addresses obviously of persons to whom similar books had been entrusted.

A person named George Talbot was in the bar, where he was a daily visitor. It was said by the inspector that he was a betting man, and on search there were found upon him some papers and telegrams (one addressed to him at the "Yorkshire Grey"), which went strongly to prove that the inspector's description of him was correct. But there was nothing to indicate either that the defendant was concerned in betting, or that any bets were ever made in his house.

On this state of things Mr. Muir, for the defendant, objected that there was no evidence which could properly be submitted to the jury in support of this indictment. Mr. Horace Avory, for the prosecution, contending to the contrary.

For the purposes of this case it was conceded by Mr. Muir that the sweepstake in question was a lottery, and I am strongly inclined to the opinion that it was so, although, as this indictment was only preferred under the Betting Act, it is not necessary to pronounce any judgment upon that point. As to its being a lottery, therefore, I will only refer to the case of Mearing v. Hillings, 14 M. & W. 711. The mere fact, however, of its being a lottery would be no bar to proceedings under the Betting Act if the facts of the case would otherwise bring it within the operation of that statute.

So far as I am aware, the question whether such connection with an ordinary Derby Sweepstakes as is established against the defendant is sufficient to support the present indictment has now arisen for the first time. It must be taken there is no evidence to support any other offence against the second branch of that section.

That second branch forbids the use of a house or place for the purpose of any money being received by or on behalf of the owner, occupier, &c., as or for the consideration for any promise or agreement, &c., express or implied to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing "on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race, &c., or as and for the consideration for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency as aforesaid."

I am strongly inclined to think that such a sweepstake as that described in this case constitutes either expressly or impliedly an agreement between each member or ticket-holder in it, that each member in respect of each ticket he holds shall be entitled to draw in his proper time a ticket bearing a number corresponding with the number attached to the name of some horse entered for the Derby, and appearing on a list of such horses prepared and recognized by all as the list of horses in respect of which the sweepstake is established. No member is entitled to claim anything until after the race has been run and the result declared, and then each holder of a ticket becomes entitled to receive the prize or other sum of money mentioned on his ticket, having regard to the position or place in the race of the horse indicated by the number drawn by him.

The destination of every sum of money paid into the sweepstake, after deduction of expenses, is dependent on the event or contingency of a horse-race, and every title to a share of the distribution is dependent on the like contingency. The consideration for this agreement is the money paid by each member on the purchase of his ticket or tickets; that which he is to receive in return clearly is dependent on the event or contingency of the race.

Now, as to the defendant's responsibility. In every such sweepstake as the present there must be somebody to receive and hold the price of the tickets till the event of the race is ascertained; there must also be someone to distribute the amount to which members are entitled; both these offices seem to have been undertaken by the defendant. Some, at least, of the moneys were received by him at his house, the "Yorkshire Grey." Can it be said that in undertaking these offices the defendant did not impliedly or expressly promise and undertake with and to each subscriber to pay the money found to be due to on the happening of the event or contingency upon which his title to it depended according to the agreement?

I think it unnecessary to discuss any other part of this section. My present impression (the evidence being unquestioned) is that the defendant has rendered himself liable to the penalty imposed by section 3 of the Act, and that the jury ought to find him guilty upon the first and second counts of this indictment.

The opinion I have expressed above is that which I have necessarily hastily formed, without having an opportunity of referring to any of the authorities cited. The point is a new one—it affects a wide circle, wider, perhaps, than at first sight may be apparent. I purpose, therefore, to reserve the question of law for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and I respite judgment until the next assizes, or until the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved is known.

The defendant to be allowed bail until such time in the amounts he is now under.

If the court thought the learned judge was right in directing the jury as he did, the conviction was to stand; otherwise it was to be reversed.

R. D. Muir, for the defendant, contended that the sweepstakes out of which the charge arose was a mere lottery, and that the defendant was a stakeholder. There was no illegal betting transaction such as was aimed at by the Betting Act, 1853. The money was not to be paid upon the event or contingency of a horse-race, but in the event of the drawing of the horses.

Horace Avory (Henry Sutton with him), for the prosecution, contended that, although there was a lottery, the transaction was in effect a bet or wager; and, even if it were not a bet, the transaction was within the second branch of section 1 of the Act, for the defendant impliedly promised to pay money in the event of the race.

Allport v. Nutt, 1 C. B. 974; Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., 41 W. R. 210, [1893] 1 Q. B. 256; Sagar v. Stoddart, 18 Cox C. C. 165; and Caminada;

v. Hulton, 39 W. R. 540, 60 L. J. M. C. 116, were cited.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The learned judge at the trial of this case expressed grave doubt as to whether there ought to be a conviction. I think that that doubt was well founded. In my opinion there was no evidence to go to the jury on either of the two counts in question. The general importance of the case makes it desirable that I should state the grounds for this opinion. Let me first say that the allegation that the defendant is a publican is wholly irrelevant, the case would have been precisely in the same position if the sweepstakes had been carried on at a club or at any other place. It seems to me that what took place was a lottery, or in any case was not a betting transaction. It was said that it was an offence under the second part of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. Now it is material to observe that when this Act was passed there were already statutes dealing with lotteries—betting was treated as a separate and distinct subject for legislation. This Act is entitled "An Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses." It recites that "a kind of gaming has of late sprung up . . . by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices or by other persons acting on their behalf on their promises to pay money on events of horse-races and the like contingencies"; it then proceeds to deal with the evil which it has so pointed out. The first part of section 1 enacts that "no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner" or the other persons there mentioned "betting with persons resorting thereto": that clause deals with a house being opened or used for the purpose of betting with persons resorting to the house: counsel for the prosecution was right in saying that these words would cover betting both in cases where no money passed and in cases where money was paid in advance. The second part of the section covers cases in which persons do not necessarily resort to the house—"or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, &c., as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race or other race, &c." that is the clause with which we have to deal. Was there any evidence in this case that this place was used for the purpose of any money being received by or on behalf of the defendant as the consideration for a promise to pay any money on an event or contingency of or relating to a horse-race? The section points to a contractual relation between the keeper of the house and the person who pays his money, a promise by the former that he will make a payment to the latter in certain contingencies. The facts of this case show no such relation; all that the defendant said was that he would manage the sweepstakes. If each subscriber paid half-a-crown, the defendant, after paying the reasonable expenses of management, was to distribute the prizes out of the contributions. He took no ticket himself, and he was to receive nothing out of the transaction except those reasonable expenses. He gave no guarantee or promise to pay anything, but he was only to distribute the money arising from the sale of the tickets. The persons who took the tickets created a common fund, which the defendant merely received as a stake-holder and undertook to distribute. The clause aims at transactions in which a promise to pay in a certain event is made by the person who receives the money, and here the defendant made no such promise.

Again, to bring a case within the section the promise must be to pay "on an event or contingency of or relating to a horse-race"; but that was not so here: the prizes depended on the event or contingency of the drawing, which would have been equally effective if it had taken place after the horse-race instead of before. I think that I have gone through all the provisions of section 1 which it is necessary to consider. Looking at the rest of the Act, it is clear that every section of it is conversant with the keeping of houses for the purpose of betting. Section 7 makes this clearer than any other section, for it contains a prohibition against exhibiting or publishing any handbill advertising that a house is used for the purpose of making bets or wagers.

In my judgment this case does not fall within the letter of the Act or within the category of evils with which it deals, and there was no evidence on which the jury could find a verdict for the Crown. I must not be understood as saying that the conduct of the defendant did not constitute a criminal offence. I think the transaction was a lottery; but that was not the case put forward by the prosecution, and we are not dealing with that question.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NEW SOUTH WALES v. LOVE. (a.)

Nullum Tempus Act (9 Geo. 3, c. 16)—New South Wales—Construction of statute.

The English Nullum Tempus Act is in force in the colony of New South Wales, and applies to land which has never been granted out or dealt with by the Crown.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The facts sufficiently appear in their lordships' judgment.

A. Cohen, Q.C., Vaughan Hawkins, and Butterworth, for the appellants.

The respondent did not appear.

The judgment of their lordships (the Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., Lord MACNAGHTEN, Lord MORRIS, and Mr. WAY) was delivered by the Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This is an appeal by the Attorney-General for New South Wales against the judgment of the Supreme Court of the Colony pronounced on the 18th of February, 1896, overruling a demurrer to the defendant's plea to an information of intrusion to recover certain lands in the parish of Concord and county of Cumberland in the said colony. The question involved is whether the English Nullum Tempus Act (9 Geo. 3, c. 16) is in force in the colony and applies to land which has never been granted out or dealt with by the Crown.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It does not appear to be denied that the lands in question (described by their abuttals and containing 13¼ acres) were and had ever since the original settlement of the territory of New South Wales been waste lands belonging to and vested in the Crown.

The defendant, by his plea dated the 10th of April, 1895, averred that one Edward J. Keith, more than sixty years before the filing of the information, entered on and thenceforward held possession of the lands as his own property, that he conveyed his interest therein to William Love, who settled the same in trust for himself and his wife Susannah Love and the survivor of them for life and after the decease of the survivor on the defendant, Emily Susannah Love, absolutely, that the foregoing persons had from the entry of Edward J. Keith to the present time held continuous possession of the lands adversely to Her Majesty and without payment of rent to her, and had themselves since the said entry taken and enjoyed the rents, revenues, issues, and profits of the land, and that Her Majesty's title to the land did not first accrue within sixty years next before the filing of the information. The plea did not aver that the lands had not been in charge of the Crown within the said sixty years.

On the 20th of May, 1895, the appellant replied, traversing the allegations of the plea, and also demurred thereto on the grounds (1) that the Act 9 Geo. 3, c. 16, is not in force in New South Wales, (2) that assuming it to be in force it does not apply to lands which have never been dealt with by the Crown, (3) that the period of sixty years was not alleged to have run out before the date of the Constitution Act, 1855; (4) that the plea showed no title in the defendant.

Joinder in demurrer having been delivered, the demurrer came on for hearing before the full court (consisting of Darley, C.J., and Windeyer and Simpson, JJ.), by whom judgment was pronounced on the 18th of February, 1896, in favour of the defendant overruling the demurrer, Simpson, J., stating that he felt very considerable doubt about the matter.

Their lordships have no doubt that the judgment accurately describes the importance of the question here raised to the colony. The learned judges say "the earlier grants issued by the Crown were vague in the extreme, and that it would be in the present day impossible to ascertain from the description in the grants to what lands they applied." And it is clear that the inference which the learned judges draw from that state of facts is accurate, "that the holders would not be able to show upon the face of the instrument a title, and have to rely upon possession."

Their lordships do not think that the learned judges at all exaggerate the mischief and confusion which would arise in the transfer of property if the holders could not depend upon the operation of the statute in question.

Two arguments appear to have been suggested against the application of the Act to the particular colony under 9 Geo. 4, c. 83, which primâ facie applied the Nullum Tempus Act to the colony in question as much as if it had in terms re-enacted it for that colony.

Section 24 of that Act provides "that all laws and statutes in force within the realm of England at the passing of this Act" (that is to say, in the year 1828) "shall be applied in the administration of justice in the courts of New South Wales," and it is sought by construction to limit the words "all laws and statutes" by introducing into the section the words "having relation to procedure" or some equivalent expression. At least, that is the only intelligible mode in which the argument can be supported, because the words which do occur in the section, "in the administration of justice," would certainly include a limitation of the time within which actions can be brought, and their lordships are of opinion that the language of the section cannot be limited so as to exclude the statute, which, for the reasons pointed out by the learned judges, were and are so important in the administration of justice in the colony.

The second argument is not very intelligible since the words upon which reliance is placed are words which in the statute thus applied (9 Geo. 3, c. 16) except from the operation of the statute, lands in respect of which the Crown has been answered by rents, revenues, issues, or profits thereof within the space of sixty years next before the issuing or commencing of such action, information, &c., as shall at any times have been duly in charge or stood in super of record within the space of sixty years.

The provision is intelligible enough, and what in substance it means is that if the Crown is not actually in possession, but that in the Crown's accounts some person is charged with the rent which they had not paid and still stand as a Crown debtor in the Crown books, and that condition of things has existed within the sixty years, the title by that condition of things, although the possession may have been for sixty years, was not adverse, because during that period something was payable to the Crown which had not been paid.

It is not suggested here that the person in possession filled that character, but the argument appears to be that because there is no such administration in the colony as involves the peculiar form of Crown accounting thus described, the remedial operation of the statute cannot apply.

Their lordships are unable to accept any such suggestion. There is no allegation here of any equivalent record against the person who held possession for sixty years, and if no modification or limitation such as section 24 of the Act authorizes has been made so as to apply such a mode of accounting to the Crown as might have an equivalent effect, the only result would be that there is nothing upon which the exception preserving the Crown's right could operate, but certainly would not cut down the enacting part of the statute or establish that it was inconsistent with the laws of England.

For these reasons their lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court was right, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed accordingly.

Bennett v. Slater and Another. (a.)

Friendly society—Moneys payable on death of member—Nomination of person to receive—Revocation of nomination—Moneys payable exceeding £100—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 15, sub-section 3.

A member of a friendly society can, under section 15, sub-section 3, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, nominate a person to receive a sum not exceeding £100 payable by the society on his death, even though the total sum payable by the society on his death exceeds £100. Such a nomination can only be revoked in the manner prescribed in the section, and cannot be revoked by will.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., upon an interpleader issue, reported [1898] 1 Q. B. 469, 46 W. R. Dig. 61.

In 1864 William May effected a policy of insurance upon his life for £100 in the Royal Liver Friendly Society, a society registered or deemed to be registered under the Friendly Societies Acts. By the rules of the society the maximum sum for which a policy could be taken out was £200.

In 1889 William May made a nomination of this £100 in favour of the plaintiff, his daughter, under section 15 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and this nomination was duly sent to the society. William May died on the 29th of October, 1896, leaving a will, dated the 7th of September, 1895, of which the defendants were the executors. By his will the testator directed all his estate and effects to be sold by his executors, and after paying his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, that the residue should be equally divided between his two grandchildren. Neither the will nor a copy thereof was delivered or sent to the society during the lifetime of William May, but after his death probate of the will was sent for registration. The amount due under the policy was, at the death of the testator, with accretions, £104, which the defendants claimed. The plaintiff claimed £100 under the nomination, and brought an action against the society to recover it, when the society interpleaded. Mathew, J., held that the will operated as a revocation of the nomination, and gave judgment for the defendants.

38 & 39 Vict. c. 60, s. 15, sub-section 3: "A member of a society (other than a benevolent or working-men's club), not being under the age of sixteen years, may, by writing under his hand delivered at or sent to the registered office of the society, nominate any person, not being an officer or servant of the society (unless such officer or servant is the husband, wife, father, mother, child, brother, sister, nephew, or neice of the nominator), to whom any moneys payable by the society on the death of such member, not exceeding £50, shall be paid at his decease, and may from time to time revoke or vary such nomination by a writing under his hand similarly delivered or sent; and on receiving satisfactory proof of the death of a nominator, the society shall pay to the nominee the amount due to the deceased member, not exceeding the sum aforesaid."

By 46 & 47 Vict. c. 47, s. 3, the sum of £100 was substituted in the above section for £50.

The above enactments are now repealed and re-enacted in substance by section 56 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 52).

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (H. Sutton, R. Newton Crane, and H. Burrows with him), for the plaintiff.—The true construction of section 15, sub-section 3, is that a nomination can only be revoked in the same way as it is made. The nomination cannot be revoked by will. The society must, upon receiving satisfactory proof of the nominator's death, pay to the nominee the amount due, not exceeding £100. That provision is not consistent with a revocation by will. Further, this £100 became, upon the nomination, the property of the nominee, subject to the power of the nominator to revoke it during his lifetime, and there being no such revocation, it could not pass under a residuary bequest as part of the testator's estate.

H. D. Bonsey, for the defendants.—First, no nomination can be made where the sum payable on death exceeds £100. In the present case £104 was payable on death. The words "not exceeding £100" refer to "any moneys payable by the society on the death of such member." The object was to relieve poor persons from the obligation of making a will, and their estates from paying probate duty. Secondly, section 15 contemplates the absence of a will, sub-section 4 clearly deals with an intestacy, and sub-section 3 upon its true construction also deals with an intestacy. There is no reason why a nomination should be on a better footing than a will which can be revoked by a subsequent will. The sub-section does not say that the only mode of revocation shall be as prescribed in the Act. It does not exclude a revocation by will. The society, if they have notice of a will, ought not to pay the money to the nominee.

He referred to Ashby v. Costin, 37 W. R. 140, 21 Q. B. D. 401.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first contention before us is that as the sum payable on the death of the member exceeded £100, section 15 does not apply and the nomination is of no effect. I cannot agree with that contention. I agree that there cannot be a nomination of a sum exceeding £100. Here the nomination did not exceed £100. I have no doubt that the object of the Legislature was to save the expense of taking out representation to the member upon his death in the case of small estates. If the sum payable upon the death of a member does not exceed the £100 nominated, assuming that sum to be nominated, then that sum must be paid over to the nominee, and the expense of taking out representation will be avoided. If, however, the sum payable at death exceeds the £100 nominated, then the £100 will have to be paid to the nominee, and as regards the excess over that sum the general law applies and representation will have to be taken out as to that. The nomination here, being for a sum not exceeding £100, is therefore valid.

The second question is whether that nomination can be revoked by will. First of all, it seems to me that this money became and remained the property of the nominee so long as the nomination was not revoked, and therefore I do not see how this £100, which belonged to the nominee at the time of the testator's death, and not to the testator, can be included in the residuary bequest in his will. I pass that by, however, and I come to the question upon which Mathew, J., based his judgment, whether the nomination can be revoked by any mode other than that prescribed by the section. In my opinion it cannot. The section provides a special mode in which the nomination can be made, and it seems to me to prescribe a special mode in which it can be revoked, and in my opinion that is the only form of revocation recognized. Under the section all that the society has to do is to see that a due nomination has been made, that it has not been revoked in the mode prescribed in the section, that the member is dead, and thereupon "the society shall pay to the nominee the amount due to the deceased member, not exceeding the sum aforesaid." I find no obligation on the society to see whether there is a will or not. Therefore even if there were what purported to be a revocation by will, and even if the residuary clause covered this money, the revocation would be inoperative under the statute, and the nomination would stand. Judgment must therefore be entered for the plaintiff for £100.

* On account of the importance of the question to friendly societies the appeal was taken up by the Board of Trade.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that we can gather the intention of the Legislature from the words of the Act itself. The enactment in question is a provision in favour of members of friendly societies. By the rules of this society a member can insure up to £200. Now, an insurer for £200 seems to me to be as meritorious an individual as an insurer for £100. If the defendants' contention as to the £100 limit were correct, the words of section 15, sub-section 3, "to whom any moneys payable by the society on the death of such member, not exceeding £50"—now £100—"shall be paid at his decease," ought to read to whom "all moneys," &c. The section seems to me to mean that the member may nominate £100, whether out of a larger sum or not, to be paid to the nominee at his death. That seems to me to be the plain meaning of the words. I am, therefore, of opinion that there is no substance in the argument that the Act applies only to those cases in which the total sum payable at death does not exceed £100. If that argument were correct, this strange result would follow, that a member might insure for £50 and nominate that sum, and yet, if he afterwards insured for a further sum, bringing the total to over £100, the previous nomination would be invalidated. I cannot come to such a conclusion. The Act gives a member the important privilege of making a gift, though not an irrevocable gift, of a sum not exceeding £100, and so far relieves his estate from the expenses of representation being taken out to him, and, in my opinion, the sum nominated, subject to revocation, ceases to be the property of the member and does not belong to his estate. The case of Ashby v. Costin seems to me to be an authority almost in point. I now come to the question whether there can be a revocation of the nomination otherwise than as prescribed in the Act. I find that the Act carefully points out the particular mode in which the nominator can revoke the nomination. Why should we imply something that is not in the Act? Why are we to imply a power to revoke by will? There is good reason why we should not. There is no mention of a will in sub-section 3. That sub-section provides that on proof of the death of a nominator the society shall pay to the nominee the amount. It is suggested that we must read in the words "without notice of a will." I cannot do so. The death of the nominator might well be proved before the society had time to see whether there was a will or not; or the death might be proved, and a will might be in existence which might not be proved for months or years afterwards, and yet, according to the argument, the society would be bound not to pay over the amount to the nominee if they had notice of the will. That would be in direct contradiction to the Act. I think that there can be no revocation by will. If I am right in my view of the Act, this £100 formed no part of the estate of the testator, and he could not dispose of it by his will, and in my view of the Act it would have been equally inefficacious if he had purported to expressly revoke the nomination by his will. Even supposing the testator were insolvent at the time of his death, no recourse could be had to the nominee to recover the sum paid to her. Of course, if at the time of his death the £100 was not an asset of the testator, it would not become an asset because he happened to be insolvent.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion the statute makes £100 the limit of the sum payable to the nominee, and is not the limit of the sum payable on the death of the member. As regards the other point, the clear intention of the Legislature is to benefit members of these friendly societies by giving them a simple and convenient method of disposing of their property on their death, without the formalities and expense incident to a will. The method of disposition thus conferred on members is to a certain extent a substitute for and resembles a will, but it has not all the incidents of a will. It cannot be revoked by a will made subsequently. That incident of a will is wanting. It can only be revoked in the way specified in the Act. It seems to me, therefore, that on two grounds the learned judge was wrong. First, the nomination having been properly made, death intervened before it was revoked. The will, therefore, which was competent to deal only with the testator's estate, did not embrace this £100 at all. I agree also that, even if there had been in this will what purported to be an express revocation of the nomination, inasmuch as it was not the statutory and only method of revocation, it would have been inoperative.

Appeal allowed.

BIGGS v. HODDINOTT. (a.)

Mortgage—Redemption—Collateral advantage to mortgagee—Restrictive covenant—Injunction.

A mortgagor can always redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs, and any bargain which is unconscionable will not be enforced; but a collateral agreement giving the mortgagee some collateral advantage, provided it is not unconscionable and does not clog the equity of redemption, is not invalid.

Jennings v. Ward, 2 Vern. 520, and In re Edwards' Estate, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 367, discussed and explained.

The defendant, being the owner of a public-house, mortgaged it to the plaintiff, with a proviso that the loan should continue for five years, and covenanted during the continuance of the security not to sell on the premises malt liquors other than those supplied by the plaintiff.

Held, that such a covenant was valid, and ought to be enforced by injunction.

Appeal of the defendants from Romer, J.

The plaintiff was a brewer at Cardiff, the defendants being the owners of the Witchell Hotel, Cadoxton, Glamorgan. The premises were mortgaged by the defendants to the plaintiff by deed dated the 18th of March, 1896. The mortgage deed contained a covenant by the mortgagors that they would during the continuance of the security deal with the plaintiff only, for all beers, stout, or any other malt liquor (except bottled beers) which should be vended to be consumed on or off the hotel and premises, and would not sell or permit the sale or consumption on the premises of any such liquors other than such as had been purchased or taken of the plaintiff. There was a proviso that the mortgage-money should not be called in for five years, and the plaintiff covenanted to supply the defendants with malt liquors of a kind and quality similar to those which were being supplied for the time being for consumption on the hotel premises.

On the 1st of April, 1898, the defendants ceased to purchase their malt liquors from the plaintiff, and on the 4th of May 1898, tendered to him the amount of his principal and interest to date and a further six months' interest in lieu of notice.

The plaintiff declined to accept the money, and on the 10th of May, the defendants took out an originating summons for redemption.

On the 23rd of May the plaintiff instituted an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants or agents, from selling or permitting the sale or consumption on the hotel premises of any beer, stout, or other malt liquors (other than bottled beers) which should not have been purchased and taken from the plaintiff.

On the 10th of June the plaintiff moved before Romer, J., for an interim injunction in the terms of the claim. The defendants' summons for redemption and the plaintiff's motion for an injunction were heard together.

Romer, J., dismissed the summons for redemption on the ground that it was premature. The plaintiff's motion for an injunction was then argued.

Levett, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the motion.—The covenant is good and should be enforced. It is outside the mortgage in the sense that it has nothing to do with the right to redeem; it is only a collateral advantage which in a proper case should be allowed to the mortgagee.

They cited White v. City of London Brewery Co., 36 W. R. 881, 39 Ch. D. 559; Mainland v. Upjohn, 37 W. R. 411, 41 Ch. D. 126; Luker v. Dennis, 26 W. R. 167, 7 Ch. D. 227.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the defendants.—This covenant is an attempt to clog the equity of redemption by giving the mortgagee a collateral advantage; this is not allowed: Jennings v. Ward, 2 Vern. 520. This is irrespective of the usury laws: Broad v. Selfe, 11 W. R. 1036; and depends on the general protection equity gives to borrowers against lenders which should the more be enforced now that the usury laws are abolished: James v. Kerr, 37 W. R. 279, 40 Ch. D. 449. A mortgagee cannot stipulate that he shall be a paid receiver of the rents of the property he holds as security, nor can a mortgagee auctioneer stipulate for and get commission: Broad v. Selfe; Field v. Hopkins, 44 Ch. D. 524, 38 W. R. Dig. 134; Salt v. Marquess of Northampton, 40 W. R. 529, [1892] A. C. 1. The covenant therefore is void, and this injunction should be refused.

ROMER, J.—There is a great principle which in my opinion ought always, so far as possible, to be adhered to—namely, that a man should abide by his contracts. There are, however, certain principles of equity which especially relate to mortgagors and mortgagees, and which to some extent interfere with this great principle. With these I will deal upon the understanding that unless some rule of equity forbids it, a man's contract should be enforced against him. In the present case the transaction was reasonable and proper, and the contract seems to me to be reasonable, entered into in good faith and fairly, and in no sense oppressive, so that unless some rule of equity interfere to prevent my so doing I ought to enforce it. I should be sorry if I thought there was any such rule, but I don't think in this case that there is.

There is a principle which I wholly accept, at any rate for the purposes of this judgment, that in a mortgage you cannot by contract between mortgagor and mortgagee clog the equity of redemption so as to prevent the mortgagor redeeming on payment of the principal interest, and costs. That principle does not, in my opinion, apply here to prevent the contract in question being enforced; there is nothing in it to clog the equity of redemption. The mortgagor's right to redeem stands the same whether this covenant to take the beer is in the deed or not. The mortgagee in respect of that, has no right to check redemption. There is no charge on the mortgaged premises in favour of the mortgagee, for any sums due to him by reason of any breach of that covenant. It therefore seems impossible to say that this covenant in any way infringes the principle against clogging the equity of redemption.

Then it is said on behalf of the mortgagor that a much wider principle applies which would prevent this covenant being binding, and the case of Jennings v. Ward, was referred to as an authority in support of this. The Master of the Rolls in that case is certainly reported to have said that a man shall not have interest for his money and a collateral advantage besides for the loan of it, or clog the redemption with any by-agreement. I have already dealt with clogging the equity; but it is said that the decision of the Master of the Rolls is to be taken to its fullest extent, and that in no case shall the mortgagee have his interest and a collateral advantage besides. I think it good in dealing with general observations to bear in mind the case in which such general observations were made, and in applying this to Jennings v. Ward it will be seen that there there was no attempt to clog the equity of redemption; but looking beyond that and considering what the collateral agreement there was, it was one which the Master of the Rolls held should be set aside as being unconscionable. Also, it is important to bear in mind that he was dealing with a case when the usury laws were in force and it was not allowed to a mortgagee to get anything equivalent to rate of interest beyond the legal rate under the guise of a collateral advantage. I am unable to find any subsequent case to show me that this decision of the Master of the Rolls is to be taken unlimitedly. Some of the cases to which I have been referred are cases where it was sought to clog the equity of redemption by saying that to redeem the mortgagor had to pay more than was due from him for principal, interest, and costs, and the question was what ought to be done when the mortgagor came to redeem; not, as here, the question whether, when there is a reasonable and proper agreement entered into between two persons, it should be void because it is between mortgagor and mortgagee. Also, you must put aside cases before the usury laws, and cases of unconscionableness. Lord Eldon in Chambers v. Goldwin, 9 Ves. 254, stated the law at that time on the subject in question, and this is referred to by Kay, J., in his judgment in Mainland v. Upjohn, 41 Ch. D., at p. 138, whose remarks at the top of that page I would wish to now adopt.

Putting aside, therefore, the question of what is wrong and what circumstances are oppressive, I can see no reason why a covenant between a mortgagor and mortgagee, entered into in good faith and really giving a reason why the mortgagee should advance the money, should be bad, and it appears to me that if there is no objection falling within the lines I have mentioned, a contract which is really equivalent to a term of the advance is binding on the mortgagor where it is part of the consideration for the advance and the mortgagor has got the benefit resulting from it. That the principle laid down by the Master of the Rolls in Jennings v. Ward is not to be taken in its widest sense as urged on behalf of the defendants is clear from the cases of Potter v. Edwards, 5 W. R. 407, 26 L. J. Ch. 468, and Mainland v. Upjohn, as they show that, for instance, a mortgagee may contract with a mortgagor that in consideration of an advance of £700 he shall be repaid £1,000 with interest on the £1,000, and that such a bargain will stand. So here the mortgagor has obtained an advance no doubt at a reduced rate of interest by reason of this covenant, the advantage of which he now seeks to escape the consequences of. I can find no authority that such a covenant is to be held void. Certainly the cases which have been cited to me do not amount to such an authority. Thus, in James v. Kerr, 40 Ch. D. 449, the facts when looked at show that the agreement there relied upon by the mortgagee was oppressive and improper. Broad v. Selfe was a case of clogging the equity of redemption, and in Field v. Hopkins the question was as to the amount which the mortgagor had to pay before he could be allowed to redeem, and it was a case where the mortgagee was claiming to charge items that ought not to have been charged against the mortgagor, and the Court of Appeal dealt with it as a question of construction.

Lastly, there is the case of Salt v. Marquis of Northampton, where the question merely was whether a certain policy was mortgaged, and when it was held that it was, it followed that any bargain seeking to stop the redemption of it would not be allowed. That decision therefore has no application to the question I am now dealing with.

Finding, therefore, in this case an honest bargain entered into to the benefit of the mortgagors, and finding no principle to prevent me enforcing this covenant on the part of the mortgagors, I grant the injunction asked for on the present motion, limiting it to the period of the continuance of the security.

The defendants appealed from this order on the plaintiff's motion.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the appellants.

Levett, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—We have heard an ingenious and learned argument put forward with the view of inducing us under pressure to lay down a proposition of law which, if true, would be unfortunate for business men. The proposition is this—that upon a mortgage transaction the mortgagor and mortgagee cannot at the same time enter into any other transaction with each other which can possibly benefit the mortgagee—that any such transaction must be entered into before the mortgage, so that it cannot be said that the mortgagee gets any collateral advantage out of the mortgage. That is not good sense, and it does not require very much intelligence to say it is not the law. Counsel for the appellants did not attempt to support it upon any rational principle, but they put it on authority. We are of course bound by the authorities, whether we like them or not, and counsel were right, there being no reasonable ground against it, to press us with authority.

The first case relied upon was Jennings v. Ward. That was a redemption suit, and there was an agreement, contemporaneous with the mortgage, which seriously interfered with the redemption of the property, on payment of principal, interest, and costs. The Master of the Rolls (Sir John Trevor) decreed redemption without regard to that stipulation, and said, "A man shall not have interest for his money, and a collateral advantage besides for the loan of it, or clog the redemption with any bye-agreement." That language has found its way into the books, and it has been understood as if he meant exactly what he said without regard to the circumstances of that case, and it has been said that no mortgagee can have his principal, interest, and costs, and also a collateral advantage. Now, what does the proposition mean? If it means what counsel for the appellants say, it would be monstrous; but when the authorities are looked at it will be seen that that general proposition has been departed from again and again, which shows that it does not mean what counsel say. Take, for instance, the case of West Indian mortgages, in which it has been held that a mortgagee who is not in possession could stipulate to act as consignee for the mortgagor. That is a collateral advantage. The proposition as stated in Jennings v. Ward is too wide. If properly guarded it is good law and good sense, and when one looks at the cases where it has been applied and those where it has not, one sees what it means. The principle is this: A mortgage is regarded in equity as a security for the money advanced, and a mortgagor can always redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs, and no bargain which prevents that, will be enforced or regarded.

There is another principle which is not peculiar to mortgages, and that is that an unconscionable bargain will not be enforced; and there is no case of any bargain being set aside which does not come under one of those two heads. I think the decision of Romer, J., was right; and to say, as we are asked to do, that a clause like this one, stipulating that a publican is to get his beer from a brewer upon reasonable terms is a collateral advantage and must be disregarded as unconscionable, would shock any business man, and we are not going to say that. The only possible way of making that out would be this, which was the view taken by Hargreave, J., in In re Edwards' Estate, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 367, that any stipulation in a mortgage for the benefit of the mortgagee is, because it is in a mortgage, due to pressure upon the mortgagor by the mortgagee. The simple decision there was right, that the agreement in the mortgage which was relied on was invalid as preventing redemption; but what the judge said as to a stipulation being unreasonable because it was found in a mortgage is going too far. The appeal will be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—It is said that the covenant by the mortgagor is void in equity. The first observation that I have to make upon that is, that it in no way affects the equity of redemption, as redemption can take place in just the same way as if that covenant were not in the deed. There is no stipulation that any damages for breach of the covenant should be covered by the security, so it is plain that it is not a case where the equity of redemption on payment of the principal, interest, and costs is in any way affected. In equity a mortgage has always been looked upon as a security for money, and here the principle that the mortgagor can redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs is maintained. It was contended that generally a mortgagee cannot stipulate for any collateral advantage to himself, and that there are authorities which show that. That has not been made out. The true proposition is that a mortgagee shall not impose on the mortgagor an unconscionable and oppressive bargain. That there is anything of that kind in this case is out of the question. The arrangement is for the common benefit of both parties. Though the mortgagee does by the operation of the covenant get an opportunity for the sale of his beer, the mortgagors get presumably good beer supplied upon the usual terms. It would be contrary to sense to say that this trade contract, entered into by persons with their eyes open, should be set aside on the ground of its being contrary to some fanciful doctrine of equity.

As regards the authorities, Jennings v. Ward was relied upon. That was a bill for redemption of a mortgage, and the Master of the Rolls decreed redemption without regard to a certain agreement which he considered unconscionable, and which he set aside as being unreasonable, as appears from the registrar's book, which we now have in court.

The statement by Hargreave, J., in In re Edwards' Estate, that the presumption is that a mortgagor is under pressure when he borrows money on the terms of a mortgage, is not a universal principle, and that that is so, is established by many authorities. The first great departure from it is to be found in the case of the West Indian mortgages, where a mortgagee was allowed to act as consignee for the mortgagor so long as he was not the mortgagee in possession. This supposed rule, which was gathered from dicta, not decisions of judges, was found not to work in those cases, as the West Indian planters could not get their money unless they consented to the mortgagee being consignee. That is a clear departure from the rule, and Potter v. Edwards was the same way. In that case £700 was advanced, and the mortgage was for £1,000. It has been attempted, I think, to explain what was a plain transaction there by a fiction which was untrue and unreasonable, and the theory was that the parties went through a supposed payment and repayment in the nature of a commission. The real bargain was an advance of £700 and an undertaking to give security for £1,000. In one sense there was an additional advantage to the mortgagee, as he was getting £300, and also getting interest on his security. Mainland v. Upjohn was a decision the same way. The decision of Hargreave, J., in In re Edwards' Estate, was right, as in that case there was not only a bargain which was unreasonable, but one which was a clog upon the equity of redemption. The mortgagee is that case could either purchase part of the property or remain mortgagee, so that there was a direct clog on the redemption, as if he became the purchaser the mortgagor had no right to redeem that part of the estate which came within the option.

It is unnecessary to add any more. In this case the transaction does not fall within any such supposed rule of equity as the appellants contend for.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and were it not for the course of the authorities I should not think that any rational person looking at this document would suppose that it was otherwise than a fair and reasonable arrangement—a contract between a brewer and a publican, by which the brewer becomes the transferee of a mortgage on the licensed house, and stipulates that the publican is to take his beer from him.

It is said, however, that mortgages have been the subject of a long series of decisions in equity. The equity judges have tried to find some principle which would satisfactorily explain the decisions of their predecessors, and those which they were about to give themselves, and it is no wonder that in searching for that, they fixed on some general principle which, when applied in other circumstances, was unfortunate. The difficulty came from the jurisdiction of the courts of equity to correct the hardness of the law. The decisions were given to remedy the hardness of particular cases, and then the judges tried to reduce them to a general rule which would meet all cases. In dealing with hard cases, the only safe thing is to do as Romer, J., did here, and see how far the decisions have gone in each particular case.

It is clear that when a person enters into a mortgage contract he is only a borrower upon security, and any stipulation in the deed which is inconsistent with that must be treated as if it were not there. It is not necessary now to go back to any such general proposition; but it may be that in earlier days, when people were driven to finding the principles, they were justified in going back to it, and so Hargreave, J., in In re Edwards' Estate, may have had in his mind the principle that, the contract being one of loan on security, any stipulation inconsistent with that must be regarded as unfair, and must be rejected. Whether that was what he had in mind or not I do not know, but the proposition which he laid down in such a general form was not necessary for the decision of that particular case, for in that case the stipulation interfered with the right of the mortgagor to redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs.

Upon what principle can it be said that a stipulation which does not clog the equity of redemption is invalid as being contrary to the spirit of the mortgage? It seems that it can only be so on the general principles of the law of debtor and creditor—that is, only where there is something so oppressive as to make it wrong to give effect to it. In the case before us the provision is a reasonable one, and it does not make the mortgage anything but a security for a debt. The mere fact that a stipulation for the benefit of the mortgagee is contained in the mortgage-deed does not necessarily make it invalid. The only ground for saying that it does is what was said in Jennings v. Ward, that a man shall not have interest for his money and at the same time a collateral advantage to himself. This case is not covered by the decision in that. There was sufficient there to warrant the judge in treating the clause as in fact an agreement for purchase at a given sum, notwithstanding that there was in form a mortgage. Nothing more than that was necessary for the determination of that case, and there is nothing here which goes so far as that. The agreement is one which does not fetter the redemption, and there is nothing unreasonable in it.

GROVES v. LORD WIMBORNE. (a.)

Factory Acts—Fencing machinery—Breach of statutory duty—Liability—Common employment—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), ss. 5, 82, 87.

Where the proprietor of a factory fails to perform the duty imposed upon him by section 5 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, to fence and maintain the fencing of dangerous machinery, an action to recover damages will lie at the suit of a person injured thereby, notwithstanding that the Act has imposed a penalty for the breach of the statutory duty.

The defence of common employment is no answer to such an action.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Grantham, J., and a jury.

The action was brought by a boy of fourteen years of age in the employment of the defendant to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the defendant, in breach of his statutory duty, not fencing certain dangerous machinery at his ironworks, but allowing the same to be and remain in an unfenced condition.

It appeared that the plaintiff was employed at a steam winch which had revolving cog-wheels, and while so employed his arm was caught by the cog-wheels and was injured. The plaintiff had been employed at the works for about eighteen months before the accident, and for the last six months he had been employed at the steam winch, which, during that period, had remained unfenced, though a fence had been originally provided for it.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £150 damages, but the learned judge held that the penalty imposed by section 82 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, for breach of the statutory duty to fence was the sole remedy, and entered judgment for the defendant.

Abel Thomas, Q.C., and S. T. Evans, for the plaintiff.—An action will lie for breach of the statutory duty to fence contained in section 5 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, whereby personal injuries ensue: Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co., 20 W. R. 525, L. R. 7 Ex. 130; Holmes v. Clarke, 10 W. R. 405, 7 H. & N. 937; Kelly v. Glebe Sugar Refining Co., 20 Court Sess. Cas., 4th ser., 833: see also Thompson v. Wright, 22 Ontario Rep. 127; Coe v. Platt, 7 Ex. Ch. 923; Caswell v. Worth, 4 W. R. 231, 5 E. & B. 849; Doel v. Sheppard, 4 W. R. 232, 5 E. & B. 856. The cases—such as Gorris v. Scott, 22 W. R. 575, L. R. 9 Ex. 125; Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co., 25 W. R. 794, 2 Ex. C. 524; and Saunders v. Holborn District Board, 43 W. R. 26, [1895] 1 Q. B. 64—in which it was held that the penalty was the only remedy, do not apply to a statutory obligation to fence machinery, where the Legislature could not have contemplated that the penalty should be the only remedy available in case of personal injury: see Couch v. Steel, 2 W. R. 170, 3 E. & B. 402; Shepherd v. Hills, 11 Ex. Ch. 55, 4 W R. C. L. Dig. 182; and Ross v. Rugge-Price, 24 W. R. 786, 1 Ex. D. 269. The doctrine of common employment cannot apply where the action is for breach of a statutory duty, there being no question of the negligence of a fellow-servant raised.

They also referred to Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macq. 748.

B. F. Williams, Q.C., and Bailhache, for the defendant.—The Legislature did not intend that there should be a remedy in damages in addition to the statutory penalty. The Factory Acts created the duty to fence, and provided a remedy for the breach of that duty, and that is the only remedy available. In Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co. the action was for breach of the statutory duty in not having originally provided a fence for the machinery. Here a guard for this machine was originally provided, but there was negligence in not maintaining the fencing. The doctrine of common employment is a defence to an action for the breach of duty in not maintaining the fencing, as the neglect to maintain it was that of the foreman, and he was a fellow-servant with the plaintiff: see Senior v. Ward, 7 W. R. 261, 28 L. J. Q. B. 139; Howells v. Landore Siemens Steel Co., 23 W. R. 335, L. R. 10 Q. B. 62; Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 Sc. & Div. 326

They also referred to Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, 6 W. R. 664, 3 Macq. 266.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This action is brought to recover damages for breach by the occupier of the factory of his statutory duty to maintain the fencing of certain machinery, injury being thereby caused to the plaintiff. Grantham, J., entered judgment for the defendant upon the ground that an action for damages would not lie for breach of the statutory duty. The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, has followed similar Acts, and is a public Act enacted by the Legislature in favour of workmen, and imposing a liability on the master which is enforceable by a penalty. Section 5, sub-section 3, of the Act, as amended by section 6, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, provides that "all dangerous parts of the machinery and every part of the mill gearing shall either be securely fenced or be in such a position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced." By sub-section 4, "all fencing shall be constantly maintained in an efficient state while the parts required to be fenced are in motion or use for the purpose of any manufacturing process." In this case it was conceded that the machinery ought to have been fenced and that the plaintiff was in consequence injured. Taking section 5 alone, it seems clear that upon proof of the statutory duty, and upon proof of the failure to perform that duty, resulting in injury to the workman, a cause of action accrues. Unless, therefore, we can find upon the whole purview of the Act that the Legislature intended that the fine imposed by the Act should be the only remedy for the breach, it seems to me that a cause of action exists. Can such an intention be inferred from any other parts of the Act? That brings me to sections 81, 82, 86, and 87. In considering this question it is proper to consider, as Kelly, C.B., did in Gorris v. Scott, whether the object of the statute is to confer a benefit on individuals and to protect them. It seems to me that the Factory Acts were passed to compel employers to do certain things for the benefit and protection of their workmen. Can it be said that the statute has made the fine the only remedy, especially when it is remembered that not one penny of it may ever go into the pocket of the injured man? Can that be the intention of the Legislature? The fine is imposed by section 82, and the whole or any part thereof may be applied for the benefit of the injured person or his family or otherwise as a secretary of state may determine. When an information is laid to recover the fine, how are the justices to act? The character of the offence should be taken into consideration. If the omission to fence was of a venial character, but a workman was injured or killed in consequence, what fine ought the justices to impose? Ought they to impose the same fine as if the offence were of a flagrant character? It seems to me that the fine is imposed as a punishment to the master for his breach of duty, and if the breach is wilful the fine should be greater than if the breach were trivial. The above considerations seem to me conclusive to show that the imposition of a fine does not take away the right of a workman to be compensated for the injury caused by the breach of duty. Another observation makes it still more clear. It does not necessarily follow that the occupier of the factory is the person to be fined for the breach of duty, because by section 87 a workman, who may not have a penny with which to pay, may be fined; and yet it is said that the injured workman must look to this payment of the fine as his only compensation. I cannot agree with that view. Section 5 gives a right of action upon the statute to a person injured by the breach of duty to fence, and he is not remitted to a fine as his sole remedy. Coming to the authorities, from the time when the Factory Act, 1844, was passed down to the present no case has laid down that the fine is the only remedy. There are two cases which show the contrary. Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co. seems to me to cover this case. There the breach of duty was in not providing a fence in the first instance, whereas here the breach consisted in the failure to maintain it. I do not think that any distinction can be founded upon that. There is also the Scotch case of Kelly v. Glebe Sugar Refining Co., which, though not binding upon us, covers the present case. For these reasons both upon principle and upon authority I am of opinion that the plaintiff has a cause of action. There is one other point. It is said that the doctrine of common employment affords a defence to the action. A master is liable to a third person for the negligence of his servant when acting within the scope of his employment. A limitation was placed upon that principle in favour of the master by the decision in Priestley v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1, which decided that if a servant injures a fellow-servant by his negligent act, the master is not liable, the reason being that the servant, when contracting with the master, impliedly took the risk of being injured by the negligence of a fellow-servant. That is the doctrine of common employment. It is a defence to an action by a servant against his master for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant. In an action founded upon the statute there is no need to resort to the negligence of a fellow-servant. The plaintiff need only prove the breach of the statutory obligation, and what answer is it to say that a fellow-servant of the plaintiff was guilty of negligence causing the injury? An employer cannot delegate his statutory duty to another. It is said that Wilson v. Merry decided the contrary. In my opinion it did nothing of the kind. The decision in that case was that the law as to common employment was the same in Scotland as in England. No doubt Lord Chelmsford said that the doctrine of common employment might be a defence to an action for breach of the statutory duty. I cannot agree with him in that opinion, which was not necessary for the decision, and the other law lords refrained from expressing an opinion. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the amount awarded by the jury.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There seems to me to be only one question to be decided—whether, having regard to the purview of the Act, the penalty was intended to be the only remedy. Section 5 of the Workshop and Factory Act, 1878, imposes an absolute and unqualified obligation upon the occupier of a factory, and upon no one else, to fence dangerous machinery and to maintain that protection. When a duty is cast upon a person, he cannot be allowed to say that he delegated the performance of that duty to someone else, and that that other person neglected to perform it. A man cannot be heard to say, as a defence to an action for damages for personal injuries, that he employed a competent servant to do certain business for him, and that it was the servant's negligence, in the performance of it, which caused the injuries. If the servant is engaged upon his master's business, and in the performance of it injures another through his negligence, the master is liable. An exception was engrafted on that general rule by the decision in Priestley v. Fowler, which has not always commended itself to the conscience of mankind, but which is now undoubted law, that where a person enters into the employment of another the former is assumed to have entered into a bargain with the latter that he will not sue the master for injury to himself caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant. In Scotland the courts had taken a limited view of the doctrine of common employment—namely, that the doctrine did not apply where the fellow-servant, whose negligence caused the injury, was in a superior position, and only applied to a fellow-servant in the same class of employment as the injured man. In Wilson v. Merry the House of Lords held that the Scotch courts were wrong in that view. The majority of the lords refused to express any opinion whether the defendants were not liable for the breach of the statutory duty, but Lord Chelmsford did think it desirable to say something about it. He took the case of Gray v. Pullen, 13 W. R. 257, 5 B. & S. 970, a decision of very great authority, where it was held that if a person, who was bound to perform some duty, employed an independent contractor, who failed to perform the duty, the person employing the contractor could not, by doing so, get rid of his liability. The learned lord said that that decision was wrong. He seems to have said in effect that a person may get rid of a statutory duty by employing an independent contractor to do the work instead of employing his own servant. That is not the law of the land. In Hardaker v. Idle District Council, 44 W. R. 323, at p. 324, [1896] 1 Q. B. 335, at p. 341, Lindley, M.R., in referring to this opinion of Lord Chelmsford, said that he could not find that the decision in Gray v. Pullen had ever been overruled or considered unsatisfactory. In my opinion the decision in Gray v. Pullen was perfectly right, and Lord Chelmsford's criticism upon it was unsound. I have never had a doubt that where a statutory duty is imposed upon a person he must see to the performance of that duty, and he is liable if injury is caused by a breach of that duty, unless the case can be brought within some known exception to that rule. It is said that a new duty is imposed and a new remedy for breach of that duty given by the Act, and upon the whole purview of the Act that is the only remedy. Where it is necessary to prove negligence of a person in the employment of the master, then it may be that the plaintiff may be met by the doctrine of common employment. But there is no question of negligence raised here. The Dowlais Ironworks are very extensive, and Lord Wimborne does not and cannot be aware of all that is going on there. He could not be expected to attend to the original fencing or to the maintenance of the fencing. I cannot see any distinction between the duty to provide original fencing and the duty to maintain the fencing. There is here a statutory duty which absolves the plaintiff from the necessity of relying upon negligence, and the doctrine of common employment is not applicable. The question then is, looking at the whole purview of the Act, whether the breach of duty gives rise to a cause of action for damages. The plaintiff was clearly one of those persons for whose protection section 5 of the Act was passed. That being so, the only suggestion is, can we draw the conclusion from the imposition of a fine that the Legislature intended that to be the only and complete remedy. To my mind it is impossible to say so. The maximum fine, even in a serious case, is £100. Is it conceivable that that sum can have been intended to be the limit of compensation? The fine does not necessarily go into the pocket of the injured man. When bodily injury has been occasioned to a workman, the secretary of state may apply the whole or any part of the fine inflicted for the benefit of the injured man or his family. In considering what fine to impose, how are the justices to act? If the injury, though slight, is caused by a deliberate and wilful breach of duty, the justices would probably impose the maximum fine. On the other hand, if the injury is serious and the offence is venial, are the justices to say that the occupier of the factory, who has been most anxious to perform his statutory obligations, should be fined £100? There may be many such cases in which the justices would impose only a small fine. Another consideration is this: by section 87, if the occupier of the factory can show that he used due diligence and that some other person was the offender, he may exempt himself, and the actual offender, who is probably a workman in the occupier's employment, may be convicted. Such a person may not be able to pay the fine, and yet it is said that the fine is the only remedy available. Considering all these reasons I cannot think that the penalty is intended to be the only remedy.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree in the conclusion arrived at by my learned brothers. I entertain no doubt that upon a proper construction of the Act it would not be right to hold that the Legislature intended the penalty to be the only remedy to the person injured. Nor have I any doubt that the doctrine of common employment affords no defence to this action.

As regards the first point, I do not think it has ever been doubted that where a statute provides for the performance of a duty, and a person is injured by the failure to perform that duty, if there is nothing more, an action will lie at the suit of the injured person, such person being one of those for whose benefit and protection the statute was passed. I have equally no doubt that where in a statute of this sort a remedy is provided in case of non-performance of the statutory duty, that is a matter to be taken into account when considering whether the Legislature intended that to be the only remedy. But it is by no means conclusive, nor is it the only matter to be taken into consideration. Further, if the remedy given by the statute is a remedy which the statute provides is to enure for the benefit of the person injured, that is an additional matter to be taken into consideration, a cogent though not a conclusive matter for consideration. It is necessary to look, according to Lord Cairns in Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co., at the general scheme of the Act, and the nature of the statutory duty. In addition to that, one must look at the nature of the injuries likely to be caused by the breach of the statutory duty, the amount of the penalty imposed, and the person upon whom it is imposed. I can add nothing to the observations of A. L. Smith, L.J., as to the provisions of section 87, nor can I add anything to the observations of Rigby, L.J., as to the intention of the Legislature that the £100 should be the only remedy for a breach of the statutory duty which might lead to the death or serious injury of a person of the class sought to be protected. For these reasons I entirely agree that the statute does not intend the penalty provided by section 82 to be the only remedy for breach of the statutory duty created by the Act. But although I agree with this conclusion, I cannot think that the point is one entirely free from difficulty, because I know of no authority in which it has been held that where a statute in terms provides that the penalty shall go to the person injured by the breach of the statutory duty a civil action is open also. However, we have not to decide that question, because section 82 does not give the penalty to the person injured. It only gives the secretary of state power to apply the whole or any part thereof for his benefit. In making this observation I do not wish to go back from the general proposition, that there is no hard-and-fast line to be drawn. One must look at the whole statute and gather from its provisions whether the Legislature intended the statutory remedy to be the only remedy. This is laid down in Vallance v. Falle, 32 W. R. 770, 13 Q. B. D. 109.

I wish now to add a few remarks upon the defence of common employment. The defence of common employment does not in any sense negative negligence for which the master is responsible. It is a defence because it is an answer to the claim of the particular plaintiff. Whether it is founded upon the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria, as seems to have been thought in Priestley v. Fowler, or, as seems to be the later view, upon an implied undertaking by the servant to take the risk of injury by the negligence of a fellow-servant, in either case it is an answer to the claim for damages by the particular plaintiff. The question is, can the defence be set up by the defendant in this case? In my opinion it cannot be set up. The duty is imposed upon the master by section 5, and it is no answer for him to say that he employed a most skilful servant who failed to perform the statutory duty. I wish, however, to guard against being supposed to affirm that in no case can the defence of common employment be set up in answer to a claim arising out of a breach of a statutory duty. I agree that it cannot be set up in the present case, because the cause of action is not based on the negligence of any servant, but solely on the failure of the master to perform his statutory duty. But suppose a case where the master had put the most perfect fencing to the machinery, and suppose someone deliberately left off or removed the fencing, an obvious answer would be that the cause of damage to the plaintiff was not the failure of the master to perform his statutory duty, but the particular act of the servant. I am not sure that, if it could be shown that some fellow-servant of the plaintiff so dealt with the fencing and caused the injury to the plaintiff, the doctrine of common employment would not apply. Subject to that observation I entirely agree in the conclusion arrived at on this appeal. I will add this so as to make my position clear. No one could contend that if the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence, that would not have been a complete answer to the claim founded upon the breach by the master of his statutory duty. In such a case the injury would have not been caused by the neglect of the master to perform his statutory duty, inasmuch as the injury would not have happened but for the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. In the same way, though I do not mean to decide it, it may be that, if it could be shown that, although the master failed to perform his statutory duty, the injury would not have happened but for the negligence of a fellow-servant, that would not be a defence to the action. I very much doubt whether Lord Chelmsford, in Wilson v. Merry, meant to go further than that. I agree with the criticism of Rigby, L.J., upon Lord Chelmsford's observations on Gray v. Pullen, but the observations he made as to setting up the defence of common employment in the case of a breach of statutory duty can stand by themselves apart from his observations on Gray v. Pullen.

GOLDSTONE v. WILLIAMS, DEACON, & CO. (a.)

Practice — Discovery — Privilege — Use of privileged document in former action—Production—R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 1.

Documents in their original nature privileged are liable to production if such use has been made of them that they have become publici juris, but not otherwise.

Accounts which had been prepared by a witness's solicitors for purposes of litigation were, in the course of cross-examination of the witness before an examiner, handed to the witness and admitted to be correct, but were not read out in court. The same accounts were subsequently made an exhibit to an affidavit read on a summons before a judge in chambers to compromise the action. On an application in a subsequent action to produce the accounts and copies of the witness's depositions, Held, that the accounts had never been effectually made public, and that the use made of them did not amount to a waiver of privilege, but that the witness's depositions had become public property and must be produced accordingly.

This was a motion to discharge an order made in chambers and involved a question as to how far documents originally privileged remained so after they had been used in a previous action even though they had not been read in open court. The facts were as follow. The order which it was now moved to discharge was made in chambers on the 18th of July, 1898, and it was thereby ordered that the plaintiffs should produce to the defendants the evidence in their possession upon which the order for compromise of an action of In re Goldstone, Goldstone v. Goldstone, [1897] G. 893, and dated the 13th of November, 1897, was made, including the office copy depositions of the defendant Jane Goldstone and the exhibits relating thereto.

The plaintiffs were the infant children of Sampson Goldstone, who died, in 1884, intestate, and his widow, Jane Goldstone became his legal personal representative. Mrs. Goldstone deposited certain securities, part of the testator's estate, with the defendant bank at first for safe custody, but subsequently by way of security for advances made to her by the bank. It was now alleged that the obtaining of these advances constituted a breach of trust on her part. This security was realised by the bank and the proceeds applied in satisfaction of the widow's debt. It was alleged that the bank had notice that the securities formed part of the testator's estate and had notice of the breach of trust committed by Mrs. Goldstone, and was liable accordingly. By their defence the bank denied the case made by the plaintiffs.

The usual order for discovery was made, in pursuance of which the plaintiffs filed an affidavit which was held insufficient. On the 7th of June, 1898, an order was made for a further and better affidavit. Accordingly the plaintiffs' solicitor made an affidavit on the 23rd of June, and the second schedule set out certain documents, including "Accounts prepared by accountant relating to transactions between defendant Jane Goldstone and defendant Bank, and relating to the estate of Sampson Goldstone, deceased, and office copy depositions of Jane Goldstone."

The plaintiffs objected to produce these accounts on the grounds stated in the affidavit in question, namely, that they were privileged. The evidences as to the nature of these documents consisted of affidavits of plaintiffs' solicitor, filed the 12th of November, 1897, and the affidavit of plaintiffs' solicitor filed the 12th of November, 1897, and two other affidavits, namely, those of Mr. Crossman, an accountant, filed same date, and of Mr. Locke, the managing clerk of plaintiffs' solicitor, filed the 7th of May, 1898. From these it appeared that the action of In re Goldstone, Goldstone v. Goldstone, referred to in the order of the 18th of July, 1898, was brought against Mrs. Goldstone and the trustee in her bankruptcy for administration of the intestate's estate and to recover from the trustees', property alleged to form part of the same.

Mrs. Goldstone was unable to furnish proper accounts of her husband's estate, but made an affidavit stating what the estate consisted of at the time of his death.

Mr. Crossman was employed by the plaintiffs' solicitor to trace the estate, and he embodied the results of his inquiries in the accounts mentioned in the affidavit of the 23rd of June, 1898.

Mrs. Goldstone was subsequently examined before an examiner, and those accounts were produced to her and stated by her to be correct and made an exhibit to her depositions. After this admission had been made the trustee in the bankruptcy proposed a compromise, and the plaintiffs obtained the sanction of the court to the compromise on an ex parte application on which an order of the 13th of November, 1897, was made in the present action.

The depositions of Mrs. Goldstone and the exhibits thereto were entered as read on this order.

On the 16th of November, 1897, leave was given to bring the present action.

It appeared from the evidence that Mr. Crossman's investigations had been made with a view to the present action as well as the former action.

Jenkins, Q.C., and J. Rutherford, for the motion.—These accounts were prepared for the plaintiffs' solicitor and are privileged documents. Their use at the former trial does not waive the privilege: Reg. v. Hawkins, 2 Car. & Kir. 823; Learoyd v. Halifax Joint-Stock Banking Co., 41 W. Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 27.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts continued: The question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to object to produce (1) the accounts prepared by Mr. Crossman, and (2) the copies in their possession of the depositions of Mrs. Goldstone.

The first of these questions is by far the more important, as it is said that the accounts prepared by Mr. Crossman contain the whole case of the plaintiffs.

and the question is one of some nicety. The ground on which production is resisted on behalf of the plaintiffs is that the documents are privileged. It must be taken that the accounts were in the first instance privileged, for they were prepared at the instance of the plaintiffs' professional adviser with a view to a former litigation after that litigation had commenced. That alone would be sufficient to confer privilege even if they had not been prepared also with a view to the present litigation. On this Walsham v. Stainton, 12 W. R. 199, 2 Hem. & M. 1, is a direct authority. It has also been held that, as a general rule, a document once privileged is always privileged. The leading cases in this are Bullock v. Corry, 26 W. R. 330, 3 Q. B. D. 356; Pearce v. Foster, 33 W. R. 919, 15 Q. B. D. 114, and the very recent case of Calcraft v. Guest, 46 W. R. 420, [1898] 1 Q. B. 759, at p. 761, where the Master of the Rolls makes these remarks: "I take it that as a general rule one may say once privileged always privileged. I do not mean that the privilege cannot be waived, but that the mere fact that documents used in a previous litigation are held and have not been destroyed, does not amount to a waiver of the privilege."

These decisions rest on the necessity of allowing full and free communication for the purposes of litigation not only between a solicitor and his client, but between the solicitor and persons whose assistance he requires or with whom he communicates in order to enable him properly to conduct the litigation; as to this see Bullock v. Corry and Pearce v. Foster. On the other hand, it has been decided that notes of proceedings in open court—Nicholl v. Jones, In re Worswick, Robson v. Worswick — or before an arbitrator — Rawstone v. Preston Corporation, — are as a rule not privileged but liable to be produced. These decisions proceed on the ground, as I understand them, that the administration of justice in this country is a matter of public interest and to be conducted (again as a general rule) in public, and consequently that there can be nothing privileged or confidential which passes in open court. If, then, the proceedings in the former action had taken place in open court, and if the plaintiffs had in their possession a shorthand writer's note of them, it would seem to me that such a note must be produced. That, however, does not completely answer the question with which I have to deal. Such a note would only show that a particular document had been placed in the witness's hands and had been admitted to be correct, but the contents of the document would not appear. In the present case the document was only made an exhibit and is not on the file. The contents did not appear on the examiner's notes. Beyond what I have stated, no use was ever made of the document in the former action except that it was read in the order of the 13th of November, 1897. Now it appears to me that this order was made in circumstances which constitute it an exception to the rule established by Nicholl v. Jones. It was an ex parte order made in chambers; and the document was obviously brought before the judge to enable him to determine whether the compromise was proper to be approved on behalf of the infants. Such use was not a proper disclosure, but was in its nature confidential, and cannot affect the question I have to decide. It seems to me that the case stands very near in the same position as if on a trial in open court, after a document had been put in a witness's hands and its contents had been admitted to be true, but before it had been read, a compromise had been arranged between counsel. It appears to me that the document in question was never effectually made public, and that the use made of it does not amount to a waiver of the privilege. The particular point does not appear to be covered by authority, but the case which comes nearest to it is North Australian Territory Co. v. Goldsborough, Mort, & Co., 41 W. R. 501, [1893] 2 Ch. 381. There an action was brought by a company in liquidation. In the course of the winding up and after the commencement of the action some of the directors and officers of the company were examined under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, and their depositions duly taken. These depositions had not been filed. In the action upon the cross-examination, under commission, on behalf of the plaintiffs of one of the persons examined under section 115, he was questioned as to certain answers given by himself and other persons who had been examined under section 115, and those answers were read to him from the depositions and admitted to be correct. Of course so much as was read of these depositions got on the notes, and the application there was for the production of the rest of the documents. The present Master of the Rolls says: "The argument of the defendants practically comes to this: that because use was made of these depositions by the plaintiff's counsel in Melbourne, the defendants are entitled to see them. On what principle are they so entitled? It is said that they are entitled because these depositions ought to have been scheduled in the plaintiff's affidavit of documents as documents in their possession relating to matters in dispute in the action; but, if they had been scheduled, privilege would as a matter of course have been claimed for them, and the defendants would never have seen them; and it would not be fair to the plaintiffs if we were to treat these depositions as documents in their possession unprotected by a claim of privilege."

There remains the question as to the copy of the depositions, a much smaller question, and one which but for the existence of the other would not have been brought before me. These copies of depositions simply constitute a note of what took place before the officer of the court in the course of hostile litigation. The depositions are on the file of the court, and may be inspected by any person who shows that he has proper grounds for so doing: see Central Office Practice Rules (Annual Practice, 1897, p. 1229). On such an occasion I take it that no question as to privilege could be raised any more than in the analogous case of documents filed in lunacy, as to which see In re H. W. Strachan, 43 W. R. 369, [1895] 1 Ch. 439.

The depositions have been filed in the usual way. They seem to me to have become publici juris within the meaning of the decisions in Nicholl v. Jones and the cases which have followed it, and to be liable to production accordingly.

Some reliance was placed on The Palermo, but there the depositions of which copies were sought were not publici juris. I think, therefore, that the order ought to be discharged only so far as it directs the production of the accounts. In this case effect is given to both lines of decision; what has become public is to be produced, while that which has not and is in its original nature privileged is to be treated as remaining privileged. The costs of the present application will be costs in the action.

FRIARY, HOLROYD, & CO. v. SINGLETON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Lease—Option to purchase the freehold—If lessee or his assigns should be desirous of purchasing—Equitable assignee.

An equitable assignee of the legal owner of a lease is not an assign within the meaning of a covenant therein giving a right of pre-emption of the freehold to the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and therefore is not entitled in equity, as against the lessor or his assigns, to enforce such right of pre-emption.

By an indenture of lease dated the 24th of June, 1880, and made between one Stone, of the one part, and one Master, of the other part, the White Lion beerhouse at Aldershot was demised to Master for twenty-one years from the 25th of December, 1876, at the yearly rent and subject to the lessee's covenants and conditions therein mentioned, together with an option to purchase the freehold, the terms of which were as follows: And Stone thereby covenanted with Master that if Master, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should at any time during the said term be desirous of purchasing the freehold of the said premises at the price of £450, and of such intention should give six months' notice in writing to Stone, his heirs or assigns, he or they would convey such freehold to Master, his heirs and assigns upon payment of such sum.

Later, in the same year the freehold of the above premises was conveyed to the defendant, a widow, and now of advanced age, subject to the said lease.

The plaintiffs were the successors of a company (here called the old company), to which the Friary Brewery and the freehold and leasehold properties used in connection therewith (including the said leasehold premises), and any right of pre-emption of any of the leasehold hereditaments, were conveyed and assigned by Master by indenture dated in 1889. The old company continued business down to a date in the year 1895, but was not finally dissolved until after the above action was commenced.

By an agreement dated the 25th of June, 1895, and made between the old company by its liquidator, of the one part, and the plaintiffs, of the other part, the old company agreed to sell and the plaintiffs agreed to purchase all the undertakings and the assets of the old company, including the benefit of all business and other rights held by or on behalf of the old company, and all rights of action and property of every description belonging to or held on behalf of the old company. There never was, however, either then or subsequently, a legal assignment to the plaintiffs of the lease with the benefit of the covenant containing the option.

On the 14th of December, 1896, the secretary of the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant's son on her behalf: "Re White Lion, Aldershot. Will you kindly inform me if you are willing that my company should complete this purchase at once, instead of waiting till next year?" and the plaintiffs relied on this letter as being a sufficient notice of their intention to exercise the option given by the said lease.

At this time, and during much of the correspondence which followed, the defendant's son, who acted for her, was, it appeared, under the impression that the defendant was bound to sell to the plaintiffs, but as soon as the defendant's solicitors were informed that no notice (except the above letter) had been given by the plaintiffs they contended that the defendant was not bound by what had passed. It appeared, moreover, that down to the trial of the above action the defendant and her son were not aware of the dissolution of the old company and the equitable assignment of the premises to the plaintiffs.

The present action was for specific performance of the contract alleged to be constituted by service of notice under the option.

Farwell, Q.C., and Fletcher for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs, as equitable assignees under the agreement of the 25th of June, 1895, of the lease, were entitled to exercise the option. Their rights were the same since the Judicature Act as if there had been a legal assignment of the lease with the benefit of the covenant: Walsh v. Lonsdale, 31 W. R. 109, 21 Ch. D. 9. The plaintiffs have exercised the option, and on the facts the defendant is estopped in equity from denying such exercise: Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 25 W. R. 680, 2 App. Cas. 439.

Neville, Q.C., and Bristowe, for the defendant.—The plaintiffs have to bring themselves within the legal terms of the legal covenant in order to maintain this action. Cox v. Bishop, 5 W. R. 437, 8 De G. M. & G 815, shows that an equitable assignee is in quite a different position from a legal assignee of a lease, and that case is still law: see Woodfall, Landlord and Tenant, 16th ed., ch. 7, s. 5, sub-section (a), p. 269. The plaintiffs being in possession does not help them. Possession can make no difference quoad legal rights. The word "assigns" in the covenant means legal assigns. Otherwise there would be no privity of contract between the lessor and the assigns. Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co. was a case of forfeiture, and the principle on which the notice to repair was held to be suspended under the circumstances of that case does not apply here. The exercise of a legal option has never been dealt with differently in equity to what it is at law. The possession of the plaintiffs not being referable to the alleged contract is not part performance—Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467—and nothing else is.

Farwell replied.

Nov. 4.—ROMER, J.—The plaintiffs contend that the letter of the 14th of December, 1896, was a good notice under the lease to purchase the freehold at the end of the term. But, apart from any question arising on the wording of that letter, it appeared on the evidence when the plaintiffs came to prove their title that at the time the letter was written, and up to the commencement of this action, they were not the legal assignees of the lease, but only the equitable assignees of the legal owners. They were not, therefore, in my opinion, the persons entitled under the lease as against the lessor to give the notice, and the lessor did not become bound under the lease on receipt of that letter to sell or assure the freehold to the plaintiffs. The word "assigns" in the option to purchase in the lease given to the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, had, in my opinion, the same meaning as the word "assigns" added to the lessee's name in the covenants entered into by and with him in the lease. In other words, it meant the persons entitled to the term as between them and the lessor, and bound by and entitled to the benefit of the covenants entered into by the lessee and lessor respectively which ran with the land demised. The plaintiffs, though in possession, could not have been sued at law by the lessor on the lessee's covenants, nor could the plaintiffs have sued the lessor's assigns on his covenants in the lease. Nor would the lessor or his assigns have any right in equity to sue the plaintiffs on the lessee's covenants by reason of the plaintiffs being equitable assignees of the lessee's term and in possession: see Cox v. Bishop, and Moore v. Greg, 2 De G. & Sm. 304, decided by Knight-Bruce, V.C., and affirmed by Lord Cottenham, 2 Ph. 717, who at the same time pointed out that the case of Lucas v. Comerford, 1 Ves. jun. 235, 3 Bro. C. C. 166, was not a binding authority. The case of Walsh v. Lonsdale has no bearing on the case now before me. That was a case concerning the rights of two persons under one agreement, whereby one agreed to grant a lease to the other, and possession had been taken on the footing of the agreement, and it was held that the tenant in possession must be held as between him and the landlord to hold on the terms of the agreement as if the lease had been granted. In my judgment, therefore, in the case before me, no valid notice under the lease was given, and the fact that the company which contracted to sell the term to the plaintiffs has been dissolved and cannot now assign need not be considered, for that dissolution only took place after this action was commenced.

Nor can I find that the defendant is in any way estopped or prevented from taking the point that the plaintiffs were not entitled to give the notice to exercise the option under the lease. As a matter of fact, it appears that when the letter of the 14th of December, 1896, was sent, and down to the trial of this action, the defendant and her son and agent were wholly unaware that the plaintiffs were not the same company as that now dissolved, or that the dissolved company, the then legal owner of the term, had equitably assigned to the plaintiffs or was not still in possession of the premises. And, further, it appears that when the letter of the 14th of December, 1896, was received, and during great part of the subsequent correspondence that ensued, the defendant's son, who acted for her, was under the impression that she was bound to sell to the plaintiffs, and immediately her solicitors were informed that no notice under the lease had been given they at once took up the position that the defendant was in no wise bound by what had passed. It follows that the plaintiffs cannot assert as against the defendant that any due or sufficient notice under the lease was given. This being so, it is not disputed that the plaintiffs' case must fail, for apart from a contract made by service of notice under the option, no contract—certainly no contract sufficiently set forth in writing—can be established as against the defendant. It follows that the action fails, and I can see no sufficient reason for depriving the defendant of costs, as I think the wording of the letter of the 14th of December would tend to lead the defendant's son to think that the plaintiffs were already in the position of lessees who had given a valid notice under the lease, and that the only question was whether the purchase should be completed at an earlier date than that fixed by the notice.

Judgment for the defendant.

Licensing law — Sale of intoxicating liquor without licence—Sale by innocent servant of unlicensed person —House of Commons—Exemption—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 3, 72.

An attendant at a refreshment bar situate within the precincts of the House of Commons, acting under the orders of the Kitchen Committee of that House, whose servant he was, supplied a person (not a member of the House) with intoxicating liquor, and received the price on behalf of the Kitchen Committee.

Held, that he had not committed the offence under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, of selling intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed.

Semble, the Houses of Parliament are not exempt from the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1872, so as to enable liquor legally to be sold there without a license.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was laid by the appellant charging the respondent with selling by retail intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same contrary to section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872. The facts were as follows: On the 2nd of May, about 8 p.m., the appellant, entering Westminster Palace in the usual way, and passing through St. Stephen's Hall, proceeded to the bar at the foot of the committee-room staircase, and called for a glass of brandy and soda. This was supplied to him by the respondent, who accepted half-a-crown in payment therefor, returning eighteen pence to the appellant in change. At the same time two other persons were supplied with two glasses of whisky and Apollinaris water by the respondent, who accepted money from them in payment. The respondent, in so acting, was acting as the servant of the House of Commons and in obedience to orders which he had received on their behalf through the Kitchen Committee of the said house, by whom he was paid. The liquor which he delivered was the property of the House of Commons and paid for by the said Kitchen Committee, there being an annual vote of the House in aid of the refreshment department. The money which he received he received for and on behalf of the Kitchen Committee, above the bar being a tariff showing the prices of various intoxicating liquors. The appellant was not, when the liquor was delivered to him, a member of either House of Parliament. The Palace of Westminster is not a place licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor.

It was contended before the magistrate on behalf of the respondent that the sale of liquor in this case was a sale by the House of Commons and not by the respondent, and also that the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1872, did not apply to sales of intoxicating liquor in the Palace of Westminster. The magistrate held that the fact that the respondent was a servant would be no defence to the charge of selling liquor made against him, if the sale was illegal under the said Act; but that section 3 of the Act and the other provisions of the Act did not apply within the Palace of Westminster to sales of liquor by the House of Commons. The questions of law for the court were—(1) whether there was a sale of intoxicating liquor by the respondent within the meaning of section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872; (2) whether section 3 and the other provisions of that Act apply within the Palace of Westminster; (3) whether, under the circumstances, the respondent was guilty of the offence charged.

Section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, enacts that "No person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same or at any place where he is not authorised by his license to sell the same" and goes on to impose penalties for breaches of that enactment.

Asquith, Q.C. (H. L. Stephen with him), for the appellant.—The case falls primâ facie within the words of section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872. Section 72 of the same Act contains a list of exemptions from the Act which is intended to be an exhaustive list; it does not include an exemption in favour of the Houses of Parliament, and there is no reason why the Houses of Parliament should be exempt, at least in respect of sales of liquor to persons not members of those Houses. The argument that the sale of liquor in the Palace of Westminster could not be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Licensing Acts leads not to the conclusion that the Acts do not apply within those precincts but to the conclusion that the sale of liquor there to the general public cannot be carried on without special legislation. The fact that the respondent was a servant only is no defence. The words "without being duly licensed" in section 3 mean "without being duly protected by a license." The offence is one in which mens rea is not a necessary element.

Sir R. A. Webster, A.G. (Henry Sutton and Horace Avory with him), for the respondent.—The whole scheme of the Licensing Act is wholly inapplicable to the Houses of Parliament and they are outside the scope of the Acts. It would be impossible to obtain a license for the Houses of Parliament, and if such a license were obtained a number of provisions would be brought into operation with most absurd consequences. [He then referred to the following, amongst other sections of the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 11 (names of licensed persons to be affixed to premises), s. 18 (power to exclude drunkards from licensed premises), s. 23 (power of justices to close licensed premises in case of riot), s. 25 (penalty on persons found on premises during closing hours), ss. 45 to 47 (qualification, structure, and annual value of premises), and to the Licensing Act, 1874, s. 3 (as to closing hours), and ss. 16, 17 (as to powers of entry on premises by constables and search warrants)]. The sale of liquor in the precincts of the Houses of Westminster was carried on at the time of the passing of these Acts as it is now, and it is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended by these Acts to render illegal, transactions which were well known to be carried on daily in those precincts. The express savings in section 72 are not conclusive as to what bodies and places were intended to be exempted from the Acts: London Joint-Stock Bank v. Mayor of London, 1 C. P. D. 1, at p. 17, 24 W. R. Dig. 144, and the list of exemptions contained in that section is not exhaustive, for it does not include the well-established exemption as to the supply of liquor in a club to the members: Graff v. Evans, 30 W. R. 380; 8 Q. B. D. 373.

If the Acts apply and the Houses of Parliament were licensed under them, the general public would be entitled to enter the Houses and be served with liquor in certain hours, and the powers of the Houses to regulate their own proceedings would be interfered with. This cannot be done: Bradlaugh v. Gossett, 32 W. R. 552, 12 Q. B. D. 181.

The Palace of Westminster is the property of the Crown and is exempt from these Acts on that ground: Reg. v. Justices of Kent, 38 W. R. 253, 24 Q. B. D. 181.

If the Houses of Parliament are outside the scope of the Acts there is nothing to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor there.

Even if the Acts apply, the respondent was a mere servant of the House of Commons, and was acting under their orders. His act is the act of his masters and he cannot be held liable for a breach of the Licensing Acts. The person who is responsible under the Acts is the licensed person or the person who ought to be and is not licensed (Act of 1872, ss. 3, 62), and it cannot be suggested that a mere waiter or barman ought to be licensed. If the waiter sold liquor knowing that his master was not licensed and ought to be licensed he could be made amenable as an aider and abettor under section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

Asquith, Q.C., in reply.—The inapplicability of the Licensing Acts to the Houses of Parliament shows that intoxicating liquor cannot be sold there at all, not that it can be sold there free from the restrictions imposed by the Acts. A servant who provides the liquor and receives the price, is the person who "sells" within the meaning of the Act, and he does so at his own risk, and if his master is not licensed he commits an offence. Servants have been held liable in similar circumstances under the penal provisions of other Acts.*

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This matter comes before us on a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate. The respondent is charged with the commission of an offence against section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872—"for that he sold by retail intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same." Two questions are involved—first whether any offence against the Act was committed, and, if so, secondly whether the respondent is the person who committed the offence. The case states that on the 2nd of May last the appellant (who was the complainant before the magistrate) went to the lobby of the House of Commons and there was given, on payment to the respondent of the price, a glass of brandy and soda water; and that in selling this liquor the respondent was acting as the servant of the House of Commons under the orders of their kitchen committee. On the question whether an offence was committed at all, it was argued that the Houses of Parliament are entirely outside the law which forbids the sale of intoxicating liquors without a license. In the view which we take of the other question raised it is not necessary to decide this point, but I think it right to say that I am very far from satisfied that no offence was committed by the sale of this liquor under the circumstances stated. I am not impressed by the argument that many of the provisions of the Licensing Acts are inapplicable and cannot be carried out with respect to the House of Commons or the House of Lords. It by no means follows that liquor can be sold without a license in those Houses. The Act of 1872 begins with a sweeping prohibition, and it contains a lengthy list of exceptions, which does not include the Houses of Parliament. I am far from satisfied that an offence was not committed by the person responsible for the sale; and even if there were less doubt than I feel, it is obviously convenient that an appeal should be made to Parliament to regularise by legislation what is taking place, if it is necessary to have these places for the sale of liquor in the House of Commons for general convenience.

But did this respondent commit any offence? If the provisions of the Act be carefully examined—"no person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same"—it is impossible not to see that to bring the act of an innocent waiter or barman within them it is necessary to put a rather strong gloss on the words. The Act contemplates a sale by a person who ought to be licensed and is not licensed; of course, neither a waiter nor a barman ever is licensed, and what is struck at is the sale by the person who is in the position of master to the waiter or barman, and who receives the profits of the sale. It is said that the words "without being duly licensed" ought to be read "without being protected by a license," but it may well be that proof of the act of sale by an unlicensed person will be a primâ facie case of the commission of an offence by him, and it is probable that it would lie on him to show that he was a mere servant. But when once it appears that he was a mere servant, and not knowingly accessory to the commission of the offence, he is not guilty of an offence against the Act. If he were accessory, he could, of course, be convicted and punished under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 5. There are cases in which the Legislature, thinking that the law would not have full efficacy without such provisions, has provided that a man without guilty knowledge, and without carelessness on his part, shall be guilty of an offence; but these are exceptions to the rule that mens rea is a necessary ingredient in crime. In the present case the facts show that this man was appointed by responsible members of the House of Commons, and was under the ægis of that responsible body. The law could not contemplate it as just, that by obeying their orders he should make himself guilty of an offence. If there was an offence here, it was committed by those who, as masters or principals, authorized the commission of the offence. I therefore arrive at the same conclusion as the learned magistrate, though upon different grounds.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add that the argument of the Attorney-General involves the fallacy which often arises when, upon a question of the construction of an agreement, it is said that such and such a result could not have been contemplated by the parties. Such an argument cannot have effect except within very narrow limits, for what is to be looked at is what the parties have said in their agreement. So here the Act of Parliament is clear, and it is no argument to say that it has results so strange that if the framers of it had foreseen them they would not be likely to have adopted the Act. I share to the full my lord's doubts as to whether an offence was not committed in this case; but I agree with him that the words "without being duly licensed" cannot be extended so as to mean "without being duly authorised by a person having a license."

Appeal dismissed.

MORRIS (Appellant) v. DUNCAN (Respondent). (a.)

Justices—Summary proceedings—Commencement of proceedings—Limitation of time—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71), s. 62—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (Jervis' Act) (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 62 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873, enacts that all penalties imposed by the Salmon Fisheries Acts "may be recovered within six months after the commission of the offence before two justices" in manner directed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

Section 11 of the latter Act provides that, where no time is specially limited for making a complaint or laying an information on the Act relating to each particular case, the complaint shall be made and the information laid within six months from when the matter arose.

Held, that section 11 of Jervis' Act applied to proceedings for the recovery of a penalty under section 62 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873.

Special case stated by two justices for the county of Durham in petty sessions.

On the 29th of April, 1898, an information was preferred against the respondent by the appellant, an officer of the Fishmongers' Company, charging the respondent with unlawfully having in his possession on the 9th of November, 1897, an unseasonable salmon contrary to section 14 of the provisions of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861. The summons was issued on the 29th of April, 1898, and was served on the respondent on the 3rd of May. At the hearing on the 11th of May it was proved to the satisfaction of the justices that the offence had been committed, but the respondent's solicitor took the objection that notwithstanding that the information had been laid by the appellant within six months from the date of the offence the justices could not convict, inasmuch as it was provided by section 62 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873, that "all penalties imposed by the Salmon Fisheries Acts, 1861 to 1873, or by any law made in pursuance of this Act, and all sums of money, costs, and expenses by the said Acts, or either of them, directed to be recovered in a summary manner, may be recovered within six months after the commission of the offence before two justices in manner directed" by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. The appellant's solicitor contended that it was sufficient that the information had been laid and the summons issued and served within the six months, and that it was not necessary for the conviction to take place within the six months. The justices upheld the respondent's contention and dismissed the information subject to this case.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (Jervis' Act), s. 11, provides "that in all cases where no time is already or shall be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made and such information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose."

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (Travers Humphreys with him), for the appellant.—The use of the word "recovered" in section 62 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, is ambiguous, for it may mean either that the proceedings must be commenced within six months of the commission of the offence or that the judgment of the court must be obtained within that period. The former is the correct meaning of the word, otherwise the enforcement of the Act might be defeated if an adjournment of the hearing were rendered necessary by the illness of a magistrate or some other cause. But if this is not so, then section 62 contains no special limit of time for making a complaint, and therefore the section must be read with section 11 of Jervis's Act, and it is sufficient if the complaint be made within six months of the commission of the offence. A similar question was raised in Reg. v.

Mainwaring, 6 W. R. 594, 27 L. J. M. C. 278, but was not decided.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

WILLS, J.—I regret that we must decide this case without having had the benefit of an argument for the respondent, but the question, though an important one, lies within a narrow compass, and the contentions which would have been put forward by counsel for the respondent, if he had been represented by one, are sufficiently obvious to enable us to deal with the matter. I do not agree with the argument of the appellant's counsel that the term "recovery" taken by itself is ambiguous. I think that the term "recovery" when applied to a sum of money, a penalty, or a debt means the obtaining of the judgment of the court, upon which the sum of money, penalty, or debt, becomes payable. That being so, the limitation provided by the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, applies to the period of recovery, and not to the commencement of the proceedings. Apart from Jervis' Act, a summons might be issued on the last day of the six months, and if it were possible to have it heard on the same day it would still be in time. On the other hand, in order to get a recovery within the period of six months, it might be necessary to commence proceedings at some time, varying according to the practice of the particular petty sessions which had to deal with the case, before the expiration of the six months. That seems to show that the period of limitation given in the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, is not a definite one, and is not what is meant in Jervis' Act by a "time specially limited for making a complaint or laying an information." I think that section 11 of Jervis's Act means that in all cases where there is no Act of Parliament which definitely says that the time for making the complaint or laying the information must be within a specified and defined period, the time within which the proceedings may be commenced shall be six months. There does not seem to me to be any possible injustice in such a construction of section 11, and such a construction is really necessary in order to give full and proper effect to the language of that section. One important object of Jervis' Act was to secure uniformity of procedure in all matters not specially provided for in the particular Act of Parliament. I am of opinion, therefore, that our judgment should be for the appellant, and that the case should be remitted to the magistrate to be heard upon the merits.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that there is any indication in section 62 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, of an intention to impose a different limit of time from that imposed by section 11 of Jervis' Act. The main object of section 62 was no doubt to authorize proceedings before justices. It is a repetition of the first part of section 35 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, which provided the tribunal before whom penalties should be recovered. The first words of section 62 are identical with those of section 35 of the earlier Act, the main object of section 62 being also, no doubt, to provide a tribunal. In my opinion, section 62 means that the penalty may be recovered before two justices in the manner provided by Jervis' Act—that is to say, within six months after the commission of the offence, and that consequently the complaint may be made within that period.

Appeal allowed.

LORD WOLVERTON v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Inland revenue — Succession duty — Alienation—New succession—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 15, 18.

Under the provisions of the will of the second Baron Wolverton, who died in 1887, the whole of his residuary estate, subject to the widow's life interest, was held in trust for the person who might, at the time of the widow's death, answer the description of the testator's right heir at common law. At the testator's death his nieces became his co-heiresses, and the appellant, a nephew, succeeded to the title.

Under a deed of arrangement, dated the 31*st of December*, 1888, the co-heiresses under this will and the appellant assigned their contingent interests, and the widow her life interest, in the testator's residuary estate to trustees upon trust to pay thereout, upon Lady Wolverton's decease, an annuity of £15,000 to the appellant, and certain accumulations and payments were also provided for.

The testator's widow died on the 4*th of January*, 1894, the co-heiresses surviving her, when the Commissioners of Inland Revenue received legacy duty at the rate of 3 per cent. on the whole of the testator's residuary estate. In addition the commissioners claimed succession duty upon the annuity of £15,000 at 6½ per cent. from the appellant as upon a succession coming to the appellant from the testator's widow or from the co-heiresses, or from both.

Held, that no new succession was created in the annuity of £15,000 to which the appellant became entitled, and that he was not liable to duty.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (45 W. R. 236, [1897] 1 Q. B. 231) reversed.

Under a deed of arrangement dated the 31st of December, 1888, Lady Wolverton gave up her life interest in certain bank shares and the co-heiresses of the second Baron Wolverton and the appellant gave up their rights to the whole residue of his estate in return for the certain benefits, immediate and future, provided for by the indenture. The arrangement and effect of the deed and the whole circumstances are dealt with in their lordships' judgments.

The commissioners claimed succession duty on the annuity of £15,000 given to the present appellant and provided for by the above indenture as upon a succession coming to the appellant from Lady Wolverton and the co-heiresses, or both, and filed an information claiming the duty.

The Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal held that succession duty became payable upon the death of Lady Wolverton in respect of the value of the annuity of £15,000 (45 W. R. 236).

The appellant appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Eady, Q.C. (Danckwerts with them).—Having regard to the Succession Duty Act, 1853, ss. 2, 15, 18, the appellant is not liable to pay any succession duty. But for the deed he would not take. It was not possible to say who would take under the residuary clause. Legacy duty at 3 per cent. was paid in respect of the whole of the residuary estate. There was no new succession; the assignee is only liable to the same extent as the assignor. The effect of these deeds was that the co-heiresses assigned the residuary estate, &c., and therefore the appellant takes this property as assignee.

They referred to Hanson, pp. 538, 641.

The cases are dealt with in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., and Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with them), for the respondent.—The deed created a new succession, and therefore the appellant is liable. This interest is created out of the interests of the co-heiresses. The payment of legacy duty by the co-heiresses does not relieve the appellant, and section 15 does not apply.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Mitchell, 29 W. R 683, 6 Q. B. D. 548; In re Jenkinson, 5 W. R. 301, 24 Beav. 64; Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, 9 W. R. 601, 9 H. L. The House took time for consideration.

July 12.—Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—George Grenfell, second Baron Wolverton, died on the 6th of November, 1887. Under the provisions of his will, and in the events which happened, five nieces, described as the co-heiresses, became entitled to his residuary estate upon the death of Lady Wolverton. That lady died on the 4th of January, 1894, and upon her death legacy duty at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum was paid upon the whole residue of the testator's estate.

On the 31st of December, 1888, a deed had been executed by, among others, the five nieces, the late Lady Wolverton, and the present Lord Wolverton. By that deed the present Lord Wolverton, the appellant here, became entitled to an annuity of £15,000, and the question here is whether he is liable to pay succession duty upon this annuity.

The claim of the Crown is based upon the annuity being liable to duty as upon a succession coming to the appellant from the late Lady Wolverton, or the five nieces, or from both, and the sum of money in question is said to come within the express language of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. The words of the section are as follows: "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation; and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a succession"; "and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived."

Before dealing with the particular question now before your lordships it will not be inappropriate to say a word or two upon the apparent scope and object of the section which I have quoted. What it points to is the disposition of property by reason whereof a person becomes beneficially entitled upon the death of any person. The disposition may be past or future: it may take effect immediately or after an interval; it may be either certainly or contingently; it may be either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, but with all these safeguards against evasion it must be a disposition by reason whereof a person has become beneficially entitled upon the death of some person. If a person were to confer by a deed of gift inter vivos his own existing property it would seem impossible to contend that this is a new succession. It is simply a transfer inter vivos of one person's property to another, and is not within the scope of the Act at all. Whether the succession be operated by disposition or devolution it must be a succession upon death.

Now, I am unable to understand how the annuity created under the deed to which I have referred is a succession at all. If it is a gift inter vivos, deriving no force from the death of anyone, I do not find any word in the section which make it chargeable with duty. If chargeable, a voluntary gift of it by him, or any part of it during his own life, would equally make such gift chargeable with duty, and the whole nature of the legislation aimed at, succession upon death, would be altered into taxation upon transfer of any property by gifts inter vivos, and this to any extent of remoteness, so that each donee, though inter vivos, would become in turn the predecessor, within the meaning of the section, to each subsequent donee of the same property, although no new death had intervened at all, but simply a change of proprietorship.

It is obvious to ask in this case whence it is that Lord Wolverton's interest in the annuity is derived. The Crown contends that it is derived from the nieces, or from Lady Wolverton, or from both. Let us take them separately. Suppose these ladies had waited to make the deed in question till the death of Lady Wolverton, and had thus become entitled in possession to the whole of the late Lord Wolverton's residuary estate, would they then have been entitled to hand over all or a part of what had become absolutely their own? The element of succession upon death would be entirely wanting, and though the word "succession" has a technical definition in the Act, the whole scope and meaning of the Act points to a distinction between alienation between living persons and a succession which death has opened to a successor.

It seems to me that if this case can be maintained, then if A. inherits and pays his succession duty, every donee from A. down to Z. must pay it also. Such a tax would be both unreasonable in itself and impossible of collection. The succession to property upon a death is one thing, the free gift inter vivos is a totally different thing.

I am aware that the Crown repudiated this view, but it is not permissible to repudiate the logical conclusion of a contention by saying that the Crown would not insist upon such a right. It will not do to throw over consequences which may reduce the argument to an absurdity. The question here is the true construction of the Act. I am unable to deal with it because I am afraid that I do not understand the suggestion, of one succession being substituted for another or how in this case it would arise.

The present Lord Wolverton got nothing upon the death either of the second Lord Wolverton or by the death of Lady Wolverton. The utmost that can be said is that upon the occurrence of the death of Lady Wolverton the present Lord Wolverton's donors obtained the power to render effectual a gift which they had inter vivos agreed to give him before the death took place. "Succession" in the Act means not the act of succeeding; but property chargeable with duty under the Act, and, as Baron Bramwell pointed out in In re Peyton, 9 W. R. 838, 7 H. & N. 296, property may escape the tax for all time by always passing inter vivos.

I am of opinion that the annuity given by the deed of the 31st of December, 1888, is not within section 2 of the Act at all. Lord Wolverton certainly obtained nothing by Lady Wolverton's death. She dealt with her own life interest in the property during her life.

I am not, of course, suggesting that the transfer inter vivos of property, the right to which arises upon the death, can escape the duty by its being transferred to a person other than the original successor. The succession once created, the duty must be paid for it, but I can find no warrant in the statute for a new succession duty being leviable upon the same property or money where no new death has created the right to such succession.

I have hitherto dealt, and only dealt with the second section itself. It is that section which imposes the tax. But the fifteenth section, which is supplementary to it, to my mind, places the matter beyond all possibility of doubt. The framers of the Act contemplated the case of the original person intended to succeed under the disposition or devolution spoken of in section 2 transferring the interest to some other person, and I think the effect of that part of section 15 with which we are dealing, is that the person to whom such an interest has been transferred shall stand in the shoes of the person originally entitled, and shall be chargeable with duty at the same time and at the same rate as the person originally entitled would have been chargeable if the interest had not been so transferred.

The succession to the sum of money which created the annuity of £15,000 was a succession rendering the successor liable to the tax, but the five nieces were the "successor," and undoubtedly they would be liable to the tax if they had not already paid it in a different form. But they had paid it in the form of legacy duty, and the Succession Duty Act enacts that anyone who is charged with the duties on legacies shall not also be charged in respect of the same acquisition of property under the Succession Duty Act.

I do not think that it would be proper to rely upon the fact that the legacy duty was charged, if it were charged, erroneously—that could not estop the Crown in arguing what was the true construction of the Act. But I think that it was charged, properly—rightly.

Looking at the scheme of the Act and the application of the second, fifteenth, and eighteenth sections as applied to the facts in the present case I confess that I am unable to appreciate the difficulties which have been supposed to surround it.

It is not very intelligible to me what is intended by the argument relied on apparently so much in the court below, as to whether the annuity granted to Lord Wolverton was one annuity or two annuities. If (and it is the only intelligible meaning that I can attribute to these phrases) it is meant that the sources from which the annuity given to Lord Wolverton are two different sources, that is quite true, but what relevancy has it to the question under debate? Lady Wolverton could, and did, only affect her own life estate. On her death nothing was left to succeed to. The co-heiresses, by the annuity to Lord Wolverton, gave nothing to which a title accrued by anyone's death, and I am unable to see, therefore, what the other source from which the annuity is derived has to do with this question. Nor do I see what relation the mode in which people dispose, inter vivos, of what they have got already can affect the question of what is only payable upon a succession which, by the hypothesis, is not a new succession, but a disposition of property obtained under an old succession upon which duty has been paid already.

It seems to be assumed without explanation, at least so far as I can understand, that there is a new succession, and if there were a new succession, no doubt the consequence would follow. But the only point being whether there is a new succession, or not, that appears in the argument to be assumed, and then an elaborate explanation is given of the consequences that must follow from that succession. For the reasons, however, which I have given, I think that there is no new succession, and, if there is not, it is, to my mind, perfectly immaterial what, in fact, is done with the property to which a donee had already succeeded.

As to the point upon the seventeenth section, I quite concur with the Court of Appeal that the argument founded upon that section is untenable.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, with the usual result as to costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The Attorney-General, by the information upon which this appeal arises, sought to have it declared that upon the death of the late Lady Wolverton succession duty at the rate of 6½ per cent. became payable in respect of the value of an annuity of £15,000 per annum, to which the defendant became entitled under a deed to which I will call attention immediately. The Divisional Court by its order made the declaration prayed, and this order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The second Lord Wolverton by his will vested his property in trustees upon trust to pay, assign, and make over the whole residue of his estate to Henry Richard Glyn if he should be living at the time of the decease of the testator's wife, and if he should be then dead to stand possessed thereof upon trust for the person who should be the testator's right heir at common law for his absolute use and benefit.

Henry Richard Glyn died in the lifetime of Lady Wolverton, and at her death the five daughters of a brother of the testator, being his right heirs, became entitled to his residuary estate. These ladies were called in the argument his co-heiresses, and it will be convenient to adopt this designation.

After the death of the testator and H. R. Glyn a deed of arrangement was entered into, to which Lady Wolverton, the co-heiresses, and the present Lord Wolverton were parties. The arrangement was founded, as the deed expressed, on the circumstance that it was contrary to the supposed intention of the testator that no part of his residuary estate should devolve on the person for the time being holding the title of Baron Wolverton. It is not necessary to refer to the provisions of the deed so far as they relate to what was to be done during the lifetime of Lady Wolverton, inasmuch as in my opinion they have no bearing whatever upon the point which has to be determined. Their introduction into the argument in the courts below tended, I think, to obscure the real point, and thus perhaps assisted to bring about what I think was an erroneous conclusion. The whole residuary estate of the testator expectant on the death of Lady Wolverton became by the arrangement vested in trustees, who were, as soon as Lady Wolverton died, to pay out of the annual income thereof an annuity of £15,000 a year to Lord Wolverton, the appellant. This is the annuity in question. It may be well to add that there was a further trust in case of the death of the then Lord Wolverton to pay a like annuity to the person for the time being holding that title. I pause here to call attention to the legal position of the parties. But for the deed of arrangement the co-heiresses would, on the death of Lady Wolverton, have become entitled in possession to the whole of the residuary property left by the testator. The only title which the appellant had to any part of it was derived from the assignment contained in the deed under which they had vested the property in trustees in part for his benefit. It is only by virtue of this assignment that he is entitled to the annuity. Legacy duty at the rate of 3 per cent. (the rate applicable to the case of nieces taking a benefit from an uncle) has been paid to the Crown in respect of the whole of the residuary estate.

There can be no doubt, as was admitted by the Crown, that the disposition by the testator by reason whereof the co-heiresses became entitled to his residuary estate upon the death of Lady Wolverton conferred a succession, and that they became "successors" and the testator their "predecessor" within the meaning of the second section of the Succession Duty Act. I take it to be equally clear that the succession came into existence as soon as the testator died, and that its creation was not postponed until the death of the tenant for life. Indeed this was admitted by the Solicitor-General as soon as his attention was called to the terms of the section making it applicable to past dispositions.

It was contended for the Crown that the disposition contained in the deed of arrangement also created a succession to a part of the same property—viz., the annuity on the death of Lady Wolverton; that the successor under this disposition was the appellant, the predecessors being his cousins, the co-heiresses. The disposition contained in the deed of arrangement came, it was said, within the very terms of section 2, and not the less so even if it were the mere transfer from one person to another of a part of the succession already created.

It was not, however, argued that in such a case there were two successors who came into possession at the death of the tenant for life, but that the disposition by way of assignment by the original successor created a new succession which was substituted for that conferred by the prior disposition. I do not wonder that the contention was thus limited, for it would otherwise inevitably have followed that if property, to which a person was entitled expectant on a death, had passed by deed inter vivos a dozen times by way of gratuitous assignment during the lifetime of the tenant for life, a dozen duties would have been payable, although the last assignee only, would have acquired the property in possession.

I will assume for the purpose of argument that the disposition contained in the deed of arrangement was such as to satisfy the terms of section 2. In my opinion it was because the Legislature thought that an alienation by a successor of his succession might be thought to be within those terms that the fifteenth section was framed as it is. But before referring to the provisions of that section I will deal with the argument presented on behalf of the Crown.

I am unable to find in the Act any warrant for the view that a succession once created can by the act of the successor cease to exist and another succession be substituted for it. The words of section 10 are precise: "There shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every such succession as aforesaid" the following duties: and these are made dependent on the relationship of the predecessor and successor. This provision operates, in my opinion, as soon as the disposition is made by which a "succession" is conferred. Moreover, "succession" denotes by clause 1 any property chargeable with duty under the Act. No doubt the time of payment is fixed by section 20, but this is quite a different thing from the obligation to pay. The time of payment is to be when the successor "or any person in his right or on his behalf" shall become entitled in possession to his succession. This contemplates that at the time the succession falls in, some person in right of the successor, and not the successor himself, may be entitled to the possession. The original successor is none the less called the successor.

I have not forgotten the argument of the Solicitor-General that an alienee for value does not become a new successor although a gratuitous alienee does, and that the language I have referred to is thus sufficiently satisfied. I shall deal with this argument when I come to consider the 15th section of the Act. It does not touch the point I am now concerned with—that section 20, to say the least, affords no support to the argument that one on whom a succession has been conferred can destroy it and the obligation to pay the duty which was attached to it by alienating it.

And when we come to section 44, which provides who are to be "personally accountable" to Her Majesty "besides the successor," amongst those named are "every person in whom" any property su ject to such duty "shall be vested by alienation or other derivative title at the time of the succession becoming an interest in possession." Here again there is nothing to suggest that a person who has once been a successor has ceased to be so if prior to the time of the succession becoming an interest in possession he has alienated it.

It was argued that the provisions of section 21, relating to the mode of assessment of the duty, in the case of real estate, would hardly be workable if in those provisions the word "successor" were held to refer to the original successor and not to his alienee. I think the application of this section may give rise to difficulty in certain cases. But it is to be observed that it does not determine either who is to be charged with the duty, when it attaches or becomes payable, or what is to be its rate. It is merely a rule for ascertaining the amount. And the difficulty is not got rid of by adopting the argument of the Crown, for it is just as great in the case of an alienation for a money consideration, which, it is admitted, does not make the alienee a new successor as in the case of a gratuitous alienation. It is not necessary to express any opinion on the operation of that section (which was discussed in The Solicitor-General v. The Law Reversionary Society, 21 W. R. 854, L. R. 8 Ex. 233), it is enough to say that it affords no sufficient reason for departing from what appears to me to the unambiguous meaning of the leading provisions of the Act to which I have called attention, and which, it must be remembered, apply to realty and personalty alike.

I am not surprised that the notion that the gratuitous alienation of a succession before the time for payment of the duty arrives, creates a new succession ousting the original one and becoming substituted for it, finds no countenance in the provisions of the Act. In the present case the contention of the Crown operates in favour of the revenue and increases the amount of the tax, but in many, and perhaps the majority of cases, it would have precisely the contrary effect. It would be strange if a person in whom a succession had been created by a stranger in blood, and in respect of which therefore a duty of 10 per cent. would be payable, should be able by a gratuitous alienation to his son before the death occurred to reduce the duty payable to 1 per cent. It seems to me inconsistent with the entire scheme of the Act that when once a succession has been created and the liability to duty has attached, a mere voluntary assignment of the right vested in the successor, by the disposition of it, or any part of it, should alter the succession duty and make another, and it may be a lower, duty payable at the time when the succession falls into possession.

Before proceeding to consider the 15th section, I may refer to the only authorities I am aware of bearing upon the question whether the alienation of a succession, or the creation of a new succession by alienation, can so extinguish the original succession as to get rid of the duty which has become leviable and chargeable in respect of it.

In Solicitor-General v. The Law Reversionary Society the Court of Exchequer laid down certain conclusions as established on a consideration of the various sections of the Act. They held that, though the duty is not payable until the time of actual enjoyment of the property, "the title to the succession dates from the disposition, and there is never any title to the property free from the duty," and that a person who has had a succession conferred upon him cannot by parting with it prevent it from being a succession. The only case which affords any support to the idea that a new succession can take the place of an old one is In re Cooper and Allen, 25 W. R. 301, 4 Ch. D. 802, at p. 824, decided by Jessel, M.R. In that case, A. and B., tenant for life and remainderman, conveyed their estates for money to C. in fee. C. died, having devised to D. in fee; D. paid duty on his succession from C. It was held that no more duty would be payable on the death of A., the tenant for life. It must be borne in mind that the case related to real estate, and that it was a special one, inasmuch as C., having taken a conveyance from the tenant for life, came at once in possession of the land and the income and profits thereof, in respect of which a succession had been created. Jessel, M.R., was of opinion that the conveyance to C. did not create a new succession, and that if he had remained owner until the death of the tenant for life the duty payable on the death of the tenant for life by the remainderman would have been payable by C., but that inasmuch as a new succession was created by the devise to D. and the death of C., the only duty payable was on that new succession. That new succession arose from a new disposition making the succession to property dependent on a new death, and it related to real estate; the case is therefore quite distinguishable from the present. But there are observations of Sir George Jessel which have a bearing on the present case. I confess that I find a difficulty in following some of the reasoning of the learned judge. He considered that because D. succeeded on the death of C., and that was a new succession, duty could only be payable on that succession, and the duty which attached by reason of the original disposition was no longer payable. Why, he asks, should a successor who is in possession of property pay two duties? The Crown has, he says, by the merger got the benefit of reducing the estate once more to the fee simple on which there is a succession and a successor coming in pays the duty. Further on, there occurs the following passage: "I think it is very difficult to give any meaning to the exception from the 15th section of alienations conferring new successions, unless it has the meaning which I attribute to it, because if the alienation does not confer a new succession, duty is to be paid at the same rate and time as on the original succession—that is, you are to wait for the payment. If it confers a new succession, then of course you will get payment on whichever succession comes first." Again, in discussing the effect of the 14th section, which applies only to personalty, the learned judge says that it would be singular if in the case of realty more than one duty was payable in case of devolution on death during the lifetime of the tenant for life "because the Act was intended to assimilate the duty upon personalty and realty." And he adds further on: "In the case of succession to real estate, the object of the Act is to let the last succession prevail; but as regards personal estate it is enacted that the highest duty shall be paid." I cannot see how the reasoning of the learned judge establishes that in the case before him there could be only one succession duty payable, and that in respect of the new succession. The merger of which the learned judge speaks did not arise by virtue of C.'s disposition, for the fee simple was vested in C. during his lifetime just as much as in D. after his death. It arose from the fact of his taking a conveyance from the tenant for life as well as from the person entitled to the succession. He was thereupon entitled to the estate in immediate possession. But the possession to which he then became entitled, and his right to the income and profits of the land, was not derived from the conveyance to him of B.'s succession, but solely from the fact that he was the owner of A.'s life estate. If he had purchased this only he would have been equally entitled to possession of the land and to the income and profits thereof. If he had only purchased the succession he would at that time and down to his death have been entitled to neither. The devise by C. to D. created a succession in respect of property which was not at that time the subject of any succession—namely, the estate during the life of A. I think, with all respect, that Jessel, M.R., overlooked these facts. When D. came into possession of the land by reason of C.'s devise, he undoubtedly became entitled in possession to a succession, and duty became then payable in respect of it, though the original succession had not then become, in the language of section 44, "an interest in possession." Duty would equally have been payable if C. had never acquired any title to the remainder in respect of which a succession had previously been conferred, and no title thereto had passed to D.

It is not necessary to determine what duty or duties became payable by D. Nor is it necessary to decide whether in the case of real estate the object of the Act is to let the last succession prevail. Such a conclusion cannot, however, in my opinion, be deduced from section 15, which only prescribes what duty is to be paid where a new succession has not been conferred. The argument derived by the learned judge from a consideration of the provisions of section 14 in connection with section 15 is, in my opinion, not a sound one. It is not correct to say that the Succession Duty Act was intended to assimilate the duty upon personalty and realty. Even in the view adopted by the learned judge the assimilation was not complete, for whilst in the case of personal estate if there were several successors by death to the interest of the original successor before it fell into possession the highest rate of duty is imposed which, if every successor had been subject to duty, would have been payable by any one of them. In the case of realty the rate was said to be determined by the last succession, and might therefore be the lowest instead of the highest.

But in truth, so far from assimilating realty and personalty for purposes of the duty, the Act created a fundamental distinction between them, and that to the advantage of realty. For whereas in the case of personalty the duty was charged at the prescribed rate upon the capital value of the property succeeded to, in the case of realty the charge was to be assessed only on the basis of succession to a life interest. The provision for assessment contained in section 21 affords a reason for the restriction of section 14 to successions to personalty.

I proceed now to examine somewhat more closely the language of section 15. The latter part of that section provides that where any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto (i.e., to the succession already conferred) in possession, have become vested by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created.

As I have already stated, a part of the succession to which the co-heiresses were entitled became vested by alienation in the appellant. The case therefore seems to come within the very words of section 15. For I can see no ground for a distinction between the transfer by alienation of the right to receive the whole of the personalty which is the subject of the succession or a part of it. It was argued on behalf of the Crown that the word "alienation" must be confined to alienation for valuable consideration; that the words "not conferring a new succession" qualified the word "alienation" as well as the words which immediately follow it, and that every gratuitous alienation must create a new succession substituted for the one from which it was derived.

I have already given reasons for thinking the last of these propositions ill-founded.

If the word "alienation" was only intended to apply to cases in which it was in respect of a money consideration, why were no words to that effect inserted? I think that there is no warrant for putting any limitation upon the word which is not found in the terms of the section.

As in my opinion no new succession was created in the money to which the appellant has become entitled, it is immaterial whether the words "not conferring a new succession" do or do not qualify the the word "alienation." But I think it right to state that, in my opinion, they do not, and the fact that they do not strengthens the arguments which I have adduced as to the scheme of the Legislation.

It is certainly not construing the words "by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession" according to their grammatical meaning to refer the words "not conferring a new succession" to "alienation" as well as to "by any title." And if I am right in thinking that mere alienation of an existing succession does not of itself create a new succession, then the section may be construed according to its grammar, and is drawn in the manner one would have expected.

It is true that Sir George Jessel, in the case already referred to, expressed the opinion that the words, "not conferring a new succession" apply to the word "alienation" as well as to the words "any title," though he confessed that in that view the grammar was not perfect or beyond criticism. The reason he gave was that it would be very difficult to say what title there could be conferring a new succession, if not an alienation. I do not think the reason a sound one. A succession might, for example, before it fell into possession, have devolved by death upon another person or persons, so as to create a new succession. Such person or persons are termed in section 14 "other successor or successors." It was necessary to insert after the words "by any title" the words "not conferring a new succession," otherwise there would have been a conflict as regards personalty between the 14th and 15th sections. On the other hand, a succession might by operation of law become vested in some other person, as, for example, an assignee in bankruptcy, which would be a title not creating a new succession. But I can see nothing either in the terms of the section or in the reason of the thing to suggest that an alienation by instrument inter vivos, which merely transferred the interest of the successor or some part of it to some other person, would create a new succession. In such a case the same property passes into possession on the same death; and though by a transaction inter vivos another person is substituted for the original successor, I do not think it can reasonably be said that "a new succession" was thereby conferred.

For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the 15th section applies, and that the duty payable in respect of the property into the possession of which the appellant came is to be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no alienation had been made by the co-heiresses and they had themselves become entitled in possession.

I have so far mainly dealt with the case on a consideration of the terms of the statute as if the matter were res integra unaffected by previous decisions. It was, however, argued for the Crown that the case of the Attorney-General v. Cecil, 18 W. R. 949, L. R. 5 Ex. 263, was an authority in favour of their contention that the 15th section was inapplicable. I do not think so. In that case a father and son being tenant for life and tenant in tail under a settlement, the entail was barred and the estates settled to their joint appointment, and subject thereto to the uses of the earlier settlement. They afterwards appointed a term to a trustee, on trust to raise £20,000 for a younger son. On the money becoming payable to him upon the death of the original tenant for life, the question arose whether duty was payable at 3 per cent. as upon a succession derived from his brother, or at 1 per cent. only. The court held the former duty payable. It was contended that section 15 applied, and that the same duty only was payable as the tenant in tail would have paid on succession to the entailed estates. That case seems to me far removed from the present one. It was impossible to say with any reason that Lord Eustace Cecil succeeded to the £20,000 by reason of the vesting in him by alienation of a portion of the succession to which his brother was entitled under the original settlement. If the entire interest of the tenant in tail under that settlement had been conveyed to Lord Eustace Cecil he would have taken nothing at all, in the event which happened, inasmuch as the tenant in tail died without issue in the lifetime of the tenant for life. By the disentailing deed the estate of the tenant in tail became enlarged to an estate in fee. If he had survived his father he would have taken within the meaning of the 12th section under a disposition made by himself, and not under the original settlement. How, therefore, could it be said that the charge created in favour of Lord Eustace Cecil vested in him by alienation the succession to which the tenant in tail was entitled under the original settlement or any part thereof. The decision in no way conflicts with the conclusion at which I have arrived. There may have been some divergence in the reasons given by the learned judges in the case which I have been considering for the conclusion at which they arrived, but there is nothing really inconsistent with the construction which I have put upon the 15th section. On the contrary, according to the report of the case in the Law Journal (139 L. J. Ex. 201), which is fuller than that in the Law Reports, Kelly, C.B., said: "If the charge had been made or the term had been created out of the original succession, it would have come strictly within the words of this section of the Act (i.e., the 15th) and would have created no new succession at all."

In Braybrooke v. The Attorney-General Lord Wensleydale said that the 15th section was meant to meet the simple case of a person having a right to a succession within the meaning of the Act totally alienating that right to another person before the succession opens, or carving out a derivative interest from it, in which case the section provides that the assignee or the person having the derivative title shall stand on the same footing as the assignor. But if there is something different from a mere transfer of the interest or a part of it, if there is a title conferring a new succession in any other person, then the 15th section does not apply.

In The Attorney-General v. Yelverton, Martin, B., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the court, said of the 15th section: "It seems to us to refer to a species of property different from that on which the duty is claimed in the present case—that is to say, a reversionary property in respect of which the assignee would have been liable to duty but which he has assigned."

There is thus a considerable weight of judicial opinion in support of the views which I have expressed. The scheme of the Act, as I have presented it to your lordships, appears to me to be clear, consistent, and equitable, and it is arrived at by giving to the provisions which impose the duty and which determine its rate and time of payment, and the persons who are to be accountable for it, their natural grammatical meaning.

Having arrived, then, at the conclusion that duty was payable at the same rate and time as if the co-heiresses had made no alienation, the only question which remains in whether the payment of legacy duty at 3 per cent. on the entire residuary estate of the testator renders the duty of 3 per cent., which would otherwise have been payable on the succession in question, no longer payable. This depends on the concluding provision of section 18. It enacts that "no person charged with the duties on legacies and shares of personal estate under the Legacy Duty Acts shall be charged also with the duty granted by this Act in respect of the same acquisition of the same property." It is clear that the co-heiresses could not have been called on to pay any further duty on the property which they assigned to the appellant. Having paid the legacy duty, no succession duty would have been payable by them at the time of Lady Wolverton's death or any other time. If I am right in the view which I have expressed, that the alienation did not create a new succession, it seems to me to follow that the Crown cannot be entitled both to legacy and succession duty in respect of the acquisition of the same property, on the same death, whether by the successor or his assignee. I think any other conclusion would be unreasonable, and contrary to the manifest intention of the enactment.

For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment ought to be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—"The Act," it has been observed, "is a difficult Act" (4 Ch. D. 823), "and the dicta are not less difficult to consider than the Act itself." So said a distinguished judge speaking of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. I cannot help thinking that there is a good deal of truth in that saying, and just a touch of warning which the author of the observation himself might sometimes perhaps (if I may venture to say so) have kept in view without impropriety. Happily the provisions of the Act bearing upon the question now before the House do not present any very great difficulty, and even the dicta are less embarrassing than usual.

The disposition which your lordships have to consider in connection with the Act relates to the residuary estate bequeathed by the will of the second Lord Wolverton, who died in November, 1887. He left a widow, but no issue. He was succeeded in the title by his nephew. The third baron died unmarried in July, 1888. His successor was his brother, the present appellant.

Under the limitations contained in the testator's will the third baron would have become entitled to the testator's residuary estate, which was of very great value, if he had survived the testator's widow. But by reason of his death in her lifetime the whole residuary estate, subject to the widow's life interest, came to be held in trust for the person who might at the time of the widow's death answer the description of the testator's right heir at common law."

Now, the co-heiresses of the testator at the time of his death, and at the time of the death of the third baron, were the five daughters of the testator's next brother, who had died in the testator's lifetime without male issue. If they had never existed, the third baron, and after him, the appellant, would have been the testator's heir-at-law.

In this state of things, in order to carry out what was supposed to have been the testator's intention, and to prevent the property passing away from the title, and in order at the same time to make suitable provision for the co-heiresses, a family arrangement was come to between the co-heiresses, the appellant, and the testator's widow. The co-heiresses and the appellant brought in their contingent interests, and the widow gave up her life interest in certain bank shares producing an income of over £50,000 which had fallen into the residue on the death of the third baron. The scheme of the arrangement was this: The income of the bank shares was to be used to pay an annuity of £15,000 to the appellant, and annuities to the co-heiresses during the widow's life, the surplus income during her lifetime was to be accumulated. On the death of the widow certain capital sums were to be paid to the co-heiresses out of the accumulated fund, supplemented, if necessary, by the accumulation of the surplus income of the entire estate after payment thereout of an annuity of £15,000 to the holder of the title for the time being during the period of accumulation; subject to these provisions the property was to be settled so as to go along with the title. The arrangement was embodied in a deed dated the 31st of December, 1888, by which the widow assigned to trustees her interest in the bank shares, and the co-heiresses and the appellant assigned to the same trustees all their interest in the testator's residuary estate.

The testator's widow died on the 4th of January, 1894. The five co-heiresses survived her. The accumulated fund was then insufficient to answer the claims of the co-heiresses, and so a further period of accumulation commenced, during which the apellant, as the holder of the barony, became entitled under the trusts of the deed of arrangement to the annuity of £15,000 payable out of the testator's residuary estate.

On the death of the widow the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed and received legacy duty at the rate of 3 per centum on the whole of the testator's residuary estate. In addition to the legacy duty so claimed and paid the commissioners claimed succession duty upon the annuity of £15,000 as upon a succession coming to the appellant from the testator's widow or from the co-heiresses, or from both the widow and the co-heiresses. The claim was held good in the Queen's Bench Division and in the Court of Appeal. The matter now remains for your lordship's determination.

The question depends simply on the effect of two sections of the Succession Duty Act, the 15th and the 18th.

Section 15 enacts that "where . . . any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto, or to the income thereof in possession, have become vested by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created."

I may observe in passing, with all deference to Sir George Jessel, M.R., that I cannot see any reason why the expression "not conferring a new succession" should be read as qualifying the word "alienation" as well as the words "any title." Not that that construction would make any practical difference. But it is not wanted: it rather confuses the meaning, and it is forbidden by the structure of the sentence according to the ordinary rules of grammar. A mere alienation—a mere transfer of a subsisting succession—cannot confer a new succession. But a new succession may of course be conferred by a title in which alienation is followed by a transmission of interest before the succession vests in possession.

It seems to me that the case which your lordships have before you is precisely the case contemplated in the 15th section of the Act. I do not think that the transaction in respect of which the commissioners are now claiming succession duty could be described more accurately than in the very words of that section. The succession of the co-heiressess—that is to say, the residuary estate of the testator to which, at the date of the deed of arrangement, the co-heiresses were contingently entitled, and which was chargeable with duty on the death of the widow, became to the extent of £15,000 per annum vested by alienation in the appellant as the holder of the barony before the co-heiresses became entitled thereto in possession, and therefore if the 15th section had stood alone the duty payable in respect thereof to the extent of the annuity would have had to be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if the deed of arrangement had not been executed and no such alienation had been made. But then the provision at the end of the 18th section comes in, which enacts that no person charged with the duties on legacies and shares of personal estate under the Legacy Duty Acts in respect of any property subject to such duties shall be charged also with the duty granted by the Succession Duty Act in respect of the same acquisition of the same property. Now, if the alienation in question had not been made, and if the whole of the testator's residuary estate had come to the co-heiresses, they could not have been charged with succession duty on any part of their succession. The charge for succession duty would have been cleared by the payment of legacy duty. It follows, therefore, from the combined operation of the 15th and 18th sections that no succession duty can now be claimed in respect of the annuity of £15,000 payable to the appellant as from the widow's death out of the income of the testator's residuary estate.

Speaking for myself I hardly think it necessary to say anything more. And, indeed, I should not have supposed the question open to argument if it had not been argued so strenuously on the part of the Crown. However, as the claim for duty has been made, and made with success in both the courts below, it would scarcely be respectful to omit all reference to the judgments under review.

In the Queen's Bench the ground of decision which I believe commends itself to your lordships, though argued, was not even noticed in the judgment of the court. It was supposed by the court—I do not know why—that the defence rested on two grounds, and two grounds only. One was that the annuity which became payable after the widow's death out of the succession of the co-heiresses was the same annuity which was payable during her lifetime out of the income of the bank shares, and that in fact there was only one annuity. The other was that the annuity payable after the widow's death was payable under a contract for valuable consideration in money or money's worth within the meaning of section 17. Both those grounds were plainly untenable, and both were properly rejected by the Court of Queen's Bench.

In the Court of Appeal the same arguments were repeated. They met with much the same fate. And the real ground of defence fared little better there than it did in the Queen's Bench. It suffered, I think, from being found in bad company. All the learned judges of the Court of Appeal say that Lord Wolverton's annuity was "a new succession" because it was not a continuation of the old annuity, but came into existence for the first time at the widow's death. That, however, was not the point. The point was, that the annuity to which Lord Wolverton became entitled after the widow's death was carved out of the succession of the co-heiresses, and was merely an alienation of part of their succession.

Besides holding that the annuity was a "new succession," both Lord Esher, M.R., and Rigby, L.J., relied on a proposition—a "larger proposition," Lord Esher calls it, which they attribute erroneously, I think, to Martin, B. They both seem to think that Martin, B., differed from Lord Wensleydale as to the true meaning of section 15. Now, Lord Wensleydale's opinion is to be found in his judgment in Braybrooke v. Attorney-General. In that case he dissented from the majority of the House, but the decision did not turn on the 15th section at all. What he said about section 15 was obiter dictum, but it was not at variance with anything said by the other noble and learned lords who took part in the case. The opinion of Martin, B., in the view of Lord Esher and Rigby, L.J., is to be extracted from one sentence in the report of the case of the Attorney-General v. Cecil as given in the Law Reports. From that sentence, divorced from the context, they conclude that Martin, B.'s, opinion was that an alienation in a family settlement was not an alienation within the meaning of section 15. With all deference to the Court of Appeal I must say that I can find no foundation for such a singular notion either in the Act itself or in anything that fell from Martin, B.

There was, no doubt, one point which came under discussion in connection with the Succession Duty Act on which Martin, B., did differ from Lord Wensleydale, but that point had no reference to section 15. The point of difference, as explained very fully by Lord Selborne in Charlton v. Attorney-General, 27 W. R. 921, 4 App. Cas. 427, was a point upon the general principles of law applicable to the execution of powers. On that Lord Wensleydale differed not only from Martin, B., but also from Lord Cranworth and the House of Lords.

The report of Attorney-General v. Cecil in the Law Journal (39 L. J. Exch. 201) seems to be more accurate than that in the Law Reports. The expression attributed to Martin, B., in the Law Reports, in which Lord Esher and Rigby, L.J., discover a difference of opinion between that learned judge and Lord Wensleydale, and on which to some extent their judgment is based, is not to be found in the report in the Law Journal. In the corresponding passage in the Law Journal Martin, B., actually expresses his concurrence with Lord Wensleydale, referring obviously to the passage in Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, where the noble and learned lord deals with section 15. That section, he says, was meant to meet the simple case of a person having a right to a succession within the meaning of the Act totally alienating that right to another person before the succession falls into possession or carving out a derivative interest from it, in which case, his lordship observes, "the section provides that the assignees or the person having the derivative title shall stand on the same footing as the assignor; but if there is something different from a mere transfer of the interest or a part of it, if there is a title conferring a new succession on any other person, then the 15th section does not apply."

I think the appeal should be allowed, with costs both here and below.

Billings v. Holloway. (a)

Master and servant—Employment—"Building which exceeds thirty feet in height"—Building being constructed to exceed thirty feet in height—Building at time of accident not exceeding that height—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1; s. 7, sub-section 1.

By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "This Act shall apply only to employment . . . on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished."

Held, that the Act does not apply to employment on a building in course of erection which, at the time of the accident, does not exceed thirty feet in height, but which, when completed, will exceed that height.

Appeal from the judgment of the judge of the Clerkenwell County Court upon a claim by the appellant for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant was a labourer in the employment of the respondent, a builder. In July, 1898, the respondent was erecting, by means of a scaffolding, a building in accordance with certain plans which showed that the building when completed would exceed thirty feet in height. The appellant, who was employed by the respondent on the building, was injured by a brick falling upon his head. At the time of the accident no part of the building exceeded thirty feet in height, the highest point being twenty-six feet above the basement.

The county court judge held that, as at the time of the accident the building did not exceed thirty feet in height, the Act did not apply, and gave judgment for the respondent.

By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "This Act shall apply only to employment . . . on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished. . . ."

Bassett Hopkins, for the appellant.—The test whether the Act applies is, will the building exceed thirty feet in height when completed. The actual height at the time of the accident is not material. Suppose a building exceeding thirty feet in height were being demolished, it is inconceivable that the Act would cease to apply the moment the building ceased to be more than thirty feet in height. The county court judge was therefore wrong.

Ruegy, Q.C., and A. W. Groser, for the respondent, were not called upon.

A. L. Smith, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether a building in course of erection which at the time of the accident does not exceed thirty feet in height, but which when completed will exceed that height, comes within the words of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act. I do not stop to speculate why the limit of height is put at thirty feet. It seems clear, however, that the same words occur in section 23, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. Section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, provides that "if in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman," his employer shall pay compensation. In order to find out what are the employments to which the Act applies, I turn to section 7, sub section 1, which provides that the Act shall apply only to employment (inter alia) "on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished." Can any words be plainer? This was clearly a building which did not exceed thirty feet in height. It is said that we ought to read in the words "or which is intended to exceed thirty feet in height." I cannot do so. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

A workman was employed by shipowners on board a ship to assist in unloading cases of cartridges by means of a crane on to a quay. The crane, which was standing on the quay, was worked by means of a chain, at the end of which was attached a basket. The workman placed the cases in the basket, and the basket and its contents were hoisted on to the quay. When one of the cases was being placed in the basket, it exploded and killed the workman. Upon a claim by his widow for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,

Held, that the workman was killed by an accident arising out of, and in the course of, his employment in or about machinery used in the process of unloading on to a quay within the meaning of the Act; and that, therefore, the Act applied.

him by an arbitrator appointed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellants, the Atlantic Transport Co. (Limited), were the owners of the steamship Manitoba, and the respondent was the widow of William Woodham, and she claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, on behalf of herself and her five children for the death of her husband.

The following facts were admitted: On the 6th of July, 1898, the late William Woodham was employed with other men by the appellants in unloading the steamship Manitoba, and was on that date killed while working on the Manitoba at the Royal Albert Docks, the cause of death being injuries received through an explosion of two cases of primers. The Manitoba was at the time of the accident lying at the quay of the Royal Albert Docks, No. 22 shed, moored thereto. The deceased, together with a number of other men, was sent by the foreman stevedore, Henry Webb (who was in charge on behalf of the appellants of the work of unloading), with instructions to unload and discharge the cases of cartridges that were stowed in the said vessel. The cases of cartridges were unloaded in the following manner: The vessel was lying by the side of the quay. The cases were brought from the hold by means of an hydraulic crane which was standing on the quay. The crane was worked by a chain, on the end of which chain was attached a wicker basket. The basket was at all times attached to the crane. The cases in question were brought out of the baggage-room of The Manitoba. The men, among whom was the deceased William Woodham, placed the cases into this basket, whereupon the crane was set in motion and the basket and its contents were hoisted from the vessel and placed on the quay. The crane was worked by a man named Woods, who was in the employment of the appellants. About seventeen cases were safely landed by the crane, and the crane returned for the last set of cases, and the basket was being loaded by the said William Woodham and another man named William Connor. Four of the remaining five cases had been placed in the basket, and the fifth—the last case of all—being a case of primers, or percussion caps, was put into the basket by the deceased William Woodham, when it immediately exploded, and the deceased William Woodham was struck, with others, by the exploded primers or percussion caps and killed. The Manitoba was unloaded on to the quay. The crane was hired by the appellants from the dock company.

The county court judge held that, as the word "factory" in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, included a "dock," the deceased man, who was employed in a ship in the dock, was employed in a "dock," and therefore the Act applied. He accordingly gave judgment for the respondent for an agreed amount of £270. The Atlantic Transport Co. appealed.

By section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act." By section 7, sub-section 1, "This Act shall apply only to employment . . . on, or in, or about a railway, factory . . ." By sub-section 2, "'Factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and every laundry worked by steam, water, or other mechanical 'power.'" By sub-section 3, "A workman employed in a factory which is a shipbuilding yard shall not be excluded from this Act by reason only that the accident arose outside the yard in the course of his work upon a vessel in any dock, river, or tidal water near the yard." By section 23, sub-section 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, certain provisions of the Factory Acts were to have effect "as if (a) every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process . . . were included in the word 'factory' . . . and as if the person who by himself, his agents, or workmen temporarily uses any such machinery for the before-mentioned purpose were the occupier of the said premises. . . ."

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (B. D. Kilburn with him), for the appellants.—By section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the accident must arise out of and in the course of the employment to which the Act applies. Section 7, sub-section 1, enumerates the employments to which the Act applies, one of them being employment in a "factory." Factory is defined in sub-section 2, and that definition refers back to the Factory and Workshop Act of 1895, which, by section 23, sub-section 1 (a), includes in the word factory "every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto all machinery and plant used in that process." Those sections, when read together, mean that the accident must arise out of and in the course of the workman's employment on or in or about a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, or on or in or about machinery and plant used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse. The deceased man here was killed while employed on a ship in a dock, and the first question is whether he was killed while employed in a "dock." The county court judge held that he was none the less employed in a dock because he was employed on a ship in a dock. This involves that "dock" includes everything in the dock. This is too wide a construction of the Act. "Dock" includes only the land part of the dock. Otherwise every person employed in any capacity within the area of the dock would be included. The deceased man was employed in a ship, not in a dock. Sub-section 3 of section 7 tends to show that a ship in a dock is not part of the dock, otherwise that sub-section would be unnecessary. Further, the inclusion of machinery for loading and unloading, which is commonly on board the ship, would be unnecessary so far as the word "dock" is concerned if a ship in a dock were part of the dock. The county court judge was therefore wrong. Secondly, did the accident arise while the deceased man was employed on or in or about machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading from or to the quay? No doubt the basket was attached to the crane, and so far was part of the crane, and the deceased man was injured while putting a case of cartridges into the basket. But "on or in or about" the crane means in connection with the working of the crane. "About" the crane does not mean physical vicinity. The accident must have some connection with the working of the crane. Here there was no such connection.

G. H. Mallinson, for the respondent, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It seems to me that we can decide this case upon a very clear point. I do not intend to express any opinion upon the first point which the appellants argued, and upon which the county court judge based his judgment. The appellants were using a quay on to which they unloaded their ship, and on the quay they used a crane for the purposes of the unloading. They employed the deceased man in the ship, together with others, to unload by means of the crane certain cases of cartridges. While he was so employed a case of cartridges, which was being put into the basket, exploded and killed him. The question is whether the Act applies. In my opinion it does. We must read section 1, sub-section 1, and section 7, sub-sections 1 and 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, with section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and when that is done the words, so far as material to this case, read as follows: If personal injury is caused to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on or in or about machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading to or from a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, then the injured man is to be entitled to compensation under the Act. It is impossible to say that the deceased man was not employed "in or about" the crane, and he having been killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of that employment, his widow is entitled to compensation. The case therefore came within the Act, and the judgment must be affirmed.

SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER CO. v. WANDSWORTH DISTRICT BOARD OF WORKS. (a.)

Metropolis—Management—Highway—Lowering surface of road—Water company—Water pipes left insufficiently covered—Duty of local authority—Injunction—Damages—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 98.

A local authority which, in exercise of the powers conferred by section 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, lowers the surface of a road so as to leave pipes belonging to a water company insufficiently covered, is not bound to alter the position of the pipes so as to secure to them adequate protection.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

An iron water-main belonging to the plaintiffs ran in the soil under a road in the district of the defendant board. The pipe had been laid under statutory powers thirty years before this action, and was at a depth varying from 1ft. 4in. to 1ft. 10in. The road had been used as a highway for many years, but the footway (under which was the pipe in question) had never been paved, and was simply a gravel path. The defendants had recently levelled the road and the footway, and in so doing had lowered the surface of the footway at several points. The plaintiffs' pipe was, in consequence, at one point only four inches below the surface; a depth which, it was shown, was insufficient to protect the pipe against injury from heavy traffic, frost, and other causes.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, as soon as they understood how injuriously their pipe would be affected, commenced an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from lowering the surface so as to leave the plaintiffs' pipes and mains without a sufficient covering, unless the defendants should first alter the position of the pipes and mains (as section 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, empowered them to do) by placing the same as far below the proposed new surface as they now were below the present surface; and claiming secondly, damages for the wrongful lowering of the surface of the said footway.

On motion by the plaintiffs for an interlocutory injunction, Kekewich, J., made an order restraining the defendants, as asked, until after judgment.

The defendants appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal it was agreed to treat it as an appeal from a final judgment in the action.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Lyttelton Chubb, for the appeal.—Similar cases are Boulton v. Crowther, 2 B. & C. 703, under the General Turnpike Act (3 Geo. 4, c. 126); and Bold v. Williams, 21 J. P. 84, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. Sections 150, 151 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, exclude the operation of the compensation clauses of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845; and the cases show that the plaintiffs can have no remedy other than compensation.

They also referred to sections 98, 110, 111, 112, 113 of the Act of 1855; Reg. v. Vestry of St. Luke's, Chelsea, 19 W. R. 1086, L. R. 6 Q. B. 572 (on appeal, 20 W. R. 209, L. R. 7 Q. D. 441; and the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17), s. 28.

Gore Browne (Warrington, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.—The defendants, if they exercise their statutory power of lowering the road, come under a common law duty not to injure anyone: Geddis v. Proprietors of the Bann Reservoir; Metropolitan Asylums District Managers v. Hill, 29 W. R. 617, 6 App. Cas. 193, at p. 203.

He also referred to sections 30, 31 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847; and Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott, 33 W. R. 892, 15 Q. B. D. 1.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—If this was a dispute between private individuals it would be clear that a landowner who had granted a licence to lay pipes could dig a ditch so as to expose part of them.

He relied upon sections 109, 112 of the Act of 1855. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to Michael and Will on Gas, Water, and Electric Lighting, notes to section 31 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (4th ed., p. 241), and the cases there cited.]

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—LINDLEY, M.R., read a judgment in which, after stating the facts and reading section 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, he proceeded: This section in terms simply confers a power; its language imposes no duty. The words are, "It shall be lawful," &c. These words may, no doubt, under certain circumstances, impose a duty as well as confer a power; but it is for those who contend that they do both, to make good their contention. Nothing can be clearer on this point than the judgment of Lord Cairns in Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214, at pp. 223-4. The defendants have not touched or disturbed the plaintiffs' pipes. They have in no way injured them, and this circumstance distinguishes the case from Gas, Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbott's Vestry, in which the steam-roller used by the defendants broke the plaintiffs' gaspipes. The same circumstance—namely, the non-interference with the plaintiff's property—distinguishes this case from Geddis v. Proprietors of the Baun Reservoir, where the defendants flooded the plaintiff's land, and said, in effect, that they could not help it. The answer was that they could help it if they kept a stream into which they poured water free from obstruction by mud, which they could do if they chose. Lord Blackburn's remarks, on which the plaintiffs mainly relied, had reference to that state of things, and do not show what the plaintiffs must show—namely, that section 98 imposes a duty on the defendants to lower the plaintiffs' pipes, although the defendants do not want to do so for their own purposes.

Underlying the plaintiffs' contention is the assumption that they are entitled to have a certain amount of soil over their pipes. I can find no warrant for this assumption; and as the defendants are clearly empowered by section 98 to remove the soil above the pipes, I see no ground for saying that the additional power conferred upon them of lowering the plaintiffs' pipes imposes the duty of lowering them in order to protect them from injury. The plaintiffs pay nothing for the privilege of laying their pipes down in a public path or road, and they run the risk of having it made higher or lower by the road authorities under their statutory powers.

This conclusion is strengthened by section 61 of the Towns Improvements Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), which is in pari materiâ, and which empowers the improvement commissioners to raise or lower pipes "if they deem it necessary" so to do. No duty to do so is cast upon them. Section 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, although not quite so clearly worded, has, in my opinion, the same meaning.

The appeal motion having by consent been treated as an appeal from a final judgment in the action, the order appealed from must be discharged and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs here and below, and the costs below must be taxed as between solicitor and client pursuant to the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1: see Fielden v. Morley Corporation, 67 L. J. Ch. 611.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is of importance, for the decision will affect not only water companies, but gas and other like companies, who have the like statutory privilege of laying pipes under the public streets in the metropolis. For these privileges they make no payment. The case turns on the 98th section of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. [His lordship read the section, and proceeded:] In this case the road authority has not altered the position of the pipes, nor have they in any way disturbed or interfered with them. The effect of their works, which have been lawfully executed under their principal power, is to bring the surface of the street nearer to the pipes, which remain in situ. The consequence is that the water in the pipes, being but a few inches from the surface, is more exposed to frost. In exercising the power the road authority have not been guilty of any negligence. I am unable to find in the section any express or implied duty cast upon the road authority, when they exercise their power of altering the level of the road, whether by raising or lowering it, to exercise at their own expense their power of altering the position of the pipes for the benefit of the company owning the pipes, much less any duty to place the pipes at a depth below the new surface corresponding with the depth at which they stood below the old surface. I think that no duty is imposed upon the appellants. The real question is on whom the expense of altering the position of the pipes is to fall. It appears to me that it falls on the company. They are under no statutory obligation as to the particular depth at which their pipes are to be placed from the surface of the road; it is for them to place them at such a depth as will protect the water from freezing. As between the road authority and the company, I think that the road authority is paramount. They are entrusted with the powers over the street, not for their own profit as a statutory body, but for the benefit of the public using the street as a highway. The statutory undertaking of the water company is vested in them with a view to their own profit as a company, and for the purpose of affording a supply of water to the consumers of water within their district. Where the road authority alters the level of the street, the 98th section does not afford any means of ascertaining the point at which the supposed duty of the road authority begins in reference to the distance from the surface at which the pipes are to be left, subject only to this qualification—that where the position of the pipes themselves is altered the approval of the company's engineer is required in relation to the position where the pipes are to be relaid. In regard to the authorities cited, I think they are distinguishable, as stated by the Master of the Rolls. I agree with Collins, L.J. (whose judgment I have had an opportunity of reading), in his statement of the general principles of law derived from the authorities in reference to the exercise of statutory powers.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I will add a few words on the point based on the dictum of Lord Blackburn in Geddis v. Proprietors of the Baun Reservoir. The point urged is that the plaintiffs have suffered damage by the exercise by the defendants of their statutory powers, that the defendants were armed by the same statute with other powers, which, if used, would have mitigated the damage, and that, therefore, they were bound to use them. I think it is quite clear, as pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, that the power to move the pipes is quite ancillary to the powers of levelling the highway, and that there is no statutory duty on the defendants to exercise it, unless they require it for the performance of their primary obligation. But it is not on the assertion of such a statutory duty that the argument for the defendant's liability is or must be based, but on the broader proposition that, being possessed of a power of mitigating damage arising from their proceedings under the statute they are bound to exercise it. So stated it is merely an assertion of the proposition, so frequently affirmed, that where statutory rights infringe upon what, but for the statute, would be the rights of other persons, they must be exercised reasonably, so as to do as little mischief as possible. The public are not compelled to suffer inconvenience which is not reasonably incident to the exercise of statutory powers. The railway spark cases are instances of this principle: Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Co., 8 W. R. 549, 5 H. & N. 679; Directors of the Hammersmith and City Railway Co. v. Brand, 18 W. R. 12, L. R. 4 H. L. 171; and Coats v. Clarence Railway Co., 1 Russ. & M. 181. Lord Blackburn was dealing with a case in which the rights of adjoining owners had been in fact invaded, the statute under which the defendants acted not enabling them to flood the plaintiff's lands when such flooding might have been avoided by dredging, as the defendants had power to do, the channel by which they sought to pass their compensation water back to the river. They were under a duty to pass the water down to the river, and they were given powers to make and maintain channels for this purpose, and where they had not exercised these powers they could not say that that damage to the adjoining proprietors was a necessary incident of the exercise of this statutory right. The statutory power which Lord Blackburn thought them bound to exercise was one without which this duty of passing the water on could not be properly carried out. Here the levelling of the road could be, and was, effectively carried out without in any way disturbing the plaintiff's pipes, or infringing any of their rights. I think the dictum of Lord Blackburn must be read with reference to the case he was dealing with, and cannot be pressed to cover this one. But it must be admitted that the defendants are bound to exercise their statutory powers with reasonable regard for the rights of other persons. I think when it is once clear that the main purpose of the defendants could be completely carried out without recourse to the power of removing the pipes, the obligation of the statutory body must be tried by the same standard of duty as is applicable to private persons. Of course, being merely a creature of statute, they cannot exercise powers if the statute has not conferred them; but it does not follow that they are bound to use them because they possess them, any more than a private person would be. They merely fall under the general principle, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. Here the plaintiffs have no right to any particular thickness of soil above their pipes. They are subordinate in this respect to the duties of the road authority: see Gas Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry. But they are not trespassers. Their pipes are lawfully in the road, and the defendants' acts have undoubtedly damaged if they have not injured them. I think they can have no higher claim to consideration at the hands of the defendants than the owner of a house for which no right of support from the adjoining house had been acquired, would be entitled to claim against the adjoining owner who, in pulling his own house down, withdraws support to which his neighbour is not entitled. I think it is clear in such a case that, though the pulling-down owner must be careful to interfere as little as possible with the adjoining house, he is certainly not called upon to take active steps for its protection, as, for instance, by shoring it up. There is a broad distinction between exercising a right with reasonable care so as not to do avoidable damage, and taking active measures to insure the continuance of something that is not a right in the adjoining owner. Chadwick v. Trower, 3 Bing. N. C. 334, 6 ibid. 1, which goes, perhaps, further than any other case in the plaintiffs' favour, merely decides that, supposing there is a duty upon a person pulling down his own house to take care not to injure his neighbour's vault in so doing, where he knows of its existence, though it has acquired no right to support, there can be no such duty where he does not know of it. And it cannot be the law that the pulling-down owner is bound to find a substitute or equivalent for the support which he has a right to remove. That he has such a right is clear: see Dalton v. Angus, 30 W. R. 191, 6 App. Cas. 740.

I think the result is that, though the person pulling down is bound to do no unnecessary damage, he is not fixed with any obligation to take active steps to mitigate a mischief which follows inevitably upon the reasonable exercise of his own rights. I think, therefore, the only obligation on the defendants was to use reasonable care to do no unnecessary damage to the plaintiffs, and I think the existence of the power to move the pipes, and the fact that it was unused, would afford no evidence of want of such reasonable care, and that therefore the judgment ought to be for the defendants.

Appeal allowed.

Section 28, sub-section 14, of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, enacts that, "Where the name of any person appears to be entered more than once as a parliamentary voter on the lists of voters . . . any such person may, by notice in writing delivered to the revising barrister at the opening of his first revision court, select the entry to be retained for voting. . . ."

Held, that this power of selection did not exist where one of two entries was an entry appearing in the overseers' list of voters, and the other was only an entry appearing in the list of claims—even although the claim was, in the course of revision, allowed—because the duplicate entries must exist in the list of voters at the time when the notice of selection is required to be given—viz., at the opening of the first revision court.

Held, also, that no appeal lies from a decision of a revising barrister as to the validity or invalidity of a notice of selection of entry given by a voter.

Reg. v. The Revising Barrister of Liverpool, 43 W. R. 220, [1895] 1 Q. B. 155, followed.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the city and county of Exeter.

The appellant's name duly appeared as a voter in the occupation list of the parish of St. Sidwell in St. David's Ward in the city of Exeter in respect of No. 5, Clifton-hill, which was his place of abode.

He made a claim to the overseers of the parish of St. Martin in St. Petrock's Ward to have his name inserted in the lists for that parish as a parliamentary elector and burgess in respect of a warehouse in High-street, in the same parliamentary borough.

On the 16th of September he delivered to the revising barrister at the opening of the first revision court, a notice in writing that he selected the entry in the claim as the entry to be retained for voting.

The appellant's claim to be on the lists of the parish of St. Martin was, in the course of the revision, allowed. He then applied to have the entry in respect of his place of abode in the parish of St. Sidwell marked under section 28 subsection (14) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), with a note to the effect that he was not entitled to vote in respect of that qualification, he being then on the list of voters in respect of another qualification, i.e., the warehouse in High-street in the parish of St. Martin.

The revising barrister held that he had no power to mark the entry in respect of the appellant's place of abode, on the ground that at the time of the opening of his first registration court there was no duplicate entry in the list of electors to which Form P of the Registration Order, 1895, Schedule 3, could apply, and that the appellant's notice of selection was accordingly bad. The revising barrister accordingly retained for voting the entry in respect of the appellant's place of abode, and placed against the appellant's name in the list of claims in the parish of St. Martin, which he then allowed, a note to the effect that the appellant was not entitled to vote in respect of the qualification therein contained.

The appellant gave notice that he desired to appeal, but the revising barrister, relying on the cases of Arnold v. Sharp, Fox & Sm. Req. Cas. 252, and Reg. v. Revising Barrister of the Borough of Liverpool, 43 W. R. 220, [1895] 1 Q. B. 155, refused to state a case.

Subsequently, an order having been made by Channell, J., in chambers, a case was stated for the opinion of the court.

Section 28 subsection (14) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), provides as follows: "Where the name of any person appears to be entered more than once as a parliamentary voter on the list of voters for the same parliamentary borough, or more than once as a burgess on the burgess lists for the same borough, the revising barrister shall inquire whether such entries relate to the same person, and, on proof being made to him that such entries relate to the same person, shall retain one of the entries for voting, and place against the other or others a note to the effect that the person is not entitled to vote in respect of the qualification therein contained for the parliamentary borough or for the municipal borough, as the case may be, he being on the list for voting in respect of another qualification. Any person may, by notice in writing delivered to the revising barrister at the opening of the first court, select the entry to be retained for voting . . . but if he does not make any selection the entry to be so retained shall be selected by the revising barrister. . . ." Section 5 of the Registration Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 15), regulates the manner in which the revising barrister's selection is to be made.

Section 42 of the Registration Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18), provides as follows: "It shall be lawful for any person who, under the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall have made any claim to have his name inserted in any list, or made any objection to any other person as not entitled to have his name inserted in any list, or whose name shall have been expunged from any list, and who in any such case shall be aggrieved by or dissatisfied with any decision of any revising barrister on any point of law material to the result of such case, either himself or by some person on his behalf, to give to the revising barrister . . . a notice in writing that he is desirous to appeal. . . ."

Ward Coldridge, for the appellant.—The right to appeal arises under section 42 of the Registration Act, 1843. Reg. v. Revising Barrister of the Borough of Liverpool is not in point. The appellant is a person to whose claim effect has not been given, and he therefore has a right to appeal. There was a duplicate entry when the question of selection arose sufficient to bring into operation section 28 subsection (14) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878. The fact that one of the entries was only on the list of claimants does not affect the question.

Foote, Q.C., and Ralegh B. Phillpotts, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The appeal fails on two grounds. The appellant was not in the circumstances of the case in a position to give effective notice of selection. His name did not "appear to be entered more than once as a parliamentary voter on the lists of voters" within the meaning of section 28 (14) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878. This is a fatal objection. Further, there was no right to appeal at all. It is clear that under the sub-section referred to there must be, at the date of the notice of desire to select, two entries of the name as a parliamentary voter on the lists of voters. The question whether this is an appealable matter depends on section 42 of the Registration Act, 1843. Counsel for the appellant claims that the appellant's name has not been inserted on the list in an effectual manner; that he is aggrieved by the decision; and that he, therefore, has a right to appeal. But what does this complaint really amount to? Merely this, that the appellant for this year, at least, must select to exercise his residence qualification. If the appellant gives notice of selection before the next revision he will obtain all he requires, because his claim for his business qualification has already been allowed, and he will then appear on the list with a double qualification. I agree that the circumstances in Reg. v. Revising Barrister of the Borough of Liverpool differed from those in the present case; but it is nevertheless a strong authority that we are not to give a wide and unrestricted meaning to section 42 of the Registration Act, 1843.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 28, sub-section 14, of the Act of 1878 clearly contemplates the existence of a double qualification at the date of the notice of selection; but here there was no double qualification, for the appellant's claim in respect of his business premises had not then been adjudicated upon. When the claim came before the revising barrister he allowed it, and noted it to the effect that the appellant could not vote in respect of it because he was already on the list for his residential qualification. At the next revision there will be a double qualification with regard to which the appellant will be entitled to exercise his right of selection.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

KITCHEN v. JOHNSON. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliament—Borough vote—Claim—Misdescription of qualifying property—Mistake—Amendment—Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, sub-sections 2, 13.

Sub-section 13 of section 28 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878, applies only to the description of the legal character or nature of the qualification (i.e., the third column of the entry in a list or claim)—not to the description of the qualifying property (i.e., the fourth column).

In a claim, the third column (nature of the qualification) was "houses in succession," and the fourth column

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(description of the qualifying property) was "202, Gordon-road and 31, Monk-street." The claim having been objected to, it was proved that the claimant had in fact occupied in immediate succession during the qualifying period, 202 Gordon-road and 33 (not 31), Monk-street; and that 31, Monk-street (which was in fact occupied by another person) had been inserted in the claim by mistake instead of No. 33. The revising barrister amended the claim by altering "31," Monk-street to "33," Monk-street in the fourth column.

Held, that the revising barrister had power to make the amendment, as he did not thereby "change the description of the qualification" within the meaning of those words in sub-section 13 of section 28.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Nottingham.

A claim on behalf of one Ernest Dann to have his name inserted in Division I. of the occupiers' list of electors for the borough of Nottingham had been sent to, and published by, the overseers. The claim was as follows:

Name.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Description of qualifying property.
Dann, Ernest	31, Monk-street	Houses in succession	202, Gordon-road, and 31, Monk-street.

The claim having been opposed, it appeared at the hearing of the objection that the claimant had occupied in immediate succession during the qualifying period two houses—viz., 202, Gordon-road and 33, Monk-street (not 31, Monk-street). The claimant had authorized a political agent to send in the claim, and had given the agent the particulars of the qualifying property correctly; but a clerk of the agent in filling in the form of claim, by mistake inserted 31, Monk-street instead of 33, Monk-street, in the second and fourth columns of the claim; and the claimant had subsequently signed the claim without observing the mistake. 31, Monk-street was, in fact, a house occupied by another person, and it adjoined 33, Monk-street, but any communications or inquiries for Ernest Dann sent to or made at 31, Monk-street would have reached him at 33, Monk-street.

The revising barrister amended the second and fourth columns of the claim by substituting therein 33, Monk-street instead of 31, Monk-street, and disallowed the objection to the claim; but at the request of the objector the barrister stated the present case, in which the above-mentioned details were stated as his findings of fact.

The Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, enacts as follows: "A revising barrister shall, with respect to the lists of voters . . . which he is appointed to revise, perform the duties and have the powers following: (1) He shall correct any mistake which is proved to him to have been made in any list. (2) He may correct any mistake which is proved to have been made in any claim or notice of objection. (6) The revising barrister shall expunge the name of every person, whether objected to or not, whose name or place of abode, or the nature of whose qualification, or the name or situation of whose qualifying property, if the qualification is in respect of property, or any other particulars respecting whom, by law required to be stated in the list, is or are either wholly omitted or, in the judgment of the revising barrister, insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, unless matter or matters so omitted or insufficiently described be supplied to the satisfaction of the revising barrister . . . and in case such matter or matters shall be so supplied he shall then and there insert the same in such list; (13) except as herein provided, and whether any person is objected to or not, no evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that which is described in the list or claim as the case may be, nor shall the revising barrister be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same."

Section 24 of the same Act (Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878) enacts that "Any person who is entered on any list of voters . . . and whose name or place of abode, or the nature of whose qualification, or the name or situation of whose qualifying property is not correctly stated in such list . . . may . . . if he thinks fit, make and subscribe a declaration . . . before any justice of the peace or commissioner." The form for such declaration as to misdescription is now Form M, Schedule 3, of the Registration Order, 1895.

W. Graham, for the appellant.—The description of the qualifying property in the claim is inapplicable to the house in fact occupied by Ernest Dann, and the revising barrister had no power to amend it, as by so doing he was changing the description of the qualification contrary to section 28, sub-section 13, of the Act of 1878: Foskett v. Kaufman, 34 W. R. 90, 16 Q. B. D. 279; Bendle v. Watson, 20 W. R. 145, L. R. 7 C. P. 163; Hurcum v. Hilleary, 42 W. R. 321, [1894] 1 Q. B. 579; and Soutter v. Roderick, Le Blondes Case, 44 W. R. 205, [1896] 1 Q. B. 91.

Appleton, for the respondent.—Section 28, sub-section 13, does not apply. It deals only with the "qualification," that is to say, the matter which appears in the third column under "Nature of qualification," and it does not apply to that which appears in the fourth column—the description of the qualifying property. The enactment applies to the legal qualification, as, for instance, "dwelling-house," "houses in succession"; it does not apply to the description of the property which gives the legal qualification. Foskett v. Kaufman and Hurcum v. Hilleary do not apply, as the alteration made by the revising barrister in each of those cases was from one legal qualification to another. Bendle v. Watson (1872) is really a case in favour of my argument, as there the alteration made by the barrister related to the description of the qualifying property, and it was held that he had power to make it. The Court of Appeal in Ireland have, in three cases, held that the barrister had power to amend the fourth column—the description of the qualifying property: Short v. Daly (1891), Lawson's Registration Cases (Ireland), 1885-93, at pp. 310-12; Hanbridge v. Beveridge, Donnelly's case, Ibid., at pp. 303-4; McClafferty's case, Ibid., 1894-7, at p. 40. Even if sub-section 13 does apply to the fourth column, the alteration made in the present case was for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the qualification, and therefore comes within the exception at the end of sub-section 13. The revising barrister was justified in making the alteration under sub-sections 2 and 6 of section 28.

Graham, in reply.—The Irish cases cannot be relied on as authorities on the revising barrister's power to amend the description of the qualification, owing to the difference in language between section 28 of the English Registration Act, 1878, and sections 4 and 27 of the Irish Registration Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 17):

see Rogers on Registration, 16th ed.. p. 306, note (h).*

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—Not without doubt I have come to the conclusion that the revising barrister acted within his powers. [After stating the facts and reading section 28 (1) (2) and (13) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, his lordship proceeded:] The Court of Appeal in Foskett v. Kaufman have decided that the introductory words in sub-section 13 have reference to the provisions of section 24. In that section a clear distinction is drawn between "nature of the qualification" and "name or description of qualifying property." In sub-section 13 I think that "the qualification" means the legal nature and character of the qualification and not the identification or description of the property in respect of which the qualification arises. For example, where a claim is for occupation of a single house a change could not be made so as to make it a claim for successive occupation. Nor could a change be made from a dwelling-house qualification to a qualification in respect of a place of business; nor from an ownership qualification to an occupation one. It is to the third column only, therefore, that sub-section 13 applies, and while there is no power to alter the entry in the third column, there is ample power to alter that in the fourth column. Foskett v. Kaufman affords an apt illustration of a change in the nature of the qualification. The change in that case which was sought to be made, but was disallowed, was a change from single occupation to successive occupation. Bendle v. Watson is an authority in point, and does not differ in principle from the present case. The Irish cases, which were decided upon the provisions of an Irish Act not differing materially from the Act under consideration, are also in point. Having decided that sub-section 13 does not apply, it is unnecessary to consider the further point whether the alteration was for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the qualification.

THE QUEEN v. BIRD. (a.)

Criminal law — Evidence — Admissibility — Prisoner's statement before the magistrate reaffirming evidence given by him on oath.

A prisoner charged with an offence under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, gave evidence on oath at the hearing before the magistrate, and afterwards, in response to the usual inquiry whether he wished to make any statement, said, "What I have already said is true." He was committed for trial.

Held, that his evidence given on oath before the magistrate was admissible as evidence against him on his trial.

Case stated by the recorder of the borough of Cambridge.

Fred Bird was tried at the midsummer quarter sessions for the borough of Cambridge for an indecent assault upon a girl under ten years of age.

At the hearing before the magistrate, after the depositions of the witnesses for the prosecution had been taken, the prisoner was asked whether he desired to call any witness. He replied that he had no witnesses to call, but desired to give evidence himself. Thereupon, no previous caution having been given to him, he was sworn and gave evidence, which was taken down in writing, read over to and signed by him and by the magistrate. Then after the usual caution he was further asked, "Having heard the evidence, do you wish to say anything in answer to the charge," whereupon he made this statement, "What I have already said is true. I have no witnesses to call." This statement was in due course returned with the depositions to the court, and was put in evidence for the prosecution.

The counsel for the prisoner having stated that he should not call the prisoner as a witness, and the prisoner also having declined to give evidence, counsel for the prosecution proposed to put in evidence the prisoner's deposition before the magistrate.

To this the prisoner's counsel objected, on the ground that the prisoner was present in court, and was a competent, though not a compellable, witness; and, further, that what he had said before the magistrate, being upon oath, was not admissible.

The recorder was of opinion, and so directed the jury, that when the prisoner stated in answer to the charge, "What I have already said is true," he meant that the evidence which he had already given before the magistrate was true; and that it was, in fact, a re-statement by him, not on oath, of what he had already stated on oath, and he allowed the deposition to be read.

The jury convicted the prisoner, and in answer to a question put by the recorder, said that the prisoner meant by "What I have already said is true" that the evidence which he had already given before the magistrate was true.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the prisoner's deposition was rightly admitted.

H. S. O. Ellis, for the prisoner.—The prisoner was under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, a competent but not a compellable witness. Reading his deposition made him in effect a witness upon compulsion. His evidence before the magistrate was a statement made by him before he had been cautioned under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 18, and was therefore inadmissible at the trial.

Henry Sutton, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I think it is as clear as possible that there was nothing irregular in what was done here. This evidence was admissible upon either of two grounds: First of all this was a statement made by the prisoner, he had given evidence upon oath and he was then asked after the usual caution if he wished to make a statement and he did so by saying "what I have already said is true"; what he had said upon oath was therefore admissible as a statement made by him after he had been duly cautioned. Secondly, even if he had not said that, the evidence which he gave before the magistrate was a statement made by him on oath properly administered and is within the decision in Reg. v. Erdheim, 44 W. R. 607, [1896] 2 Q. B. 260. In that case I said "I take the general rule to be (apart from any express statutory exceptions) that any statement made by a party relevant to the matter in hand may be given in evidence against him in any civil case and also in any criminal case except where such statement is made upon oath improperly administered or where such statement is not voluntary within the principle to which I have already referred." On these grounds I think the conviction must be affirmed.

* Section 4 of the Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 17), enacts (inter alia): "No evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that which is described in the list or claim as the case may be, nor shall the revising barrister be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list, except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same."

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the prisoner had made the statement voluntarily, but not upon oath, no one could doubt its admissibility. How can the fact of its being on oath make it inadmissible? The oath merely emphasises the statement. Then when he was asked if he wished to make a statement and in reply said "What I have already said is true" he in effect restated the evidence which he had already given.

Appeal from the judgment of Hawkins, J., at the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiff was in the employment of a ballast contractor who had contracted with the defendants, shipowners, to ballast their ship. The work was to be done by means of winches worked by hand. The plaintiff and the other workmen who were employed by the contractor on the work asked the captain of the ship for the loan of a donkey-engine, which was on the ship, in order to expedite the work, and the captain agreed to do so upon condition that the men employed and paid a skilful person to work the engine. This was agreed to, and the donkey-engine was lent to them. While the engine was being worked, the boiler, in consequence of a defect in it, exploded, and injured the plaintiff. There was no evidence that the defendants knew of the defect, and there was evidence that they had used the engine the day before it was lent to the men.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries, Hawkins, J., directed judgment for the defendants.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and Minton-Senhouse, for the plaintiff.—This is not a case of gratuitous bailment. The plaintiff was engaged on business in which both he and the defendants were interested, and he was there by the invitation of the defendants. The defendants were interested in getting the ship unloaded quickly, and therefore they supplied the donkey-engine. There was, therefore, evidence to go to the jury. [They referred, upon this point, to White v. France, 25 W. R. 878, 2 C. P. D. 308.] Secondly, assuming that this was a gratuitous bailment, where one person supplies a chattel for another person to use, and the latter is injured by a defect in the chattel, the former is liable if through gross negligence he did not discover the defect and tell the former of it when he supplied the chattel to him: Moffatt v. Bateman, L. R. 3 P. C. 114, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 11; and Pothier, in his Traité du Prêt à Usage, (ed. Dupin 1835) vol. 4, ch. 3, par. 84, says that if the lender, "par dol ou par une faute lourde," fails to inform the borrower, he is liable to an action. The decisions in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co., 6 W. R. 336, 8 E. & B. 1035, and MacCarthy v. Young, 9 W. R. 439, 6 H. & N. 329, are not consistent with the subsequent decision in Moffatt v. Bateman. There was evidence here of gross negligence, and the case ought to have been left to the jury.

Pickford, Q.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants, were not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J. — This is an action by the plaintiff who was injured by the explosion of the boiler of a donkey-engine on board a ship of which the defendants were the owners. Certain workmen, of whom the plaintiff was one, were employed by a ballast contractor to ballast the ship with winches worked by hand. The men, being desirous of getting the work done more quickly, asked the captain of the ship for the loan of the donkey-engine. The captain agreed to lend them the engine upon condition that they employed and paid a skilful man to work it. The men agreed to that, and the engine was handed over to them. While the engine was being worked the boiler exploded, and injured the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought this action against the owners of the ship. In the first place, it is said that this was not a gratuitous bailment of the donkey-engine by the captain of the ship to the plaintiff and the other men. To my mind it clearly was a gratuitous bailment. It was a mere loan of the donkey-engine. The evidence as to that is all one way, and therefore there was no question upon that point to leave to the jury. The next question is, What is the law applicable to such a case with regard to the obligations of the lender towards the borrower? The law was laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co. that in the case of a gratuitous loan, as the lender lends for beneficial use, he must be responsible for defects in the chattel with reference to the use for which he knows that the loan is accepted, of which he is aware, and owing to which directly the borrower is injured. It is said that that is not a correct statement of the law, and that the borrower can maintain an action if he can show that there has been gross negligence in the lender in not finding out the defect in the chattel. The law goes this far, that if there is gross negligence on the part of the lender in not communicating to the borrower his knowledge of the defect in the chattel, and injury ensues therefrom to the borrower, that is on the same footing as a concealment of the defect, and the borrower can maintain an action against the lender. The decision in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co. was approved and followed by the Court of Exchequer in MacCarthy v. Young. I do not think that the case of Moffatt v. Bateman in the Privy Council is in point. It was not a case of a bailment of a chattel, but a case of an undertaking by one man to drive another in his carriage, and it was held that the first could only be liable for injury if caused by his gross negligence. But where is there any evidence here of gross negligence, or, indeed, of any negligence at all? It lay upon the plaintiff to show that the bailor knew of the defect in the engine. There is no evidence of that. The evidence showed that the engine had been used in the ship the day before it was lent to the plaintiff and the other men. There is not a particle of evidence of knowledge on the part of the defendants of any defect in the engine. The judgment of the learned judge was therefore right.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question seems to me to be a clear one. In the case of a gratuitous loan of a chattel, in order to give a cause of action to the borrower there must be concealment by the lender of a defect known to him in the chattel, or gross negligence in not disclosing the defect known to him, which amounts to the same thing, and injury to the borrower arising therefrom. Here there was no evidence of any such thing. The engine had been in use the day before it was lent to the plaintiff and the other men, and there was no evidence to show that the defendant or his servants knew of any defect in it.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The present case is one of lender and borrower, and I desire to limit my observations to that class of bailment. Usually when dealing with the case of a gratuitous bailment the question arises as to the standard of duty on the part of the bailee. Where, however, a gratuitous bailment is for the benefit of the bailor, then the standard of duty on the part of the bailor is higher than if the bailment were for the bailee's benefit only. The loan here was for the benefit of the borrower only. There is no suggestion that the loan was in anyway for the benefit of the lender or that the engine was used on his invitation. What in such a case is the duty of the lender? The duty of the lender of a chattel towards the borrower is laid down in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co. He is bound to communicate to the borrower what he knows as to any defect in the chattel lent. The lender is liable for any injury to the borrower occasioned by the defect, if he either deliberately keeps back the knowledge or by gross negligence fails to communicate it. A passage from Pothier in his Traité du Prêt a Usage (ed. Dupin, 1835), vol. 4, ch. 3, par. 84, has been relied on to show that a liability will exist if the lender is guilty of gross negligence in not finding out a defect which he ought to have found out. In my view, Pothier in the passage relied upon was dealing with the case of a lender knowing of the defect and not communicating it; and this view is borne out by looking at the passage in Pothier which immediately precedes it. Therefore there must be either a deliberate keeping back of something which the lender knows, or gross negligence in failing to tell the borrower what he knows. The law of England has not been carried beyond what is laid down in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co. and MacCarthy v. Young. The case of Moffatt v. Bateman has no application to the present case. That case belonged to that class of bailments of which the case of a carrier is an example. The plaintiff had entrusted himself without reward to the bailee to be carried. There was a clear duty on the part of the bailee in that case towards the bailor not to be guilty of gross negligence causing injury to the bailor. That case has no application to the case before us, where the defendants are not bailees, but mere lenders.

In re HOCKING.
MICHELL v. LOE. (a.)

Will—Advancement—Power of—Expectant or presumptive interests — Possibility of issue — Woman past usual age of child-bearing.

When property stands limited to A. if (and only if) B should have a child, and B. is a childless woman above the usual age of child-bearing, the court will not treat A. as having no interest in the property.

Therefore, where property was given by will to certain persons if a childless woman of fifty-four should have children, a power of advancement to those persons in respect of their "expectant or presumptive shares" was exercisable by the trustees.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

James Hocking, by his will dated the 2nd of March, 1891, gave all his residuary real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever to trustees upon trust to call in and convert into money and (after payment of debts, &c.) to invest the same, and out of the income to pay annuities to his sisters, Amelia Ann Hocking and Emma Loe, and to other persons. The will further provided as follows: "Should my sister, Amelia Ann Hocking, marry and have children, then when the youngest child of Amelia Ann Hocking or Emma Loe, whichever shall be the youngest, shall reach the full age of twenty-one years, then the whole of my estate shall be divided equally between all the children of Amelia Ann Hocking and Emma Loe in equal shares, share and share alike" (clause 11). "Should Amelia Ann Hocking die without being married, then, when the youngest child of Emma Loe has reached the full age of twenty-one years, my whole estate shall be divided equally between her children, share and share alike" (clause 12). "My said trustees or trustee may, subject to the payment of the annuities hereinbefore provided for, at his or their discretion, raise any part or parts of the then expectant presumptive or then vested share or fortune of any child of the said Emma Loe under the trusts herein contained, not exceeding in the whole for any such child one-third part of his or her then expectant presumptive or vested share or fortune, and apply the same for his or her support, education, advancement, or benefit" (clause 13).

The testator died on the 1st of April, 1892. In February, 1896, A. A. Hocking married George Benmore, who died in 1897. She was now fifty-four years of age, and had never had any children. There was no direct evidence that she was past child-bearing.

Emma Loe had four children, all of whom were still infants.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator's heir-at-law and sole next-of-kin was his father, William Hocking, who died intestate in 1893. The defendant Grace Hocking, who was William Hocking's second wife, was his administratrix. The trustees of the will took out an originating summons to have it determined, first, whether the power of advancement above set out was now exercisable; and, secondly, whether on the true construction of the will, and in the events which had happened, the residuary estate of the testator ought, when the youngest child of Emma Loe attained twenty-one, to be divided among the children of Emma Loe and their issue in accordance with the directions above set out, or who was now entitled to the capital and income of the testator's residuary estate, and in what shares.

Kekewich, J., held that the event of Mrs. Benmore marrying and having no children was not provided for by the will, and that if she died without having had a child the estate would pass, as undisposed of, to the testator's next-of-kin. On this question (as to which the case requires no report) the Court of Appeal affirmed the learned judge's decision. Kekewich, J., further held that the clause conferring the power of advancement ceased to be operative if it should be proved that Mrs. Benmore was past child-bearing.

Mrs. Loe's children appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—LINDLEY, M. R., after stating the nature of the order made by Kekewich, J., proceeded: The question is whether that declaration is right. It is a somewhat novel point, and we took time to consider it. We have come to the conclusion that the declaration must be struck out.

In In re Lowman, Devenish v. Pester, a fund was limited, in the events which happened, to the first and other sons of the testator's niece Ellen, with remainder to the first and other sons of his niece Flora. Ellen was seventy, and a spinster. Her possible son was the only person who stood in the way of Flora's son. The court ordered the fund to be paid to Flora's second son, the eldest having died before he attained a vested interest. The court deprived no living person of a possible interest, nor has it ever done so that I know of.

If property is given to A. in the event of B. having no children, can A. claim that property before the death of B.? My answer is: No, neither at law nor in equity, unless B.'s possible child is the only person who can deprive A. of the property. When that is the case the Court of Chancery has ordered funds under its control to be paid to A. when satisfied that B., owing to her age, can have no child.

Again, if property is given to A. in the event of B. having a child, the court has never gone the length of saying that A. can be treated in B.'s life-time as having no interest in the property. The old law as to the dower is opposed to any such view. If a woman, however old, marries a tenant in fee or fee tail, to which her issue, if any, can succeed, she is entitled to dower, although a woman whose issue cannot succeed to the property is entitled to none; see Co. Lit. 30B and 40A and 40B, and In re Dawson, Johnston v. Hill. The woman, however, must be nine years old at the death of her husband, which is curious: Co. Lit. 33A. I have looked in vain for any case in which the court has deprived one person of the chance of becoming entitled to the property if another should die childless or have a child. Nor ought the court so to do.

The declaration should therefore be varied, and instead thereof it should be declared that the discretion of the trustees under clause 13 of the will can be exercised during the life of Mrs. Benmore.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have construed this will by the light of clause 11, which was the only one material to the point upon which we are now giving judgment. The children of Mrs. Loe were given an interest in the whole of the testator's estate in the event of the testator's sister Amelia, who is now living and is a widow, but has no child, having children.

I agree with the law as stated by the Master of the Rolls, and I think that Jee v. Audley, 1 Cox Ch. Cas. 324, when considered, is an authority for the propositions which he has laid down. It is quite true that Jee v. Audley was a case in which the doctrine of perpetuity came into question, but it appears to me to apply to a limitation such as we have now under consideration. As is well known, the court first construes the will, and finds out from the language of the testator what is the true effect of its limitations. In Jee v. Audley there was a gift on an indefinite failure of the issue of the testator's kinsman John and John's wife Elizabeth. John and his wife Elizabeth were both seventy years of age; but Lord Kenyon declined to consider that it was impossible that those two old people could have a child, and said that consequently, that being his construction of the will, he should apply the measure of the rule against perpetuities. He also said—and I think that this was good sense—that it would be a very dangerous experiment, and likely to introduce the greatest inconvenience, to give latitude to what he called "such sort of conjecture." It is, perhaps, more than a sort of conjecture; but that is the expression that he used, because if the law had been otherwise than as he stated, then, according to the declaration that has been made in the judgment under appeal, there would be the right of a person claiming, as the next-of-kin of the testator do here, to say of any married woman, however young she was, that on medical testimony it was impossible that she could have a child. That sort of thing, of course, has never been allowed—that is to say, the natural law is not taken into consideration as against the form of the limitation itself. The case would apply also, if this contention were to succeed, to the case of a man who, by medical evidence, might be shown to be incapable of being the father of a child. Therefore it is that I think that Jee v. Audley has a bearing, and a very close one, upon the present case. I mentioned in my judgment in In re Dawson, Johnston v. Hill, the case of dower from Coke. I shall not repeat what I then said. Lord Coke puts it very neatly, but in his quaint language, in the same proposition. After mentioning some statements, including one that in his time a woman over threescore years old "hath had a child," he adds, "Ideo non definitur in jure" (Co. Lit. 40A); which I said that I then understood, and which I now think, to mean that no legal proposition can be founded on the impossibility of issue. That is an old authority, but still, I think, an authority in the present case.

For these reasons, I think that as long as the testator's sister Amelia is living the power contained in clause 13, which relates to the expectant and presumptive as well as to the then vested shares—of course these are not vested—is exercisable by the trustees, the power being, as has been pointed out, not merely for advancement, but for support, education, or benefit, the latter word being the largest.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

In re NOURSE.
HAMPTON v. NOURSE. (a.)

Will—Condition—Gift on marriage with consent—Condition precedent—Alternative gift.

A condition of marriage with consent, attached to a gift of personal estate is, as a general rule, void as far as the consent is concerned, even though it be a condition precedent. This rule, however, does not apply where there is a gift over or an alternative gift.

Accordingly, a testator, having given an annuity to his son for life, with an additional annuity in the event of his marriage with the consent of the trustees of the will,

Held, that the testator had provided for his son either way by means of an alternative gift, and that the condition, therefore, was good as falling within that class of exceptions to the general rule which was established in Gillet v. Wray, 1 P. Wms. 284.

This was a summons by one of the defendants in an action to administer the estate of James Nourse, who died on the 4th of April, 1897, and raised the question of the validity of a condition which the testator had annexed to an annuity in the event of the marriage of his son, who was the present applicant.

The facts were as follow: By his will, dated the 29th of September, 1894, the testator gave to his son, H. J. Nourse, an annuity of £2,000 for his life, "and if he shall marry, or shall have married either in my lifetime or after my decease, an additional annuity of £1,000." He also gave an annuity of £1,000 to his son's widow, if his son should die leaving a widow. He then directed the accumulation of surplus income for a period of twenty-one years after his decease if his son or his son's widow should so long live, and that at the expiration of that period the surplus income of the investments and accumulations should be paid to such of the daughters and granddaughters of his cousins Francis and Thomas Carey as should be living at his decease, and subject to the preceding trusts the trustees should stand possessed of the trust premises in trust for the issue of his son as his son should appoint, and in default of appointment for his son's children equally on attaining the age of twenty-one years, or in the case of daughters marrying under that age, in equal shares as tenants in common. And subject to the preceding trusts in trust for the daughters and granddaughters living at his decease of F. and T. Carey in equal shares as tenants in common.

By a codicil dated the 30th of May, 1895, the testator declared as follows: "I direct that the annuity of £1 000 by my said will bequeathed to my son Henry James Duncan Nourse in the event of his marriage shall be payable to him only if he shall have married in my lifetime with my previous consent in writing or after my death with the previous consent in writing of the trustees for the time being of my said will." And the codicil contained a similar direction with reference to the annuity of £1,000 bequeathed to his son's widow.

The testator's will and codicil were duly proved on the 8th of May, 1897.

The estate of the testator included no realty.

An action was commenced by the executors for the administration of the testator's estate. H. J. Nourse, the testator's son, was still unmarried, and he now issued the present summons asking for a declaration that the conditions attached to the annuities given to himself and his widow respectively were inoperative.

The question as to the widow's annuity was not argued.

C. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and Petersen, for H. J. Nourse.—The question is whether, taking the will and codicil together, the obtaining the consent of the trustees is a condition precedent or a condition subsequent. Taking first the case of a condition subsequent, we understand the law to be this: that a gift of personal estate to which is annexed a condition of marriage with consent is void qua the consent, except in certain cases, of which the best known is the case of a gift over. The case of an alternative gift is another exception. It will probably be argued that this is a condition precedent. We submit, however, that the law is the same whether the condition be precedent or subsequent: Semphill v. Bayly, Pre. Ch. 562, and cases cited in Viner's Abr., vol. 5, p. 343, heading Condition, para. 41. The general rule is laid down in Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. 330. There is plenty of authority that the marriage must take place, and that the condition of consent is the only thing disregarded: Elton v. Elton, 3 Atk. 504; Garbut v. Hilton, 1 Atk. 381; Atkins v. Hiccocks, 1 Atk. 500; Gray v. Gray, 23 L. R. Ir. 399; Jarman on Wills, ed. 5, p. 887.

The cases of Creagh v. Wilson, 2 Vern. 572; Gillet v. Wray, 1 P. Wms. 284; Stackpole v. Beaumont, 3 Ves. 89; Younge v. Furse, 5 W. R. 394, 8 De G. M. & G. 75, all fall within the exception to the general rule, as being cases either of gifts over or of alternative gifts. But if any of these cases cannot be brought within these exceptions, they must be taken to be overruled by Reynish v. Martin.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Whinney, contra.—We submit that this condition is an effective one and not in terrorem. We submit that on the true construction of the will this condition cannot be anything but a condition precedent, as it is a condition which must be complied with before the gift can take effect. We admit that Reynish v. Martin is an authority against us if the case falls under the general rule. We say, however, that the general rule does not apply to the present case: Harvey v. Aston, 1 Atk. 361; Stackpole v. Beaumont, 3 Ves. 89; Scott v. Tyler, 2 Bro. Ch. 431, 2 Dick. 712, 1 W. & Tu. L. C. 535. At any rate there are exceptions to the rule, and we submit that this is a case of an alternative gift, like Creagh v. Wilson, Gillett v. Wray, and Holmes v. Lysaght, 4 Bro. Parl. Cas. 185 (in Tomlin's Edition, 2 Br. 261). But we also submit that there is here in effect a gift over. A direction that a gift shall, on breach of a condition, fall into residue is equivalent to a gift over. The present case therefore falls within the other class of exceptions: Lloyd v. Branton, 3 Mer. 108.

P. S. Stokes, in the same interest.—The present case can be distinguished from Reynish v. Martin because in that case there was no provision made for the daughter at all.

Butcher, Q.C., and Warlters Horne, for the trustees of the will.

Jenkins, Q.C., in reply.—Even if it cannot be maintained that this is a condition subsequent, the general rule laid down in Reynish v. Martin applies. This case has not been shown to fall within either class of exceptions, and, further, the cases cited as authorities for the exceptions were all decided before Reynish v. Martin. [STIRLING, J.—But they were not overruled by it.] I submit that this is not a gift by way of substitution: Hick v. Pendarvis, 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 212, 2 Freem. 41. [Whinney referred to Jarman on Wills, 5th ed., p. 388.] As to Scott v. Tyler, Lord Thurlow seems to have had no doubt that Reynish v. Martin was good law. On the true construction of this will there is no alternation or substitution. Nor is there any gift over: Bellasis v. Ermine, Cas. in Ch. 22; Wheeler v. Bingham, 3 Atk. 364. Gillett v. Wray, does not lay down any general rule of law.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J.—The question which arises on this summons is whether a condition which a testator has seen fit to annex to an annuity in the event of the marriage of his son is a condition in restraint of marriage, and therefore bad according to law. [His lordship stated the terms of the will and codicil to the effect set forth above, and after remarking that they must be taken together, continued:] I cannot give any decision as to the son's widow's annuity, but that must be borne in mind in construing the gift to the son. As to the nature of the condition, it seems to me that it must be treated as a condition precedent and not as a condition subsequent. Then the question arises, is it valid or invalid? If one had to deal with it according to the English common law it would be valid, as is shown by decisions as to real estate, and the donee if he married without consent would not be entitled to take the benefit of the devise, he would not be entitled unless he satisfied the condition. But that is not so as regards pure personalty, and in the present case the testator had no real estate. The doctrine was laid down and established by Lord Hardwicke in Reynish v. Martin. There a mother by her will said that if her daughter married with the consent of the trustees or the major part of them signified in writing, before such marriage, "then and not otherwise I give and devise unto my said daughter Mary the sum of £800"; and the testatrix directed another daughter Martha (to whom she had devised all her real estate) to pay her £30 yearly whilst she continued sole, by payments of £15 each on May Day and All Saint's Day, and charged all her real estate with debts of all kinds and legacies. The daughter Mary, after the death of the mother, married the plaintiff without the consent of the trustees, and died soon after, but before her death the trustees declared their consent and approbation in writing. The Lord Chancellor directed that the plaintiff should be paid the arrears of the £30 pro rata until the marriage, and in case the personal estate should be exhausted by payments of debts, so much of the real estate should be sold as would pay the £800 and arrears of the annuity. On the face of that I may remark that payment of the annuity of £30 was only while the annuitant continued sole, and was not dependent upon whether she married with or without consent. As to the £800, Lord Hardwicke says: "I apprehend that, taking this as a mere personal legacy, the plaintiff, by the rules of the civil and ecclesiastical law, and which have been constantly adhered to in this court, will be entitled to the legacy; for it is an established rule in the civil law, and has long been the doctrine of this court, that where a personal legacy is given to a child on condition of marrying with consent, that this is not looked on as a condition annexed to the legacy, but as a declaration of the testator in terrorem. This rule is so strictly adhered to in the ecclesiastical court that the marrying without consent is not considered there as a breach of the condition, although the legacy is actually given over; but that rule has not been carried so far in this court, for in many instances here it has been considered as a breach of the condition, and the legacy thereby forfeited. But that differs from the present case, because here the legacy is given to Mary only, without any limitation over. But then it was objected that there is a strong and material difference between a condition precedent and subsequent, and this being a condition precedent, and as the condition was not performed, nothing vested because the event was not come on which the legacy was to take effect. Undoubtedly this is true in general, both in law and equity, but I do not find that the civil or ecclesiastical law have made any distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent, but that in both cases the condition as such is merely void." In that case the Lord Chancellor held that the condition was inoperative and the legacy payable, and made a decree, in case the personal estate should be exhausted, that the plaintiff should receive satisfaction out of the real estate. That is a decision that, though the condition was precedent, it was inoperative, and the legatee was entitled to the legacy though the condition was not fulfilled. There has been no case cited before me to throw any doubt upon that decision. That decision is plain and clear, and would be easy to apply; but Lord Hardwicke pointed out that the rule of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, in cases where the legacy was given over, had not been so fully followed or carried out to the same extent in the Court of Chancery. In Lloyd v. Branton Sir William Grant, M.R., refers to this distinction, and, after saying that, whatever diversity of opinion there may have been with respect to the necessity of a devise over in the case of conditions precedent, a subsequent condition, without such a devise, of forfeiture on marriage without consent has never been enforced, goes on to say: "Different reasons have been assigned by different judges for the operation of a devise over. Some have said that it afforded a clear manifestation of the intention of the testator not to make the declaration of forfeiture merely in terrorem, which might otherwise have been presumed. Others have said that it was the interest of the devisee over which made the difference, and that the clause ceased to be merely a condition of forfeiture and became a conditional limitation to which the court was bound to give effect." That exception (of a gift over) does not, I think, cover the present case, and what was relied upon in argument was another class of exceptions which was established in Gillet v. Wray. That rule was this. One by will left an annuity of £10 to his granddaughter, and afterwards by a codicil declared that if his granddaughter should marry with the consent of his trustees, then she should have £150 in lieu of the annuity, which should cease. The granddaughter married without the consent of the trustees. Whereupon it was objected that the restraint on marriage was only in terrorem, and that the granddaughter, notwithstanding her having married as above, ought to have the £150 portion. But Lord Cowper decreed the contrary, saying there was a provision made either way, and, where the provision was in the alternative and there was a condition precedent to the gift of the portion—namely, of marriage with consent, and that was not performed, and the donee was still provided for, though not with the greater portion, equity in that case did not relieve. Prior to that decision of Lord Cowper there had been decisions in an opposite sense. And in Scott v. Tyler Lord Thurlow says: "It was made a question formerly what a legatee should take on her marriage under a bequest of £200 if she married or £100 if she did not. Some thought £300, some £200, some £100. In our books we find it determined formerly, in the case of a greater legacy given upon marriage with consent or after a certain age, and a less in the other events, that the greater legacy was not forfeited by marrying against the condition; but those decisions happened in the period alluded to before, when the worth of the alliance was thought a sufficient reason for a favourable interpretation, as it was called, of the condition; but Lord Cowper determined otherwise on alternative bequests." Lord Thurlow recognized the decision of Lord Cowper, whose decision has been taken to settle the law down to the present time. I must, therefore, take this exception to the general rule as laid down in Reynish v. Martin. Whether or not I should myself have taken the same view as was taken in Gillet v. Wray it is not necessary to decide. There is the exception which has been established.

Then the question is, Does the present case fall within it? The language used by the testators in the two cases is not the same, but there seems to me to be no difference in substance. Lord Thurlow treats generally the question of a larger sum if the donee marries and a smaller sum if she does not. In the present case the gift is a smaller one if the son does not marry and a larger one if he does. It seems to me the cases are substantially the same and ought to be governed by the same rule. This seems to me to be in accordance with the decision in the Irish case of Holmes v. Lysaght. That case was taken before the House of Lords but was settled by a compromise, and so is of no great authority. I think, therefore, that the condition is operative.

Company—Winding up—Supervision order—Pending action—Costs prior to winding up—Payment in full.

The costs of an action begun by a company while a going concern and continued, with leave, by the liquidators after the company has been ordered to be wound up under supervision, and in which judgment was entered in favour of the defendant with costs, are payable in full even when the order granting the liquidators leave to continue the action is silent on the subject.

The company while a going concern had commenced an action against Earl Brownlow. While the trial was pending the company passed an extraordinary resolution to wind up voluntarily, a supervision order being afterwards made. The liquidators decided to continue the action, and obtained the leave of the court to do so. On the trial of the action the defendant (Earl Brownlow) obtained judgment against the company with costs. The question which had now to be decided was whether the defendant was entitled to his full costs in the action during the time that the company was a going concern, or whether he could only prove in the winding-up for these costs and rank for dividend with the other creditors of the company.

H. F. Manisty, for Earl Brownlow.—If the company had been successful in the action it would have been paid the costs of the suit in full, and as it has failed it must now pay them in full: Boynton v. Boynton, 27 W. R. 825. 4 App. Cas. 733. In Cook v. Hathaway, 17 W. R. 1057, L. R. 8 Eq. 612, the assignee in bankruptcy was stayed from proceeding with a suit of the bankrupt, who had been ordered to pay certain costs, until such costs were paid. The costs are payable and not provable.

Martelli, for the liquidators.—Where nothing is said as to costs in the order giving leave to the liquidators to continue the action, the costs incurred before winding up are only provable in the ordinary way.

He also quoted Buckley on the Companies Acts, 7th ed., p. 271, and In re Snyder Dynamite Projectile Co., [1893] W. N. 37.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that the liability of the liquidators to pay the costs in full may be held to follow upon what was laid down by Lord Cairns in Boynton v. Boynton, when, dealing with the case of an executor who had obtained an order allowing him to continue the proceedings in an action instituted by his testator, he said: "He"—that was the executor—"thus adopted the suit, and adopted it ab initio. Had he been successful on the appeal he would have retained the cancelled deed, and received the costs ordered to be paid to Lady Boynton, together with the costs of the appeal, and, as he has failed, he must, according to the well-settled practice of the court, submit to an order for payment of costs personally." Of course that does not carry the matter the whole way, because the question here is not whether the liquidator is liable to pay the costs, but whether the company is liable to pay them in full. It may very well be that in giving leave to a liquidator to continue an action a term ought to be inserted in the order that the liquidator if he fails, should pay the costs of the defendant in full, but it does not follow that, because there is no such term in the order, the liquidator is not liable to do so. It seems better to hold that, as the company would have got all the costs if it had succeeded in the action, it ought, if it fails, to be held liable to pay all costs in full of the defendant. That seems to me only just and reasonable. No authorities directly in point have been cited before me, but it seems to be more reasonable to hold that, if in the interests of the company a liquidator elects that an action commenced by it should be continued, the assets of the company should, if the action fails, bear the whole of the costs, than to hold that a part of them should be thrown upon the successful litigant.

FRACIS, TIMES, & CO. v. THE SEA INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Arms and ammunition shipped to foreign country in time of peace—Capture—Alleged prohibition of foreign country against importation of such goods—Alleged concealment of fact material for calculating risk—Alleged illegal venture—Validity of policy.

The plaintiffs insured with the defendants arms and ammunition for delivery at certain ports in the Persian Gulf, under a policy which covered "capture at sea." The goods were seized and confiscated by an English man-of-war, acting, it was alleged, on behalf of the Persian Government, under an edict passed in 1881 but which had never been enforced so long as the duty demanded for import of such goods was paid) prohibiting the importation of arms and ammunition into Persia.

Held, that the plaintiffs could recover on the policy, because there had been in fact no wilful concealment on their part from the underwriters of the risk of seizure; for, if they knew of the edict, they had no reason to suppose that it would be enforced so long as the duty payable was forthcoming. Nor was the policy void, as being on goods shipped for an illegal venture, for the importation of such goods into Persia, was neither contrary to the law of Persia as that law was in practice administered, nor illegal by the law of the country of the assured, England being at the time in amity with Persia.

Commercial cause.

This was an action tried by Bigham, J., without a jury. The plaintiffs claimed for loss of goods consisting of arms and ammunition, insured under two policies of marine insurance effected with the defendant company. The "warranty free of capture" clause had been struck out of the policies, and the perils insured against were "men-of-war, enemies, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments, and all other perils as well as all misfortunes.' The goods were seized on the voyage, and the plaintiffs claimed as and for a total loss. The defendants denied liability, alleging that the policies were void because the plaintiffs had concealed a material fact—namely, that the importation of arms and ammunition into Persia was forbidden by an edict of the Persian Government, made in 1881, and the voyage being thus an illegal venture the policies were rendered void.

Pickford, Q.C., and Hollams, for the plaintiffs, denied that the voyage was an illegal venture since its object was neither opposed to the law of the nation of the assured nor to the law of nations, and they relied on Planché v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 251.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., Carver, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the defendants, cited Redmond v. Smith, 7 Man & G. 457, and De Wütz v. Hendricks, 2 Bing. 314. Planché v. Fletcher was disapproved of by several text-writers, and had never been followed by any judge: see Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th ed. 694; Pollock on Contracts, p. 307.

Cur. adv. vult.

BIGHAM, J. — This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, who are merchants carrying on business in London and at Bushire in Persia and at Muscat, against the defendants, who are underwriters, on two policies of marine insurance to recover a total loss caused by a capture at sea of the goods insured. The policies were dated respectively the 29th of November, 1897, and the 6th of December, 1897. The first policy was described to be on four cases of cartridges, valued at £125, per steamer Baluchistan, London to Bahrein and (or) other Persian Gulf ports; and the second policy on one case rifles and one case cartridges, valued at £200, by the same vessel to Bunder Abbas and (or) other Persian Gulf ports. The bills of lading for the goods mentioned in the first policy described the goods as shipped for "Bahrein, vid Bushire. Muscat optional." The bills of lading for the second parcel described the goods simply as shipped for Bunder Abbas. Bahrein is an island on the west coast of the Persian Gulf, and Muscat is a port on the Gulf of Oman, neither of the places being in Persian territory. Bushire and Bunder Abbas are ports in the Persian Gulf and are both in Persian territory. The Baluchistan sailed from London about the 26th of November, 1897, and on the 26th of January, 1898, when off Muscat, she was intercepted by her Majesty's ship Lapwing, purporting to act on behalf of the Government of the Shah of Persia, and the goods in question were seized and confiscated. The alleged ground of the confiscation was that the goods were intended for importation into Persian territory, and that the importation of arms and ammunition was forbidden by the Persian law. The plaintiffs thereupon made a claim against the defendants as for a total loss. The defendants objected to pay on two grounds. First, they said that the plaintiffs had, when effecting the insurance, concealed a fact material to the estimation of the risk—viz., that the importation of arms was forbidden by Persian law; and, secondly, they said that the adventure was illegal, as being in contravention of what they called the law of nations.

Dealing first with the question of concealment, the evidence before me was to the effect that as long ago as the 1st of July, 1881, the Persian Government had issued a decree that no arms or ammunition should enter Persian territory without the leave and permission of the Government, and that if any such goods arrived at Bushire they were to be detained and the fact was to be reported to the authorities at Teheran. A copy of the decree was put in evidence. At the same time directions seem to have been given to the Customs officials at Bushire to bring this decree to the notice of merchants and traders, so that they might be warned, and steps seem to have been taken in this direction, although in point of fact the decree appears never to have been brought to the notice of the plaintiffs. The prohibition is said to have been reiterated by the Shah on more than one occasion, and its existence is alleged to have been universally known. I do not, however, find that any attempt to enforce it was ever made, except possibly on one occasion. In the year 1895 a parcel of arms shipped from England for Muscat by the steamer Zulu was landed at Bushire. The Customs officials there detained the goods on the plea (so said the English shipowners in their letter of the 21st of January, 1896) "that the heavy duty on arms and ammunition imported into Persia must be paid." The owners of the goods objected to pay on the ground that the goods were not intended for Persia, and were merely landed at Bushire in transit for Muscat. Both the Persian authorities and Sir Mortimer Durand, our representative at Teheran, seem to have suspected the truth of this assertion; but ultimately the goods were released and forwarded to Muscat. In my opinion, the real dispute between the owners of the goods and the Persian Customs on that occasion was as to whether the former should pay the arbitrary and heavy duty which the latter sought to exact, the goods owners saying that they ought to pay nothing because the goods were merely in transit, the Customs authorities saying that full duty ought to be paid because the goods were in fact landed in Persian territory, and were, as they suggested, not going to Muscat at all. The incident has, in my view, little or nothing to do with the case now before me, and I only refer to it because it was relied upon by the defendants at the hearing as supporting their contention that the prohibition was effective and notorious. That there was in fact a qualified prohibition against the importation of arms and ammunition is clear, but I think it is necessary to inquire whether it was really operative. Now, the plaintiffs tell me (and I am satisfied that they are telling me the truth) that for many years past, indeed, since 1884, they have been regularly engaged in the importation of arms into Bushire. They at first imported the goods in execution of the orders of buyers in Persia, but later on they imported the goods for sale on their own account. The trade was conducted during all these years quite openly. The goods were described in the bills of lading and ship's manifests as arms, and they were so entered at the Customs, both in England and in Persia. After importation they were placed in the plaintiffs' godown in Bushire and there publicly sold. Other firms at Bushire carried on similar trade in the same way. I think it probable that the plaintiffs knew that there was something in the nature of a prohibition against the trade, but I am quite satisfied that they believed it to be a dead letter, and that they had never heard of any attempt to enforce it, or of any complaint by the Persian Government that it was being disregarded. If the so-called prohibition was effective for any purpose at all, it was merely for the purpose of enabling the representative of the Shah at Bushire, who apparently farms his office from the Government, to levy heavy and arbitrary duties on the goods imported. This representative is an official who has the very largest powers; he is no doubt frequently changed, but while holding his office he can do practically what he pleases. The plaintiffs told me that the duties were fixed and levied by these officials, who were well aware of the nature of the trade, and who, so far from objecting to it, complained that there was not enough of it. All this is borne out by Major Meade, our political resident in the Persian Gulf. In his trade report, addressed to the Government of India for the year 1896-97, at p. 5, he says: "ARMS AND AMMUNITION.—This trade was found to be so flourishing last year, and the sums obtained by the local authorities for conniving at it were so considerable, that the central Government considered that there was room for another partner in it, and a special official was appointed from Teheran nominally to enforce the prohibition against the import of arms; but, as the official in question paid for his post in the usual fashion, it is certain that neither he nor the Government had any intention of really carrying out the orders. In spite of this new tap on the profits the trade shows an income of ten lakhs, and, I believe, forward shippings are satisfactory for all those who share in this nominally illicit trade." This, in my opinion, is a frank, honest, and accurate account of the position. There was no real prohibition at all; nor did anyone engaged in the trade imagine, certainly the plaintiffs did not, that there was the least danger of interference so long as the duties were forthcoming in answer to the demands of the Government officials. If further evidence on this point were wanted it is found in the report of our Consul-General, Mr. Fred A. Wilson, for the year 1895 on trade at Bushire. Speaking of the importation of arms and ammunition, he says: "Theoretically this trade is prohibited by the Persian Government, but, like all similar prohibitions in Persia, this practically only substitutes an arbitrary impost for a fixed duty." What, then, did the plaintiffs know and believe at the time they took out the policies sued on? They knew probably that there was a nominal prohibition against the importation of arms. They knew, as the fact was, that it was never acted upon; they had never heard of any attempt to enforce it; they knew that so long as the duties (which no doubt were arbitrary and variable) were paid there was no prospect at all of interference, and they knew that the trade was open and notorious. They dealt with the defendants with perfect honesty. They did not suggest that the clause in the policies warranting the goods free of capture should be struck out. This was done on the initiative of the defendants themselves, following what appears to be the ordinary practice on an insurance of goods, so that the defendants by their own act became liable for a loss by capture. It was, indeed, suggested in the course of the case that the shipment with an option to land the goods at Muscat pointed to some fear in the minds of the plaintiffs that there might be a danger of the goods being interfered with at Bushire. I am, however, quite satisfied that the only object in obtaining from the shipowner the option to land the goods at Muscat was to enable the plaintiffs to avail themselves of either market, Muscat or Bushire, whichever might be most advantageous. It had no reference to possible difficulties at Bushire, no such difficulties being, in my opinion, anticipated by the plaintiffs. Now, in these circumstances, were the plaintiffs guilty of any omission such as would invalidate their insurance? Their duty to the underwriters was not only to be honest and straightforward (which I am satisfied they were), but to disclose to them all the facts in their knowledge which could reasonably affect the judgment of the underwriters in estimating the risk; however honest the plaintiffs may have been, if they failed in this duty they must lose the benefit of their insurance. The question thus resolves itself into one of pure fact. Were the circumstances as known to the plaintiffs material in estimating the risk? I am of opinion they were not. I have to exercise my knowledge of business, and I am quite satisfied that if the plaintiffs had told to the defendants all that they knew about this trade it would not have affected the judgment of the underwriters in estimating the risk at all. I do not forget that an underwriter was called to tell me that, in his opinion, the existence of an obsolete prohibition would affect the risk; nor do I forget that there were other underwriters in court ready to say the same thing. They speak after the event. For my own part I doubt whether The Lapwing acted on the initiative of the Persian Government at all. A copy of the Times of the 16th of December, 1897, containing a telegram from that newspaper's correspondent, dated Teheran, the 15th of December, 1897, was put in evidence, in which a seizure of arms which had just been made at Bushire was attributed to the vigorous action of the British and Persian authorities. I think the telegram would have been more accurate if it had attributed the seizure to the vigorous action of the British authorities alone. No doubt it was at this time suspected (probably wrongly) that these arms were destined for the Afghanistan frontier, where the native tribes were giving trouble to the Indian Government, and I cannot help thinking that the action of the Persian Government in December, 1897, and also on the occasion in question in this action, when the services of The Lapwing were requisitioned, was really due, not to the prohibition which existed against the importation of arms, but to some representations of the British Government made to the Shah. Whether I am right or wrong in this conjecture is, however, of little or no importance. It is sufficient for me to say that, in my view of the facts, there was nothing in the knowledge of the plaintiffs which could reasonably have affected the calculation of the risk, and which they failed to disclose to the defendants. As to the second point taken by the defendants—viz., that the adventure was illegal because the import of arms was contrary to the law of Persia, and that, therefore, the policy in respect of it was void, I am of opinion that there is nothing in it. The import of arms was not illegal according to the law of Persia, as that law was administered in practice and enjoined; and the export of arms from England to Persia was certainly not contrary to our law.

Criminal law — False pretences — Evidence — Admissibility — Similar acts by defendant after offence charged — Right of defendant to give evidence before grand jury — Right of judge to comment on failure of defendant to give evidence — Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), s. 1.

The Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, does not entitle the person charged, to give evidence for the defence before the grand jury, nor does it negative the right of the presiding judge to comment upon the failure of the person charged to give evidence at the trial.

On the trial of a person charged with obtaining goods by false pretences, it was proved that the prisoner caused an advertisement to be inserted in newspapers suggesting that he was carrying on a bonâ fide business, and required the goods for that business, and that the prosecutor supplied him with the goods on the faith of that advertisement. Evidence was admitted that, at intervals of one week and two months respectively after the transaction with the prosecutor, two other persons supplied the defendant with similar goods on the faith of the same advertisement and were not paid for their goods.

Held, that the evidence was rightly admitted as tending to show that the defendant had no genuine business, but was carrying on a system of fraud.

Case stated by the chairman of the quarter sessions for the Isle of Ely.

The defendant was tried on the 19th and 20th of October, 1898, on a charge of obtaining a certain quantity of eggs on the false pretence to one William Bays that he was then carrying on business as a farmer or dairyman and did then require eggs for use in the said business and was then in a position to pay for the eggs by means of which said false pretences he did then unlawfully obtain the eggs from the said William Bays with intent to defraud.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Before the bill of indictment was sent to the grand jury the defendant applied in person under section 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, to give evidence for the defence before the grand jury. The chairman declined to permit him to do so, but reserved the point for the consideration of this court.

It was proved by the prosecution that the defendant had advertised in the newspapers circulating in the county for new-laid eggs; that he gave no name, but only an address, "Norfolk Farm Dairy, High-street, Mitcham, Surrey," and that the prosecutor, believing he was dealing with a responsible firm, sent two consignments of eggs for which he was never paid. Further evidence was given to prove that the defendant had no right to the title "Norfolk Farm Dairy."

In the course of the trial two witnesses, William Elston and James Chambers, were called for the prosecution to prove that the defendant had obtained eggs of them also, and that they had sent him twelve dozen and fifteen dozen eggs respectively under precisely similar conditions to those sent by the prosecutor. It was stated by the counsel who argued this case for the prosecution (although not stated in the case reserved) that the transaction with Elston occurred about one week, and that with Chambers about two months, after the transaction with Bays upon which the charge against the defendant was founded.

Counsel for the defence objected to the reception of their evidence on the ground that counts against the defendant in respect of his dealings with the two witnesses in question had been struck out by order of the chairman, and their evidence could not be received as proof of fraud. He referred to the case of Reg. v. Holt, 9 W. R. 74, 30 L. J. M. C. 11.

The chairman overruled this objection and admitted the evidence on the authority of Reg. v. Foster, 3 W. R. 411, 24 L. J. M. C. 134, and Reg. v. Francis, 22 W. R. 663, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128, on the ground that such evidence was relevant to the issue as tending to show motive, intention, or guilty knowledge. He reserved this point also for the opinion of this court.

There was evidence to prove that the defendant did very little trade, and as to this fact a Mrs. Freeborn was called for the prosecution. She had bought the business from the defendant in July, 1898, shortly after he had obtained the eggs from the prosecutor and others, and was examined to prove that the defendant did no trade worth speaking of, judging from her experience of the business she did after taking possession of the shop.

On cross-examination for the defendant she stated that she once had a customer who wanted six dozen eggs, which she had not in stock, but she did not know his name.

Counsel for the prosecution suggested that there was no bonâ fide customer, but that the person, whoever he was, had been sent at the defendant's instance to create an impression that there was a large demand for eggs.

Upon this the defendant made a communication to his solicitor, and thereupon his counsel said it was "a Mr. King, of Mitcham," who wanted the eggs, and, upon the chairman observing that a bare statement of such a kind was insufficient, he undertook to clear the matter up when he came to the defence and if necessary to call evidence.

On the close of the case for the prosecution counsel for the defendant intimated that he called no witnesses for the defence, whereupon both counsel addressed the jury, and one witness to character was called.

In summing up the evidence to the jury, the chairman drew attention to the fact that it would have been more satisfactory if evidence had been called to clear up the mystery of the person who was said to have wanted six dozen eggs, and he pointed out that under the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, it was open to the defendant to give evidence on his own behalf in support of the statement made by his counsel that it was "a Mr. King, of Mitcham." Counsel for the defence objected, but the chairman ruled that the prohibition in section 1 (b) of the above Act as to comment by the prosecution upon the defendant's failure to give evidence did not apply to the court. This point also was reserved for the consideration of this court.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the defendant was sentenced to ten calendar months' imprisonment.

In the event of the court being of opinion that the chairman's rulings as affecting the defendant were erroneous in point of law, the conviction was to be quashed, otherwise to stand.

The defendant was not represented.

H. Raikes, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue as to the right of the defendant to give evidence before the grand jury.—The evidence of Elston and Chambers was rightly admitted as showing that the defendant was an impecunious person having no real business. Although the transactions with Elston and Chambers were subsequent to that with the prosecutor, they were so connected with it by the advertisement which gave rise to all three transactions as to be evidence of one course of fraud. The evidence was therefore admissible on the principle laid down in Reg. v. Francis, which case practically overrules Reg. v. Holt. There is nothing in the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, to take away the right of the court to comment on the evidence. [He was stopped on this point.]

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The first point which affects the defendant is that he applied to be allowed to give evidence for the defence before the grand jury and that the chairman of quarter sessions decided that he ought not to be allowed to do so. In my opinion the chairman was clearly right. This question turns on the construction of section 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, which came into operation on the 13th of October last. It enacts that "every person charged with an offence . . . shall be a competent witness for the defence at every stage of the proceedings." It is clear that the right to be called as a witness there given to the person charged is limited; he can be called for the defence only. Now, the grand jury have nothing to do with the defence: their functions are well known and understood—they have to hear the witnesses or some of the witnesses for the prosecution to enable them to determine if there is a primâ facie case against the prisoner to be tried before the petty jury before whom the prisoner can be heard by himself or his counsel. The Act does not introduce such a novelty as that witnesses for the defence should be called before the grand jury. The prisoner is a competent witness for the defence but he is not entitled to give evidence before the grand jury. Even if he did come before them and swear that he did not commit the offence and they believed him they could not act on his evidence and throw out the bill, for they have only to say if there is a primâ facie case against him. The chairman was therefore perfectly right.

The second question is whether the evidence of Elston and Chambers was receivable. The charge on which the defendant stood his trial was that he obtained certain eggs from the prosecutor by false pretences. The alleged false pretences may be briefly described as these—that the defendant falsely pretended that he was honestly carrying on the business of a farmer or dairyman, and that he wanted these eggs for the purposes of his business (according to the advertisement which he caused to be inserted in the newspapers for a considerable time), and was able to pay for them; whereas in fact he had no real business, and was not in a position to pay for the eggs. It must be assumed that the prosecution proved the false pretences in the case of the prosecutor. But they called Elston and Chambers to prove that they, acting on the same advertisement, had supplied eggs to the defendant upon the same false pretences. It does not appear in the case at what dates these transactions with Elston and Chambers occurred, not even whether they were before or after the transaction with the prosecutor. If they were before, and not remotely before, that transaction, evidence of them was clearly admissible. We are now told by counsel that one of them took place a week and the other two months after the transaction upon which the charge was founded, and I propose to deal with the evidence relying on the accuracy of that statement. The admissibility of the evidence depends on whether or not the real charge was that this was a course of sham or bogus business carried on by the defendant. If there was merely one isolated transaction, and two months afterwards another isolated transaction occurred, I think the evidence of the later transaction would not have been admissible; and even in the present case, if I had been presiding, I would have advised the prosecuting counsel not to press the evidence. But, on the whole, I think it was admissible on the ground that the allegation was a course of fraud carried on by a series of advertisements. These transactions were so connected by means of the advertisement that evidence of the later transactions was admissible in the trial of a charge founded on the earlier one.

In so holding I say nothing in conflict with the decision in Reg. v. Holt; there the false pretences alleged were that the defendant represented that he was authorized by his master to receive money for goods; the evidence held to be inadmissible related to a similar representation made by him on a subsequent occasion; there was nothing to connect the two occurrences, and the evidence as to the later act threw no light on the former.

The case nearest to the present is Reg. v. Francis. It is true that the evidence which was there admitted related to a transaction occurring before the transaction the subject of the indictment. [His lordship read the headnote, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128.] But in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice is the following passage: "It seems clear upon principle that when the fact of the prisoner having done the thing charged is proved and the only remaining question is whether, at the time he did it, he had guilty knowledge of the quality of his act or acted under a mistake, evidence of the class received, must be admissible. It tends to show that he was pursuing a course of similar acts." And, later on, "the prisoner was tried on two charges of attempting, on the 8th of January, at Northampton, to obtain money from two different pawnbrokers by the false pretence that a worthless piece of jewellery consisted of real stones. Evidence that he, on the 6th of January, at Bedford, obtained money from another pawnbroker on the pledge of a chain, which he represented to be gold when in fact it was not gold, was surely matter from which the jury might infer that he was in a course of cheating pawnbrokers by knowingly passing off on them false articles under the pretence that they were genuine." Though the evidence there was of a fact anterior in date to the offence charged, the reasoning is applicable to evidence of facts subsequent to the offence where there is a nexus or connection between the acts charged in the indictment and the acts of which the evidence is given, such as the nexus which I have pointed out in the present case.

The next point is as to the comments of the chairman. The counsel for the defendant was cross-examining a woman who gave evidence to the effect that no genuine business was being carried on at the defendant's address. She stated that there was once a customer who asked her to supply six dozen eggs, but she did not know his name. The defendant's counsel, prompted by the defendant, suggested the name of "Mr. King, of Mitcham," and he undertook to clear the matter up, and, if necessary, to call evidence. Then when it came to his turn he said he called no witnesses. The chairman in summing up drew attention to this, and to the fact that it was open to the defendant to give evidence on his own behalf in support of the suggestion as to Mr. King, of Mitcham. The only question for us is whether he had a right to make this comment. There is nothing in the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, which takes away or purports to take away the right of the presiding judge to comment on the evidence. Such comments must rest on the discretion of the judge, and it is impossible to lay down any rule as to cases in which he ought or ought not to make comments or what comments he ought to make. This depends on the varying circumstances of cases. In some cases it is wise and even necessary, in others it is not wise to make comments. Here there is no reason to think the chairman was wrong in making these comments: his observations seem to me to have been called for. On these grounds the conviction must be affirmed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add a word as to the admissibility of the evidence. In all these cases as to evidence of similar acts of the prisoner it must be considered exactly what the charge is. Here the charge is that the prisoner falsely pretended that he was carrying on a real business when he was carrying on a mere bogus business. How is it to be shown that he was not carrying on a real business, especially where, as here, he had some of the apparatus of a business—a shop with a name over it? You cannot show it unless you give evidence of other transactions showing that this was not a solitary transaction but part of a system. If the other transactions are prior in date (within a reasonable time) there is no doubt as to the admissibility. There is no principle upon which transactions occurring immediately after the transaction charged ought to be distinguished, the object being to show the system. To my mind the only difficulty is the interval between the transaction the subject of the indictment and the last of the two other transactions. If there were no nexus between them I should think it very doubtful whether the evidence of the last transaction ought to be admitted. But where you have the same advertisement giving rise to both transactions and leading to the same results I think the evidence is admissible and the jury must decide as to the weight to be given to it. I have no doubt as to the admissibility of the evidence in question here, and I am glad that no doubt is to be thrown on it by this court. If a man who was not a lawyer were asked to say that his mind ought not to be influenced by it he would say it would be absurd.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion on the grounds stated by my lord. On the second point, the allegation being that this was a bogus business, evidence of facts relating to the business during a period from a short time before to a short time after the event in which the charge was founded is relevant. As to the interval of two months it seems to me that the length of time detracts from the value of the evidence unless the interval is filled up by similar instances, but it is not an objection to its legality.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion, though during the argument I felt some doubt as to the admissibility of this evidence. I think, however, that it was relevant as tending to show that the business was a sham business. Evidence that after the occurrence the subject of the charge the defendant obtained further eggs which he did not pay for seems to me to have only a remote bearing on the charge, but that goes to the weight and not to the admissibility of the evidence.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the right to give evidence before the grand jury, even if there had been any doubt on the words of the Act it would take a great deal to convince me that it was intended to set up a secret tribunal for the trial of a criminal case: this would have been the effect of enabling evidence for the defence to be called before the grand jury, the public being excluded from their deliberations.

Conviction affirmed.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Aug. 2, 1898.

"THE VULCAN." (a.)

County court—Admiralty—Practice—Payment into court with denial of liability—Meaning of word "tender"—Final order—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 26—County Court (Admiralty) Rules, 1892, Ord. 39b, rr. 48-50.

Order 39b of the County Court Rules of 1892 contains special rules to be applied in admiralty actions in county courts having admiralty jurisdiction, and certain rules of such Order are headed "Tenders." Of these rules so headed, rule 48 requires a notice of tender to be given, and provides, further, that money may be paid into court with a denial of liability, and that if this is done the form of notice of tender shall be altered accordingly; and rule 49 directs that within forty-eight hours after receipt of such notice of payment into court the adverse party shall file a notice of acceptance or rejection of "the tender," whilst rule 50 is in terms as follows: "A party accepting a tender shall be entitled to his costs of suit, and shall be at liberty to tax and enforce payment of the same without the necessity of an application to the court for the purpose."

Held, that the term "tender" in rules 49 and 50 of the above-mentioned Order referred to and included both a payment into court without denial of liability and a payment into court with a denial of liability.

An order of the judge of a county court having admiralty jurisdiction refusing the taxation of his costs to a party entitled to the benefits given by the latter of these two last-mentioned rules is a final order within section 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, and is consequently appealable without the permission of the judge of the court appealed from.

This was an appeal from an order of the judge of the City of London Court.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

An action had been instituted by Clarke, Sharp, & Co., the owners of the steamship The Vulcan, to recover damages (£30) and costs in respect of a breach of an agreement in relation to the use or hire of The Vulcan by the defendants, Messrs. A. & F. Good, charterers of The Vulcan. The defendants, by their solicitors, paid £17 10s. into court "in satisfaction of the whole of the plaintiffs' claim herein, and we do hereby give notice that notwithstanding such payment the defendants deny their liability." The solicitors for the plaintiffs accepted the sum of £17 10s. so paid by the defendants into court "in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it was paid in"; and gave notice of an application "that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to tax their costs of the action, including the costs of and consequent upon the application; and that the defendants be ordered to pay such costs."

The judge of the City of London Court refused the plaintiffs' application for taxation and payment of their costs by the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

The appeal was now heard by a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (the President (Sir Francis Jeune) and Barnes, J.).

F. Laing, for the respondents, took a preliminary objection.—The judge of the court below has not granted leave for an appeal in this case, and without such leave this court has no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, having regard to the provisions of the 26th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, which provides that "an appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a county court in an admiralty cause, and by permission of the judge of the county court from any interlocutory decree or order therein."

[JEUNE, P.—The order appealed from is a final decree or order within the section. It is an order finally determining the only rights of the parties which remained at issue, therefore no leave to appeal can be necessary.]

Kilburn, for the appellants, plaintiffs in the court below.—This is an admiralty action, and both the plaintiffs and defendants have complied with the provisions of Ord. 39*b*, rr. 48, 49, and 50, of the County Court Rules, 1892, relating to admiralty actions and tenders, a term which since the addition to rule 47 allowing a payment into court in admiralty actions with a denial of liability, must be construed as including the offer by a defendant of money paid into court where liability is denied. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to tax and recover their costs, and the order refusing them that relief was made without jurisdiction. The General County Court Rules (County Court Rules, 1892, Ord. 9, rr. 11 and 12*a*) as to payment into court with a denial of liability on the common law side of the county courts have no application to admiralty actions The admiralty practice is laid down in The William Symington, 33 W. R. 371, 10 P. D. 1, and The Mona, 43 W. R. 173, [1894] P. 265, and that practice is carried out by the above rules, under which the plaintiffs are entitled to costs.

F. Laing, for the respondents, defendants in the court below.—A payment into court, without denying anything to be due, was, before the Judicature Acts, unknown in admiralty actions. And the rules in ord. 39*b*, under which a party making a "tender" which is accepted becomes entitled to tax his costs, are confined to cases of "tenders" as the word was used in admiralty practice before the Judicature Acts: see the Rules for County Courts having Admiralty Jurisdiction in force before 1875. The rules cannot be construed differently merely because a party in an Admiralty action is now entitled to make a payment into court without denial of liability. And where this has been done the forms and proceedings required by the General County Court Orders of 1892, Ord. ix, rr. 11 and 12*a*, rules which are applicable to actions both on the common law and admiralty sides of the county court must be deemed to have been followed. Under these rules the plaintiffs ought not to have accepted the money paid in if they wanted costs, or should have applied to the judge for extra costs beyond the amount paid in. The defendants are therefore only entitled to the money paid into court, which includes costs, and the court below rightly on that ground made the order it did, or in the alternative the application for costs was an application for extra costs and was refused by the judge of the court below in his discretion.

JEUNE, P.—The question in this case is whether the County Court Rules applicable to common law proceedings in the county court, or the County Court (Admiralty) Rules specially applying to admiralty actions, govern. My view is that in an admiralty action where there are special rules applicable, they override the rules applicable to actions on the common law side of the county court; and that view seems to have been followed in this case because the defendants when filling in the præcipe for paying the money into court substantially followed Form No. 333 of the Admiralty forms given in the County Court Rules. I think, therefore, that the special rules 48, 49, and 50, contained in Order 39*b* of the County Court (Admiralty) Rules, apply here. It has been pointed out by counsel for the plaintiffs that the County Court Rules for the common law side proceed upon a different principle from that which has been followed by the defendants in this case, for under the common law rules, the court fees and costs must be paid into court at the same time; and it then lies with the plaintiffs whether they will elect to take the money and costs or apply for further costs. In this case no sum was paid into court for court fees or costs. A difficulty no doubt arises in applying the County Court Admiralty Rules to a payment into court with denial of liability, because the word "tender" is used in all the three rules I have referred to, but the word in rule 47 seems to be used in the sense in which that word is used in admiralty proceedings, as explained in The Mona, [1894] P. 265, and not in the common law sense. Rule 48 allows of payment into court being made with a denial of liability, and rule 49 appears to apply the word "tender" to both kinds of payment into court—that is, to payment into court without a denial of liability and to payment into court with a denial of liability. I think that in rule 50 tender may be supposed to be used in the same sense as in rule 49, and to be intended to include a payment into court with a denial of liability. In the result—though it were well if the rules were made more explicit—I think that rules 48, 49, and 50 of Order 39*b* of the County Court Rules, 1892, apply, and that therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to their costs and to an order for the taxation of the same.

BARNES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WEST LONDON SYNDICATE (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

*Inland Revenue—Stamp—Conveyance on sale—Agreement for sale—*Ad valorem duty—Leasehold interest in licensed house—Goodwill—"Legal or equitable transfer"—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 59, sub-section 1.

By an agreement under seal a vendor agreed to sell to the West London Syndicate (inter alia) the goodwill of a hotel proprietor and licensed victualler; the lease of the hotel and premises and the vendor's interest therein; all the household furniture, fixtures, fittings, and other effects (other than stock-in-trade); all cash in hand and at the bank to which the vendor was then entitled; and all the book and other debts due to the vendor in connection with the business. The consideration for the sale was the discharge by the syndicate of the debts and liabilities of the vendor then due in relation to the business, and the sum of £4,250, of which £1,462 16s. 3d. was the apportioned consideration for the furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash.

The amount of the debts and liabilities forming part of the consideration was found to be £1,335 8s. 4d., so that the purchase consideration amounted to £5,585 8s. 4d. It was agreed that the vendor should show a good title to the premises and assign the lease thereof and the goodwill of the business to the syndicate, and that, in the event of of the landlords not consenting to the assignment of the lease, that the vendor would execute a declaration of trust in favour of the syndicate. The consent of the landlords was not obtained, and a declaration of trust was therefore executed and was stamped with the fixed duty of ten shillings.

Held, by A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ., that there was not an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest in any property whatsoever within the meaning of section 59, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Held, by Rigby, L.J., that, though on the face of the agreement it was not for the sale of an equitable interest in property within that section, yet, looking at the facts of the case, it ought to be inferred that the agreement was only for the sale of an equitable interest.

Held, further, by A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ., that the goodwill was capable of being sold separately and independently of the leasehold premises, and that, in respect of the goodwill, the agreement was liable to an ad valorem duty, as such goodwill was property other than lands.

Held, by Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting, that the goodwill could not be separated from the leasehold premises, and that, consequently, the agreement was not liable to an ad valorem duty upon that part of the consideration apportioned to the sale of the goodwill and lease of the hotel.

Appeal from Grantham and Channell, JJ., 42 S. J. 133.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to 54 & 55 Vict. c. 39, s. 13. An instrument was presented to the commissioners on behalf of the West London Syndicate under the provisions of section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

This instrument, which bore date the 19th of March, 1895, was an agreement under seal for the sale by Percy Thorne (thereinafter called the "vendor") to the syndicate of, firstly, the goodwill of a hotel proprietor and licensed victualler carried on by the vendor at Fischer's Hotel, Clifford-street, New Bond-street, and the full benefit of the victualler's and other licences, and of all contracts, engagements, and privileges to which the vendor was entitled in relation thereto; secondly, the lease of the hotel and premises, and the vendor's right, title, and interest therein, subject to the yearly rent of £964, together with the policy of insurance against fire then subsisting on the premises; thirdly, all the household furniture, fixtures, fittings, and other effects (other than stock-in-trade) in and upon the premises belonging to the vendor, and the benefit of the policy of insurance against fire then subsisting therein; fourthly, the stock-in-trade to which the vendor was on the 17th of November then last past entitled; fifthly, all cash in hand and at the bank to which the vendor was entitled at the aforesaid date; sixthly, all the book and other debts due to him, the vendor, in connection with the business. By clause 2 of the agreement it was provided that the consideration for the sale should be the discharge by the syndicate of the debts and liabilities of the vendor due and owing by him at the aforesaid date in relation to the business, and the sum of £4,250, of which £1,462 16s. 3d. was the apportioned consideration for the furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. By clause 3 it was provided that the vendor should show a good title to the leasehold premises, and assign to the syndicate or their assigns the lease thereof and the goodwill of the business. By clause 6 it was provided that in the event of the consent of the landlords to the assignment of the leasehold premises not being obtained the vendor should, at the option of the syndicate, execute a declaration of trust of the premises in their favour.

The consent of the landlord not having been obtained, a declaration of trust was executed in favour of the purchasers. The commissioners were informed that the amount of the debts and liabilities forming part of the consideration under clause 2 was the sum of £1,335 8s. 4d., and that the purchase consideration was therefore that amount plus £4,250—namely, £5,585 8s. 4d., and that this total sum was arrived at as follows: For lease and goodwill, £4,085 8s. 4d.; household furniture, &c., £1,260; stock-in-trade, £100; cash at bank, £102 16s. 3d.; book debts, £37 3s. 9d.; total, £5,585 8s. 4d. They were also informed that it was impossible to sever the goodwill from the lease because the goodwill was of no value, as it could not exist apart from the lease, but that without a covenant restricting the vendor from carrying on business the lease would be of less value by £400 to £500. The commissioners called for the production of any assignment of the leasehold premises which might have been executed, and the aforesaid declaration of trust, bearing date the 21st of March, 1895, by which the equitable interest in the leasehold premises became vested in the syndicate, was produced. No part of the consideration was expressed by the declaration of trust as being apportioned to the leasehold premises, and that deed was not stamped with ad valorem duty on £4,085 8s. 4d., but was stamped only with the fixed duty of 10s.

The commissioners were of opinion that, inasmuch as neither the sum of £4,085 8s. 4d. nor any other part of the consideration had been expressed by the declaration of trust to be apportioned to the leasehold premises so as to make that instrument chargable according to its terms with ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale, the whole consideration except the sum of £1,462 16s. 3d., apportioned by clause 2 of the agreement as the consideration for the furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash, was to be regarded as applicable to the other property sold under the agreement, and that the instrument was chargeable under section 59, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891, with ad valorem conveyance duty on £5,585 8s. 4d., less the sum of £1,462 16s. 3d., making the net sum of £4,122 12s. 1d. They accordingly assessed the ad valorem stamp duty of £20 15s. upon the agreement, being the ad valorem duty of 5s. for every £50 of the sum of £4,122 12s. 1d., payable under the head "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891; and they also assessed the fixed duty of 10s. in respect of the agreement for sale of the premises, furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. The instrument was stamped accordingly.

The questions for the opinion of the Divisional Court were (1) whether the instrument was chargeable with the ad valorem duty of £20 15s.; (2) if not, with what amount of ad valorem duty the instrument was chargeable.

The court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.) held that the agreement was not an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest in property within the meaning of section 59, sub-section 1; that as the goodwill was incapable of being severed from the enjoyment of the leasehold premises, the instrument was not an "agreement for the sale of an estate or interest in any property except lands," and was therefore not liable to ad valorem duty upon that part of the consideration attributed to "lease and goodwill," and that it was liable to ad valorem duty upon the amount of the book debts only.

From this decision the Commissioners of Inland Revenue now appealed.

By section 59, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), it is provided that "any contract or agreement made in England or Ireland under seal, or under hand only . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, or for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages . . . or goods, wares, or merchandize . . . shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty, to be paid by the purchaser, as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts appeared for the Crown.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., Spearman, and W. R. Smith appeared for the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the following written judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal by the Crown against a judgment by the Divisional Court which held that the Crown was not entitled to an ad valorem stamp duty under section 59, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), upon an instrument presented by the West London Syndicate to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the 12th section of the Stamp Act of 1891. The grounds upon which the Divisional Court so held were that the instrument carried in to be stamped was not a contract or agreement for the sale of an equitable estate or interest in any property whatever, nor was it a contract or agreement for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except land so as to come within section 59 of the Stamp Act of 1891. It is common ground that that section was passed to saddle with a stamp duty at the earliest possible moment contracts and agreements which came within the section so that the Crown should not have to wait for its duty until a more formal document might be executed, and if not executed be deprived of the duty altogether, which was found to be the case under the provisions of the older Stamp Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97). The commissioners held that the instrument in question was liable to a stamp duty within section 59 of the Act of 1891, and assessed the duty payable thereon, but stated a case for the opinion of the court.

The first question which arises is whether the instrument is a contract or agreement for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever. The instrument will be found set out in the case stated by the commissioners. [The Lord Justice stated the terms of the contract of the 19th of March, 1895, and proceeded:] Now, taking this instrument of the 19th of March, 1895, itself, which was the instrument taken in to be stamped, and which the commissioners hold is the instrument to be stamped with an ad valorem duty, does the option given by clause 6 to the purchasers (the syndicate) to take a declaration of trust, if so minded, instead of a conveyance of a legal interest, constitute a contract or agreement for "the sale of an equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever?"

It will be seen that apart from the option the document is a contract to convey a legal and not an equitable interest. The purchasers were under no obligation to take a declaration of trust. They had not contracted that they would do so, and to constitute a contract or agreement within the meaning of the section there must be, as it seems to me, correlative obligations on each side—on the one to sell and on the other to purchase, and as there is in this case no obligation upon the side of the purchasers to take a declaration of trust, for they might or might not do so just as they pleased, in my judgment the instrument of the 19th of March, 1895, is not a contract or agreement for the sale of any equitable interest whatsoever within the section.

It was argued for the Crown that at the time the document of the 19th of March, 1895, was taken in to the commissioners, inasmuch as the purchasers had by then taken a declaration of trust, this fact converted the document of the 19th of March, 1895, into a contract or agreement for the sale of an equitable interest; but in my opinion this is not so, for the question, as it appears to me, is, what was the document of the 19th of March when it was signed, which was the document which had to be stamped? I agree with what my brother Channell has said as to this, and I think this point taken by the Crown cannot be maintained. My brother Rigby draws the inference outside the documents that the intention of the parties was to merely take an equitable interest, but I would rather not found my judgment upon this.

I now come to the second question, which is whether the goodwill, which was agreed to be sold and purchased by the instrument of the 19th of March, 1895, was a "sale of property other than land." That goodwill is property within the meaning of the Stamp Acts is clear (see the case of Potter v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 W. R. 561, 10 Exch. 147). It is also clear that goodwill is not land. Goodwill, therefore, primâ facie comes within the express terms of section 59 of the Act of 1891 as being "property other than land," and so far the Crown makes out its case. But it was thus argued for the respondents, the purchasers. They say that Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Ex parte Punnett, In re Kitchen, 29 W. R. 129, 16 Ch. D. 226, held that upon the sale of a public-house the goodwill of the public-house passes with the public-house, for the goodwill is the mere habit of the customers resorting to the house. It is said that goodwill in this case is therefore nothing but the enhancement of the value of the premises agreed to be sold, and cannot be, and is not, property apart from such premises. I do not agree in this, for in my opinion goodwill is as capable of being sold as a separate entity for what it is worth, and is the tenant's interest in the lease. It may be that by the terms of a lease each must be sold, if sold at all, to the same person, but that does not prevent them being sold as separate and distinct entities, and if so sold, goodwill, in my judgment, is property, and is clearly not land. Now, in this case the parties, by the instrument of the 19th of March, 1895, have expressly sold, as it appears to me, the goodwill, licences, and contracts relating thereto, separate and apart from the lease and the other entities contracted to be sold. If the intention of the parties is the governing factor in this case, have not the parties declared what was their intention upon the face of the instrument by agreeing to sell and to purchase the different matters as separate and distinct entities, and especially the goodwill and full benefit of the licences and of all contracts, engagements, and privileges to which the vendor was entitled in relation thereto, separate and apart from the lease? It is true that the different entities are agreed to be bought and sold for the lump sum of £5,585, out of which the sum of £1,462 was allocated to the furniture, stock-in-trade, cash, and book debts. It would seem upon looking at the declaration of trust, in which no value was put upon the lease, that the goodwill was the thing of value, and not the lease; but, however this is, I do not see how it can be said that in this case the goodwill was not property contracted and agreed to be separately sold by the vendor to the vendee so far as the vendor's interest extended therein, and, if so, this property clearly is not land. It cannot, in my judgment, be truly said that the goodwill in this case is merely an enhancement of the value of land and nothing more, and is sold as part and parcel of the lease so as to be land. It is alleged by the learned counsel for the Crown that this goodwill was worth £4,250, and the lease was worth nothing. They seek to adduce this from what the syndicate have not done, I mean by not putting any value upon the lease in the declaration of trust.

I think that the Crown is right in saying that the goodwill in this case is property other than land, and I see no reason to think that the value assessed by the commissioners thereon is not correct, and inasmuch as before this case was even argued in the Divisional Court, a conveyance of the legal interest in the property sold had been executed and stamped with the identical ad valorem stamp duty which the counsel for the Crown are now contending should have been affixed to the agreement of the 19th of March, 1895, the point as to the exact value of the goodwill appears to me to be of no practical importance.

In my judgment, the Crown succeeds upon the appeal, which must be allowed, and the Crown must have costs here and below.

RIGBY, L.J.—This was an appeal of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against an order of the Queen's Bench Division, dated the 15th day of December, 1897, assessing the ad valorem duty payable under section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, on a certain instrument dated the 19th of March, 1895, made between one Percy Thorne of the one part, and the West London Syndicate (Limited), hereinafter called the syndicate, of the other part, at the amount payable on £37 3s. 9d., the value of certain debts hereinafter more particularly mentioned. Under section 12 of the Act the commissioners were required and bound to express their opinion, with reference to this instrument, upon the question with what amount of duty it was chargeable. The requisition was not made until nearly two years after the execution of the instrument—that is to say, in January, 1897. The document of the 19th of March, 1895, is very special, and many of its terms require close consideration. The surrounding circumstances are also very special and unusual. From the recitals it appears, amongst other things, that the syndicate had, with the privity and consent of the vendor, been acting as proprietors of the hotel and premises and property dealt with in the instrument from a time not defined in the recital, but shown by clause 8 in the instrument to have begun with the 17th of November, 1896 (say, a period of four months), and that the business thereof had been carried on by it (that is to say, the syndicate) with moneys advanced by the vendor in anticipation of the completion and by way of payments in advance for certain debentures agreed to be subscribed, such moneys so advanced amounting to £2,000. The hotel dealt with was No. 11, Clifford-street, New Bond-street, and was known as Fischer's Hotel.

By clause 1 of the instrument the vendor was to sell and the syndicate was to purchase, first, the goodwill of the business of an hotel proprietor and licensed victualler carried on by the vendor, and the full benefit of all victualler's and other licences, and of all contracts and engagements and privileges to which the vendor was entitled in relation thereto; secondly, the two leases of the hotel, particularly described for terms making together a term of twenty-one years from Christmas, 1894, subject to the yearly rent of £964. Then, under the heads thirdly, fourthly, and fifthly, follow particulars of furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash (in respect of which no ad valorem duty would be payable), and under head sixthly certain book debts estimated at the value of £37 3s. 9d. By clause 2 the consideration for the sale of the whole of the particulars mentioned was stated to be the satisfaction by the syndicate of the debts and liabilities of the vendor (the amount of which was not mentioned on the face of the instrument, but was stated by the solicitor to the syndicate, in answer to an inquiry by the commissioners, to be £1,335 8s. 4d.) and the sum of £4,250, of which sum £1,462 16s. 3d. was represented to be the apportioned consideration for the furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. No other apportionment of the consideration was shown by the instrument. Clauses 3 and 4 were appropriate clauses for the sale of the legal interest in the leases. By clause 5 it was provided that the purchase should be completed on the 23rd of March (four days after the date of the instrument), on which day the purchase-money was to be paid and satisfied. Clause 6 was as follows: "The leasehold premises hereby agreed to be sold being only assignable with the consent of the landlords from whom the same are held, the vendor shall use his best endeavours to obtain the requisite consent for the assignment thereof to the syndicate or their assigns, and in the event of such consent not being obtained the vendor shall, at the option of the syndicate, execute a declaration of trust of the said leasehold premises in its favour." Clause 7 gave the syndicate an option of satisfying £3,000, part of the £4,250 cash purchase consideration, by the issue to the vendor of 120 debentures of £25 each, and the balance of £1,250 was to be satisfied by the issue to him or his nominees of 1,250 shares of £1 each to be numbered 8 to 1,257 inclusive (obviously following on the 7 allotted to the subscribers to the memorandum of association). The debentures were to form part of the total issue of 200 debentures of £25 each, ranging pari passu as a first charge on the syndicate's undertaking. By clause 8 the syndicate was from the 17th of November to be deemed to have had possession of the hotel premises and property and to have carried on the business, and were accordingly to indemnify the vendor against all expenses and liabilities incurred in the course of so carrying on the same. By clause 10 the syndicate were to issue the balance of the debentures provided for in clause 7 and in discharge of the sum of £2,000 advanced by the vendor to the syndicate, and the vendor agreed to accept such debentures in satisfaction and discharge of such £2,000.

The material provisions of the instrument being as above set forth, the commissioners were entitled under sub-section 2 of section 12 to be furnished with such evidence as they might deem necessary in order to show to their satisfaction whether all the facts and circumstances affecting the liability of the instrument to the amount of duty chargeable thereon were fully and truly set forth therein.

The commissioners, under the power so given, obtained from the solicitors to the syndicate, in answer to inquiries made by them, information to the effect that the whole consideration for the contract consisted of debts and liabilities to the amount of £1,335 8s. 4d., making with the sum of £4,250 mentioned in the contract a total consideration of £5,585 8s. 4d.; deducting from which £1,462 16s. 3d. apportioned in respect of items on which ad valorem duty was chargeable, and £37 3s. 9d. the value of the book debts, there was left as consideration for the only remaining items—viz., the lease and goodwill—a sum of £4,085 8s. 4d., as to which no apportionment was attempted to be made.

It was indeed alleged on behalf of the syndicate that it was quite impossible to sever the goodwill from the lease itself, because the goodwill was considered to be of no value as it could not exist apart from the lease, but it was at the same time stated that without a covenant to restrict the vendor from carrying on business the lease would be of less value from £400 to £500. The commissioners called for the production of any assignment of the leasehold premises, and the declaration of trust dated two days after the execution of the instrument of the 19th of March, 1895, was produced, whereby it was declared that Percy Thorne, his executors and administrators, should henceforth stand seised of and interested in the hotel and premises in trust for the syndicate, and the syndicate covenanted thereafter to pay the rent reserved by the existing indentures of lease and observe and perform the covenants therein and to indemnify the said Percy Thorne in respect of any breach. The declaration of trust contained a recital: "And whereas the said leases contain certain covenants which preclude the said Percy Thorne from underletting the premises without the consent in writing of the lessor, and it is not deemed expedient at the present time to apply for such consent." After the declaration of trust Percy Thorne had nothing left in him but the bare legal estate in the leasehold property. The commissioners were of opinion that, inasmuch as no part of the consideration had been expressed by the declaration of trust to be apportioned to the leasehold premises, so as to make that instrument chargeable with ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale, the whole consideration except the £1,462 16s. 3d. apportioned by clause 2 of the instrument was to be regarded as applicable to the other property sold. They therefore expressed the opinion that the instrument was chargeable under section 59 sub-section (1) of the Act with ad valorem conveyance duty on the whole consideration of £5,585 8s. 4d. less £1,462 16s. 3d., or £4,122 12s. 1d., and assessed the ad valorem duty on that sum, which at the rate of 5s. for every £50 amounted to £20 15s.

Under section 13 (1) of the Act, any person dissatisfied with the assessment of the commissioners may, within twenty-one days after the date of the assessment, and on payment of duty in conformity therewith, appeal against the assessment to the High Court, and may for that purpose require the commissioners to state and sign a case setting forth the questions upon which their opinion was required. The syndicate, in accordance with the terms of the section, in due time paid the duty of £20 15s., and required the commissioners to state a case. This was done, and the case stated set forth the facts as hereinbefore noticed, and made copies of the instrument of the 19th of March and the declaration of trust of the 21st of March part of the case. The questions for the opinion of the court were: First, whether the instrument is chargeable with the ad valorem duty of £20 15s., in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; and, second, if not, with what amount of ad valorem duty the instrument is chargeable.

Under section 13 (2) of the Act the duty of the court is upon the hearing of the case to determine the questions submitted, and if the instrument in question is in the opinion of the court chargeable with any duty, to assess the duty with which it is chargeable. Sub-sections 4 and 5 of the same section provide for the repayment of any excess of duty and for costs in the alternative events of the commissioners' assessment being held to be erroneous or confirmed.

By an order dated the 15th of December, 1897, the court of Queen's Bench expressed the opinion that the assessment of the commissioners was erroneous, and that the said instrument was chargeable with ad valorem conveyance duty on the amount of the book debts only (amounting as hereinbefore appears to £37 3s. 9d.), and reversed the decision of the commissioners and ordered that any excess of duty paid by the appellants should be returned to them by the respondents, and ordered the costs of the appellants to be paid by the respondent. During the argument before the Court of Queen's Bench it was stated that at some time after the decision of the commissioners an assignment of the legal estate in the leasehold had been executed to the syndicate or their nominees, and stamped with an ad valorem duty of £20 15s., the amount assessed by the commissioners on the instrument of the 19th of March, 1895.

Against this decision the commissioners appealed, and the court has now to determine whether the assessment of the Court of Queen's Bench is right, and, if not, has to assess the amount of ad valorem duty payable.

Two main points were argued on the appeal to this court, and apparently in the court below. (1) Whether the contract on the face of it was a contract for the sale of the equitable interest in leaseholds; (2) whether the goodwill was property in respect of which ad valorem duty should be charged apart from the leaseholds. Both points were decided in the court below against the commissioners. As to the first point, I am not disposed to differ from the decision of the court below so long as attention is confined to the language of the instrument itself. The only clause relied upon as showing that the contract was for the sale of an equitable interest was clause 6, and that clause does not throw any obligation upon the syndicate to accept a declaration of trust in lieu of a legal assignment, but only gives them an option. On the face of the instrument, therefore, the only contract is for the sale of the legal interest. But regard must be had not only to what the parties have said but to what they actually meant. It is incumbent on the syndicate to show that all the facts and circumstances affecting the liability of the instrument as to duty and the amount of duty chargeable thereon, are fully and truly set forth therein, and if from the facts made known to the commissioners the proper inference is that the real bargain was a bargain for the sale of the equitable interest only, then the instrument ought to be charged with the amount assessed by the commissioners.

Now, in my judgment, the facts do lead to this inference. Bearing in mind that the syndicate had an opportunity of explaining any circumstances which might affect the liability to duty, let us see what the facts are which alone were before the commissioners. First, for four months the hotel had been in the possession of the syndicate, and the business had been carried on by them by means of money, to the amount of £2,000, supplied by the vendor. This sum could not be recovered as a debt but only satisfied by an issue of debentures to the same amount by the syndicate unless the syndicate purchased the hotel. Such debentures as were required by the contract could not be issued, for they were to be a first charge on the undertaking which, independently of the hotel, had no property. Apparently no shares had been issued except the seven, the minimum number required to be subscribed by the subscribers to the memorandum of association. During the four months it is clear that the lessor had not been approached with reference to giving assent to an assignment, and yet four days only were allowed for obtaining that assent and enabling the syndicate to obtain the option purported to be given by clause 6. It is a plain inference from the facts appearing that the syndicate had no cash wherewith to pay in cash the consideration of £3,000 which they had an option of paying in cash. During the same four days therefore the debentures for £5,000 and the shares for £1,250 would have to be issued, and it would have been a very unbusinesslike arrangement to go to the expense of preparing those debentures whilst there could be any reasonable doubt as to the contract going through.

From these circumstances alone an inference might arise that there was no real intention on either side to follow out the requirements of clause 6, but, as I have said, I do not on the question of construction feel that such an inference could be acted upon.

But the matter by no means ends there. Within two days after the 19th of March the contract had been completed on the basis of the syndicate accepting an equitable title. The recital in the declaration of trust shows that it was not then expedient to apply for the consent of the lessor. When was this conclusion arrived at? If it arose from any change of circumstances or change of intention happening after the execution of the instrument of the 19th of March it would have been easy for the syndicate to show such change, but nothing of the kind was suggested. It is not difficult to see why the limited company without capital should hesitate to ask a lessor to accept them as tenants, but this state of things had not arisen suddenly, and was not likely to be altered in a couple of days. I have said that the contract was completed by the 21st of March. According to any reasonable or business-like method of procedure that must have been so, for a vendor who had not been paid or satisfied his purchase-money would never have executed the unqualified declaration of trust actually executed on the 21st of March, the clear effect of which is to represent him as a bare trustee only of the legal estate. Some notice surely would have been taken of the obligation to pay or satisfy purchase-money if any such obligation existed, and the obligation to satisfy the advance, amounting to £2,000, which could be satisfied in no other way than by issuing debentures, would certainly, I should infer, have been mentioned if it had not been already satisfied. The fair inference, again, is that all the debentures had already been issued before the execution of the declaration of trust. To be issued they must have been prepared, and it seems to me to be unreasonable to suppose that all that would have been done in a period of two days. The inevitable inference appears to me to be that it was agreed before or simultaneously with the execution of the 19th of March instrument that an equitable interest should be taken in place of a legal assignment of the leases, and that the declaration of trust of the 21st of March must be taken as part of one transaction with the contract of the 19th of March. If in any way the inference arising from the facts before the commissioners is inconsistent with the true facts, that is the fault of the syndicate for leaving matters to be dealt with on a partial and imperfect statement. If the above conclusion is correct, it is unnecessary to go into the question as to the goodwill; but in my judgment the commissioners were right in their view in regard to this. The question is one of considerable importance as to the meaning and operation of the 59th section. The policy of that section is to charge immediately with duty an agreement for the sale of any property except land. If this can be evaded by joining in one agreement for sale, at a lump sum, property not land with land, and throwing upon the commissioners the difficulty, which may be well-nigh insoluble by them, of determining what shall be apportioned to each sort of property, a serious blow will be struck at the operation of the section.

As to the particular case before us, where the goodwill of the business and the lease of the premises on which it is carried on are the two items which are sold at a lump sum, it will be convenient to deal first with the question whether any part of the lump sum is to be attributable to the goodwill, and in the second place with the amount, if any, to be so attributed. Goodwill is certainly properly within the meaning of section 59, and any interest in goodwill must equally be property. It is to me exceedingly difficult to see how in any case goodwill can be lands, tenements, or hereditaments within the meaning of the exception, even if inseparably connected with land. Supposing such a case possible, it is not like fixtures attached to the soil so as to be part of the land; but some part, at any rate, must be severable. Upon that I refer to the definition of goodwill given by Wood, V.C., in Churton v. Douglas, 7 W. R. 365, 1 Joh. 174, approved apparently by Lord Herschell in Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225. [1896] A. C. 7. In this particular case a great part of the goodwill might, and probably did, arise from the name—some part of it certainly did. A West-end hotel does not depend for its customers upon chance passers-by, but to a great extent upon visitors to London, who engage their rooms beforehand. Many of them choose their hotel upon the recommendation of friends who have stayed in the hotel, and it would be by the name "Fischer's Hotel" that it would be recommended. Such a goodwill cannot be said to be in law inseparable from the house where the business is for the time being carried on, whatever the practical difficulty of separation in a given case. A great part of it would last on if the business were transferred to next door. It would be as unlikely that customers would attach importance to the question whether the hotel were at 11 or 12, Clifford-street, as in the case of Churton v. Douglas it would have been to say that the customers would have had a preference for Fleet-street over the Strand as the place where the wholesale business was carried on. Then I refer to the observations of Wood, V.C., in Churton v. Douglas, and Lord Herschell's comment thereon in Trego v. Hunt, [1896] A. C. at p. 17. It is not sufficient to say that in the particular case the business could not be removed without the consent of the lessor. His consent might be purchased, and the transfer of the goodwill of the existing business during twenty-one years might be a good step towards the removal of the business. But there is in any transfer of goodwill a personal element involved, and for anything that is shown to the contrary the personal connection of the vendor in this case may have been very great and must be assumed to have been of some value. If the lease alone had been dealt with the vendor might after the sale have solicited the customers who had been in the habit of staying at the hotel to transfer to him their custom at another hotel. The goodwill having been agreed to be transferred the vendor could not do this: Trego v. Hunt. This seems to be conclusive on the question whether there is not some independent value to be attributed to the goodwill. Additional rights bargained for, must be supposed worth bargaining for. The part of the goodwill now being dealt with is not only separable from, but has no connection with, the lease of the hotel. It depends upon an implied contract and cannot, as I think, in any concievable way be treated as land within the meaning of the exception. It is of the same nature as the supposed covenant not to carry on business elsewhere mentioned in the cases, the absence of which, by the admission of the syndicate's solicitor, would reduce the value of the lease itself by £400 to £500.

It seems to me, therefore, that it is impossible to say that the agreement to transfer the goodwill does not include something over and beyond the lease itself. What the value of that something may be is a very different and very difficult question, but the difficulty is created by the parties to the instrument who have not chosen to apportion in the instrument itself the total consideration. I do not think the commissioners could properly have come to a different conclusion from that which they actually arrived at. The only suggestion made by the syndicate is that nothing is to be apportioned to the goodwill. It is upon that that they take their stand. That contention, for reasons above appearing, I think untenable. Assuming that contention to be ruled out, they in fact leave the commissioners to find out for themselves the proper amount to be apportioned. I think that the commissioners had no information furnished to them which would have enabled them to apportion the consideration between lease and goodwill according to their values. I think that they were entitled to say: It is for you, the syndicate, to show what part of the whole consideration is to be thrown upon the lease.

But are there not primâ facie grounds for the c nclusion even if no presumption arises? Under the circumstances we find that the goodwill of the business is not only dealt with separately from the lease but is put in the forefront — that is to say, before the lease—in the order of enumeration of the parcels. This might be a small matter if there were not other considerations tending to enhance the importance of the goodwill; but such considerations are not wanting. The business had really been carried on for the syndicate during four months and the sum of £2,000 invested in it through the vendor. Where the goodwill and business and the lease for twenty-one years of an hotel in the West End of London, carried on at a house rented at £964, are only treated as worth together a little over £4,000, it is not an unfair inference that the lease of the house without the goodwill of the business would hardly be worth the rent. But what seems to me an important consideration is that the parties themselves, by the declaration of trust, have so treated and dealt with the leases as to affirm in substance that no ad valorem duty was to be paid in respect thereof, and therefore no part of the consideration is specifically appropriated to them. If my inference of facts set forth in the discussion as to the first point is well founded, then the declaration of trust is an actually contemporaneous document in the sense of being part of one and the same transaction; but, apart from that, I think the commissioners had a right to infer from it, and from the fact that for nearly two years no other conveyance had been executed, that the intention of the parties, or, at least, the effect of what they did, was to concentrate. as it were, the whole ad valorem duty upon the goodwill and book debts and attribute no part to the leases. In this way the parties have solved the difficulty which they themselves have raised.

Some point has been made of the alleged stamping, after the assessment by the commissioners, of an assignment of the lease with the full ad valorem duty. This was an entirely voluntary act of the syndicate, and can have no effect upon the question whether the commissioners were right or wrong upon the facts as they existed when they made their assessment. The court below has held them wrong, and given costs against them on that ground. It is now our duty to review that decision, and to determine whether the assessment was not right.

In my judgment we ought to say that the commissioners were right; that the opinion of the court below ought to be reversed; the assessment of the commissioners supported; the costs paid by the commissioners under the order of the court below returned; and the costs of the commissioners here and below ordered to be paid by the syndicate.

I should like to add one word on a possible misconception of the Act. Any apportionment to affect the question of duty under section 59, must be a bonâ fide one. I do not think that an arbitrary apportionment would avail anyone under this section. If so the section would be absolutely worthless. It must be a genuine, bonâ fide apportionment.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have the misfortune to differ from the other members of the court, A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ. I agree with the decision of the Divisional Court, and adopt entirely the reasoning of Channell, J.

With regard to the question whether the instrument in question was a contract or agreement for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, I am of opinion that it was not. I think that it was plainly only a contract for the sale of a legal interest, and that the option given to the purchasers, which they were not bound to exercise, to call for a declaration of trust in the event of the landlord's consent to a legal assignment not being obtained, does not convert the instrument into a contract for the sale of an equitable estate or interest. The purchasers, in the event of the vendor's failing to obtain the landlord's assent, and being unable to convey a legal estate, could, if they had chosen, have treated the contract to purchase as at an end. As I understand, both my brothers take this view if only the words of the instrument are looked at; but Rigby, L.J., is of opinion that, if the facts made known to the commissioners are looked at, the proper inference is that the real bargain made, was a bargain for the sale of the equitable interest only, and A. L. Smith, L.J., although he does not base his judgment on this inference, is not prepared to say that the inference may not properly be drawn. I think that we have no right to draw any such inference. I do not understand Rigby, L.J., to infer that the instrument was drawn in the shape in which it was drawn for the purpose of concealing the true nature of the transaction and thus evading the duty, nor do I see any fact communicated to the commissioners justifying such an inference. I rather understand Rigby, L.J., merely to infer as a fact that notwithstanding the form and words of the instrument, the parties to the instrument must be taken to have meant a bargain different from that which they have expressed, and he draws this inference from the conduct of the parties antecedent and subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and from the relative dates of the execution of the instrument and the declaration of trust, and all the various acts done or omitted to be done by the parties.

Is this inference as to the true meaning of the parties such that it would follow that the vendor could have compelled the purchasers to accept the declaration of trust as a performance of the contract contained in the instrument? It seems to me impossible to draw such an inference as between the parties; and if such an inference cannot be drawn as between the parties, I do not see what right the commissioners have to treat the instrument otherwise than in accordance with its meaning inter parties.

The fact that the purchasers had embarked a large sum of money in the business which they might probably lose if they did not exercise the option to take a declaration of trust, and the fact that they did take the declaration of trust within four days of the execution of the instrument, may lead to the inference that it was extremely improbable that the purchasers would refrain from taking the declaration of trust in case the landlord's consent to the assignment of the lease could not be obtained immediately; but I cannot see how these facts can justify the inference that the purchasers meant by the bargain to bind themselves to take a declaration of trust as performance of the contract, in case the vendor being unable to get the landlord's consent, should call on them so to do.

As to the second question which arises in this case—viz., whether the instrument was a contract or agreement for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, or heritages, this depends on whether the goodwill, which was, by a separate clause, included in that which was agreed to be sold and purchased by this instrument, was sold and purchased as land — that is, as something merely enhancing the value of the land and inseparable from it, or whether it was sold and purchased as property other than land. There can be no doubt that the goodwill may be so inseparably connected with land—e.g., with a particular house, as to pass under a conveyance of land, or be a subject of agreement for the sale of land. Lindley, L.J., on p. 441 in his book on Partnership, 6th ed., says: "It" (goodwill) "may have no value except in connection with a particular house, and may be so inseparably connected with it as to pass with it under a will or deed without being specially mentioned." It seems to me that the goodwill which was the subject of this contract was of that nature, for the goodwill in question was the goodwill of an hotel, and the hotel was leased to the vendor, and the lease was included in the sale, and by the terms of the lease the business could not be removed from the house demised without the consent of the landlord. At the time of the sale, therefore, the vendor could not so sell the goodwill as to be enjoyed apart from the hotel, the subject of the lease. The goodwill was made inseparable by the very terms of the lease, the subject of the sale. The goodwill did not belong to the vendor, so that he could sell it apart from the lease. It was part of the reversion of the landlord: see Edwards v. Edwards, 1 Jurist, 654. This is the fact in the present case; and, moreover, the goodwill of a leasehold public-house has generally been treated as part and parcel of the demised premises. Thus, in Ex parte Punnett, In re Kitchen, the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel), speaking of leasehold premises comprising the Pelican Hotel, Southwark, says: "It is quite plain that the goodwill of a public-house passes with the public-house," and in Potter v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in which case the court held that the assignment by deed by a retiring partner in a paper-making business of his share of the goodwill for the sum of £13,778 was an assignment of property liable to ad valorem duty under 13 & 14 Vict., c. 97, Pollock, C.B., in delivering judgment, says "the trade or goodwill of a trade sometimes enhances the value of real property, as a well-accustomed tavern or shop will, on account of the habit of persons to frequent it, sell for much more, and the duty on the conveyance of the place where the business is carried on ought pro tanto to be augmented; and very frequently the goodwill of a business or position, without any interest in land connected with it, is made the subject of sale though there is nothing tangible in it. It is merely the advantage of the recommendation of the vendor to his connections and his agreeing to abstain from all competition with the vendee." This case shows that although a goodwill may for the purpose of conveyance be separated from realty—for instance, where the outgoing partner sells his interest or share in the goodwill to the continuing partners who continue owners of the house to which the goodwill is attached, and if it is so separated it would be liable under 13 & 14 Vict. to duty as property—yet if it is not so separated it will be treated, on a sale of the premises where the business is carried on, as something enhancing the value of the realty, and pro tanto augmenting the duty on a conveyance of the place where the business is carried on. Lindley, L.J., in the case of The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Angus and Lewis, 38 W. R. 3, 23, Q. B. D. 579, says: "Upon a conveyance of a goodwill of a business the instrument should be stamped with an ad valorem stamp" (i.e., as a conveyance of property under 13 & 14 Vict.). I understand Potter v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue to mean that where real estate and the goodwill connected with it are conveyed by separate deeds, they are both liable to ad valorem duty. Cotton, L.J., in Cooper v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 32 W. R. 709, 25 Ch. D. 472, at p. 729, says: "But really goodwill is a word of which few people understand the meaning. It is obvious that there are certain kinds of goodwill to which a mortgagee will be entitled. The goodwill which attaches to a particular house increases the value of that house, and therefore the mortgagee is entitled to that. If, for instance, there is a well-known public-house, and, from its position being well known, people frequent it, the goodwill attaches to the house and adds to its value. But there may be other kinds of goodwill attaching to personal reputation which a man has made for himself. Of course that does not go to the mortgagee of the house, but is a thing personal to the man whose skill and whose name have acquired that goodwill." These authorities seem to me to show that, while a goodwill may be conveyed, or subject to an agreement for sale, as land, a goodwill may be sold separately from the land; and no doubt the goodwill in many cases can be and is separately sold, and no doubt in such a case the sale would be treated under section 59 of 54 & 55 Vict. c. 39, as a contract for sale of an interest in property except lands; but I do not think one ought so to treat a contract for the sale of the goodwill of a business carried on in a leasehold hotel under a lease which makes the business inseparable from the demised premises, where the sale includes an assignment of the lease, unless you can find in the contract a clear intention to separate the goodwill from the leasehold premises, and to treat it otherwise than as something attached to the leasehold hotel enhancing its value. I do not say that it is impossible to infer such an intention in the case of the goodwill of such a leasehold with a covenant not to carry on the business elsewhere, but I do say that in such a case you ought not to draw such an inference without very strong words and something much stronger than merely cataloguing the items of sale; and especially is this so in a case where there is only one single agreement and one undivided consideration for the purchase of hotel and goodwill, and a separate consideration for the chattels. At all events you must construe the contract for sale and ascertain, having regard to the words and to the subject-matter of the sale, what the intention of the instrument is, and whether or not the parties thereto must be taken to have intended a separate sale of the goodwill.

Now, looking at this instrument, was it the intention to agree to sell the goodwill as something separate from the hotel? It is urged on behalf of the Crown that the agreement is to sell—"Firstly, the goodwill of the business of an hotel proprietor and licensed victualler carried on by the vendor upon the premises thereinafter mentioned, and the full benefit of the victualler's and other licences and of all contracts, engagements, and privileges to which the vendor is entitled in relation thereto," and it is said that this is a separate agreement for the sale of the goodwill, just as much as if it had been a sale by a separate instrument. But, on the other side, it is urged that there is, in fact, only one instrument, and that that instrument includes the sale of the lease of the premises in which the business is carried on, the goodwill of which is sold, and that, by the terms of the lease the business cannot be carried on elsewhere than on the demised premises, and that inasmuch as the goodwill cannot be enjoyed separately from the demised premises, and the goodwill of an hotel is in its nature a mere enhancement of the value of the demised realty, it could not have been the intention of the parties to the instrument to sell and buy respectively the goodwill separately from the hotel, and that one must not, for the purpose of the revenue laws, construe the instrument in a manner manifestly inconsistent with the intention of the parties. It seems to me that there is force in this argument. Suppose a lease of a factory and a covenant that at the termination of the tenancy the tenant shall give up the premises and all fixed machinery whether affixed to freehold by landlord or tenant, and a sale by the tenant which specified (a) the fixed machinery, (b) the lease—could it be said that because of the form of sale the machinery affixed to the freehold ceased to be land or part of the freehold? Suppose again this very purchaser had died after making a will leaving his leasehold to A. B., and the residue of his property to C. D., could it have been held that the goodwill of this property passed to the residuary legatee? Can one find in this instrument any indication anywhere that the parties intended to sever the goodwill from the hotel? If not, for what possible purpose can it be said that the parties intended a separate sale of the goodwill? The purchaser, who, it is said, must be taken to have agreed to purchase the goodwill separately from the hotel, could not deal with or enjoy the goodwill separately from the hotel. The vendor, who, it is said, must be taken to have sold the goodwill separately from the hotel, had no power to sever the business from the hotel.

It is further to be observed that one finds in the contract of sale no separate prices of the hotel and the goodwill of the business carried on on the demised premises, and the goodwill sold is in terms the goodwill of the business carried on by the vendor on the demised premises. The same thing is true of the licences, for a mortgage of a leasehold public-house with the goodwill of the business there carried on gives the mortgagee a right to the transfer of the licences: see Rutter v. Daniel, 30 W. R. 724, 46 L. T. Rep. 684, in the Court of Appeal, affirming the same case, 30 W. R. 801.

Many cases have arisen with reference to the question whether a sale of fixtures comprised in an instrument, including the sale of a house or the lease of a house, is to be treated as a separate assurance of the fixtures, and the test applied has always been, Did the instrument show the intention to sever the fixtures—an intention, that is, that the mortgagee should have the power of selling or otherwise dealing with the fixtures separately from the house: see Ex parte Barclay. In re Joyce, 22 W. R. 608, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 576; Ex parte Daglish, In re Wilde, 21 W. R. 893, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1072; Bachellor v. Yates, 36 W. R. 563, 38 Ch. 112. In that last case in the judgment of Bowen, L.J., some observations are made which are worth looking at, because he speculates upon the case of separate subject-matters, mentioning chimneys in a conveyance of realty: Brooke v. Brooke, [1894] 2 Ch. 600, 43 W. R. Dig. 67, 121; Small v. The National Provincial Bank, 42 W. R. 378, [1894] 1 Ch. 686. The present case is not a mortgage, but a sale, which, of course, is very different from a mortgage, but the ultimate question to be answered in each case is the same—does the instrument show that there is an intention that there should be a separate assurance? and the answer is Yes or No, according as the conclusion in each case is that the parties to the instrument did or did not intend that the goodwill or the share of the goodwill should in fact be dealt with separately. In Potter's case this test is not applied because the fact was that the outgoing partner was assigning to the continuing partners, the owners of the house to which the goodwill attached, and it was unnecessary therefore to find other evidence of the intention to separately convey the goodwill. But in the present case I can find no fact from which one can infer an intention to deal with the goodwill separately from the hotel, and no reason why the parties should wish to deal with the goodwill separately from the hotel, and every reason why they should wish not to do so.

Finally, I do not see how one can adopt the view of the Crown either on the first question or on the second question without imputing to the parties to the instrument intentions quite inconsistent with the whole tenor of the instrument and the intention of the parties to be drawn from the instrument itself and the subject-matter of the agreement.

I wish to add that, looking at the words of clause 6 at the end of the case, "that without a covenant restricting the vendor from carrying on business the lease would be of less value by £400 or £500," I thought that, if this meant that there was a restricting covenant of this sort between the vendor and purchaser, this would show that there was a right of property distinct from the leasehold interest assigned, and that in such case the contention of the Crown, apart from the question of the value to be assessed, would be established; but on examination I can find no such covenant, and as to any right to restrain the purchaser carrying on the business of the lease off the demised premises, which would be implied from the acceptance of the assignment of the lease, this implied covenant could be enforced by the landlord as owner of the reversion—that is, could be enforced by the landlord by virtue of the covenants in the original lease against any assignee of that lease.

In re RAILWAY TIME TABLES PUBLISHING CO. WELTON'S CLAIM. (a.)

Company—Contract to issue fully paid shares in satisfaction of debt—Issue of shares not fully paid—Failure of consideration—Right of shareholder, as assignee of the debt, to prove in winding-up—Interest—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29.

Where a company contracts to issue to a creditor a certain number of fully paid shares in satisfaction of a debt due by it to him, and some of the shares are in fact issued as unpaid, there is pro tanto a failure of consideration, and the creditor can, notwithstanding that he has become a member of the company, prove in its winding-up for such part of his debt as is represented by the unpaid shares.

Interest cannot be claimed upon such a debt, except either by contract or by way of damages under section 29 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42.

Appeal from Kekewich J.

In 1890 the Railway Time Tables Publishing Co. (Limited), was indebted to one Henry Hoare in the sum of £13,400, which was secured as to £1,600 by 6 per cent. debentures, and as to £6,240 by 10 per cent. debentures granted by the company. In 1890 the appellant, Thomas Abercrombie Welton, agreed, at the request of Hoare, for whom he acted in matters of business, to allow (amongst other shares) 1,680 preference shares of £5 each in the company to be registered in his name, and the shares were so registered accordingly. Welton had no beneficial interest in those shares, or in the company, his sole connection with it being as nominee of Hoare. The shares, which were issued pursuant to an agreement between the company and Hoare, in part satisfaction of Hoare's debt, were supposed to be issued as fully paid. Debentures to the nominal amount of £5,000 were issued to Hoare in satisfaction of the balance of his debt, and the debentures for £1,600 and £6,240 were surrendered to the company. At that time no part of the principal sums secured by those debentures was due and payable by the company.

In March, 1892, the company went into voluntary liquidation. On the 14th of June, 1893, by an order made in the winding-up, Kekewich, J., settled Welton upon the list of contributories in respect of the 1,680 preference shares. The learned judge proceeded upon the ground that the debentures surrendered to the company were not due and payable by the company at the time of the surrender, and he held that 1,112 of the shares were fully paid, 567 wholly unpaid, and one paid to the extent of £2 10s. In the practical working out of this order it was treated as deciding that 568 shares were wholly unpaid, the liability thus amounting to £2,840. Calls were afterwards made upon the shares, and Welton paid £1,560 upon them. Hoare had become bankrupt, and was unable to indemnify Welton, who applied by summons for leave to prove in the winding up of the company for a sum of £2,840, with interest at 10 per cent. The assets of the company were sufficient to pay all its debts and the cost of the winding-up, and to leave a balance. With reference to Welton's delay in putting forward his claim, it was explained at the bar that it was only after the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Welton v. Saffery, 45 W. R. 508, [1897] A. C. 299, that his liability on the shares registered in his name was finally ascertained. On the 3rd of November, 1897, Hoare's trustee in bankruptcy assigned to Welton the benefit of all claims which Hoare might have against the company, for the amount of the debentures surrendered to the company or otherwise, together with the interest thereon.

Kekewich, J., holding that the question was covered by In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., Benson's case, 36 W. R. 227, 37 Ch. D. 191, dismissed Welton's summons with costs.

Welton appealed.

Eve, Q.C., and Martelli, for the appeal.—In re Government Security Fire Insurance Co., Mudford's Claim, 28 W. R. 670, 14 Ch. D. 634, and In re Great Australian Gold Mining Co., Ex parte Appleyard, 30 W. R. 147, 18 Ch. D. 587, govern this case. Those cases are not inconsistent with Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317, and In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., Benson's case, 36 W. R. 227, 37 Ch. D. 191, 203, except so far as they decide that a member of a company as such can sue the company; and that is not what Welton is here claiming to do.

Renshaw, Q.C. (F. Whinney with him), for the liquidator.—There was not a total failure of consideration for the surrender of the debentures, and therefore the case cannot be treated as one of failure of consideration: Harris v. Venables, 20 W. R. 974, L. R. 7 Ex. 235, 240. The claim is altogether out of time.

Eve, Q.C., in reply.—[He was asked to address himself only to the question of interest.] Kekewich, J., left the surrendered debentures quite out of account because they were not payable at once. We claim interest at 10 per cent., or at least at 6 per cent., because those were the rates of interest payable on the debentures which we surrendered.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that, when the facts of this case are really understood, there is much difficulty in seeing what the rights of the parties are. I do not wish to make any further observations on Mudford's Claim and Ex parte Appleyard than I have made before, in In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., Benson's case, and I do not think that there is any difficulty in applying the law to the facts of the present case. Let us see what the law is. Here is a company being wound up—I am going to state the facts in my own way—and here is a claimant, Mr. Hoare, who was a creditor for £13,400. Of that sum of £13,400 there was a professed payment, which, if really a payment in full, was a satisfaction of the debt. It was not a payment in money, but what we may call an accord and satisfaction; and part of what was given in satisfaction was a certain number of fully paid up preference shares. I say fully paid shares because that is obviously what the transaction was intended to be. Now, it so happens that instead of really getting 1,680 fully paid preference shares he got only 1,112. What, then, is the consequence of that fact? In my opinion the consequence is that, to the extent of £2,840 he has really never been paid at all. The question which we have now to consider is, Is there any reason why he should not prove against this company for that unpaid balance? Supposing that Hoare had not become bankrupt, and that there had been no assignment by him to Welton, so that Welton would have been altogether out of the case; then, subject to the question what is the effect of the fact that Hoare's claim is made after the 20th of July, 1892, the day fixed for sending in claims, and after the master's certificate of debts has been made—subject to that, I should have thought that there was no answer at all to his claim to prove against the existing assets in the liquidator's hands. I do not see any answer at all to it. Let us look at the answer suggested on behalf of the liquidator. The answer given is this: that Mr. Welton is the assignee of Mr. Hoare's claim; and that therefore, by reason of the provisions in the Companies Act, 1862, which prevent people from proving against a company in competition with their own creditors, Mr. Welton, as a member of the company, has no right to prove in respect of Hoare's claim. Now, is that true? Where is the statutory enactment, or the principle of law, which compels us to ignore the facts of this case and to hold that because Mr. Welton is a member of this company he cannot be regarded and treated as the transferee of Hoare's claim? He takes the present proceedings in a totally different capacity from that of a member of the company. He is not suing the company or claiming to prove against it in respect of anything due to him as a member of it. That is not the nature of his claim at all. On the contrary, he alleges that he is the assignee of Mr. Hoare's debt, and he claims simply in respect of that. As I have said I do not see any answer at all to that.

Here is a man who was a creditor for £13,400. He has not been paid in full, so that there has been a failure of consideration, and Mr. Welton is now suing as his assignee.

Mr. Welton has made a claim for interest at 10 per cent. How he is to get that I cannot conceive, unless it is by calculating interest at the rate which was payable on some of the debentures surrendered to the company in 1890, which does not appear to me to be admissible. The case simply stands thus: Mr. Hoare was a creditor of the company for a sum of £13,400. There was no bargain that he should receive interest at the rate of 10 per cent., or at the rate of 6 per cent., or indeed that he should receive any interest at all. Therefore if he is to get interest he must bring himself within the statute which enables juries in certain cases to give interest by way of damages. That, as it seems to me, he cannot do: the statute (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29) does not apply to his case, and he is not entitled to any interest at all. What would have been the result, if he had been entitled to interest, of his long delay in bringing in his claim, it is, therefore, not necessary to say. My view is that in point of law he is not entitled to claim any interest

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. The case seems to me quite simple, and I base my judgment on this, that Welton is not claiming in his own right, but as assign of Hoare. He cannot, I think, be in either a better or a worse position because he happens to be at the same time a shareholder in the company. Of the sum of £13,400 due to Hoare £2,840 has, in the result, never been paid to him in any shape or form whatever. Hoare, therefore, having been a creditor for that amount, is entitled, as an ordinary creditor, to have that amount paid to him by the company. It is for that sum, as it appears to me, that Welton is suing as Hoare's assign, under an assignment which assigns not only the debentures but also the claim generally. Under that assignment Welton is entitled to succeed in this case. With regard to interest I have nothing to add. Hoare could not have claimed interest, nor can Welton, on the sum of £2,840.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I have nothing to add.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF WORCESTERSHIRE.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF WARWICKSHIRE. (a.)

Licensing law — Jurisdiction — County — Transfer of district from one county to another for police purposes —2 & 3 Vict. c. 82—County Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 93), s. 27—County Police Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 88), s. 2.

A transfer of a part of a county to another county by agreement between the justices of the two counties in pursuance of section 2 of the County Police Act, 1840, does not affect the jurisdiction to administer the licensing laws within the transferred district.

Appeals from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mathew and Kennedy, JJ.), making absolute a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition obtained by the justices of Warwickshire against the justices of Worcestershire, and discharging a cross rule nisi obtained by the justices of Worcestershire against the justices of Warwickshire.

The question was whether the justices of Worcestershire or the justices of Warwickshire had jurisdiction to grant licences under the Licensing Acts in and for the parish of Yardley.

The parish of Yardley was a triangular area, about seven miles in length, and with a greatest width of three miles, situate in Worcestershire, but forming, as it were, a promontory or peninsula jutting into Warwickshire, and surrounded almost entirely by the Solihull division of Warwickshire and by the city of Birmingham. In 1829 Yardley was assigned to the Northfield petty sessional division of the county of Worcester under 9 Geo. 4, c. 43. In 1857 Yardley was transferred from the county of Worcester to the county of Warwick for the purposes of the County Police Acts, 1839 and 1840. This transfer was effected by an agreement of transfer made in pursuance of section 2 of the County Police Act, 1840, between the justices of Worcestershire and the justices of Warwickshire, as evidenced by resolutions passed by the courts of quarter sessions of the two counties on the 29th of June, 1857. From 1857 to 1874 the justices of Warwickshire exercised within Yardley all the ordinary jurisdiction of justices sitting in petty sessional divisions, including the granting of licences. From 1875 to 1894 the justices of Worcestershire exercised such jurisdiction in Yardley. In April, 1890, the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions made an order in pursuance of 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, purporting to create the parish of Yardley a new petty sessional division of itself. Since 1894 there had been a dispute between the two counties, the justices of each county claiming the jurisdiction to grant licences in and for the parish of Yardley. The result was that applicants for licences were obliged to apply to both sets of justices, and in some cases a licence which had been granted by one bench was refused by the other.

The justices of Warwickshire obtained a rule nisi to prohibit the justices of Worcestershire from holding a general annual licensing meeting for the Yardley petty sessional division in accordance with a notice issued by them on the 6th of July, 1898.

The justices of Worcestershire obtained a cross rule nisi to prohibit the justices of Warwickshire from exercising any licensing jurisdiction in and for the parish of Yardley at the general annual licensing meeting to be holden for the Solihull petty sessional division in accordance with a notice issued by them on the 7th of July, 1898.

By an Act passed in 1839 for the better administration of justice in detached parts of counties (2 & 3 Vict. c. 82), it was enacted that it should be lawful for justices of the peace acting for any county to act as justices in all things relating to any detached part of any other county surrounded by the county for which such justices acted.

By section 27 of the County Police Act, 1839, it was enacted that "for the purposes of this Act all detached parts of counties . . . shall be considered as forming part of that county by which they are surrounded, or if partly surrounded by two or more counties then as forming part of that county with which they have the longest common boundary; and so much of every such detached part of any county . . . which is not of itself an entire hundred, wapentake, ward, rape, lathe, or other such division of a county, shall be considered as forming part of that hundred, ward, wapentake, rape, lathe, or such other division whereby it shall be surrounded in the county of which it shall be considered a part for the purposes of this Act, or if partly surrounded by two or more hundreds, &c., then as forming part of that one with which it shall have the longest common boundary."

By section 2 of the County Police Act, 1840, which was passed to amend the County Police Act, 1839, it was provided as follows: "It shall be lawful for the justices of any two or more neighbouring counties, in their several general or quarter sessions assembled, from time to time to agree that such parts of their several counties as to them shall seem fit shall, for the purposes of the said Act, be considered as forming part of any other of the said counties; and whenever any such district shall be so transferred, for the purposes of the said Act, from one county to another, with the consent of the justices of both the last-mentioned counties, such district shall be considered, for the purposes of the said Act, as if it were detached from the county to which it belongs, and wholly surrounded by the county to which it is so transferred; and all the provisions contained herein or in the said Act, or in an Act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled An Act for the better administration of justice in detached parts of counties, respecting detached parts of counties, shall be taken to apply to such transferred districts."

The Divisional Court, on the hearing of argument on the rules nisi, decided in favour of the justices of Warwickshire, making absolute the original rule and discharging the cross rule.

The justices of Worcestershire appealed.

Asquith, Q.C., and Roskill, for the justices of Worcestershire.—The statute of 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 82), and section 27 of the County Police Act of the same year deal with what may be called islands—i.e., detached parts of counties. The effect of those enactments is that all detached parts of counties are to be considered as forming part of that county by which they are surrounded. But this is only so for certain limited purposes—viz., the purposes of ordinary petty sessional division work, and the purposes of the County Police Act. Section 2 of the County Police Act, 1840, deals with what may be called peninsulas; it provides in effect that where a part of a county is nearly surrounded by another county, the justices of the two counties may agree that it shall be treated as forming part of that county by which it is nearly surrounded. That is to say, it allows the application to peninsulas of the enactments passed in 1839 with respect to islands. This legislation does not in any way deal with the administration of the licensing laws, and the jurisdiction of administering those laws remains unaffected thereby.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and P. Bagnall Evans, for the justices of Warwickshire.—Section 2 of the Act of 1840 expressly enacts that the provisions of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 82 are to apply to transferred districts. It is admitted that this operates a transfer of all ordinary petty sessional jurisdiction. Licensing jurisdiction is, by the Licensing Acts, attached to petty sessional divisions: see sections 1, 2, and 4 of the Alehouse Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), and section 1 of the Licensing Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 44). Jurisdiction to administer the licensing laws is therefore included in the jurisdiction which is transferred.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 17.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The question raised between the counties of Worcester and Warwick in these two appeals is whether the justices of Worcestershire or the justices of Warwickshire have jurisdiction to administer the licensing laws in an outskirt of Birmingham, called Yardley, which is geographically situated in Worcestershire and is bordered on two of its sides by Warwickshire and on its third side by Worcestershire. In the year 1829 Yardley, under the provisions of 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, was made part of the Northfield petty sessional division, which is a petty sessional division of the county of Worcester. It is not disputed that from the year 1829 until the year 1857 the justices of Worcestershire were the persons to administer as regards Yardley the jurisdictions appertaining to justices in petty sessions and also the licensing laws therein, and that they did so. In the year 1857 an agreement was come to between the justices of Worcestershire and the justices of Warwickshire, which is evidenced by joint-resolutions passed at their respective quarter sessions holden in June, 1857, whereby it was agreed to consider the parish of Yardley, situated in the county of Worcester, as part of the county of Warwick for the purposes of the several Acts relating to county and district constables, and that their respective chief constables should immediately proceed to carry the same into effect. The first point to be determined is, assuming that this agreement of 1857 was an agreement to transfer the jurisdiction of the administration of the licensing laws in Yardley from the justices of Worcestershire to the justices of Warwickshire, was there power to make such an agreement? I may here state, as part of the history of the case, that, after this agreement was come to in 1857, from that year down to the year 1874 the justices of Warwickshire exercised all jurisdictions excepting administrative jurisdiction over Yardley, as forming part of the petty sessional division of Solihull, in that county, including the jurisdiction of administering the licensing laws therein. From 1875 to 1894 the justices of Worcestershire exercised all jurisdictions, including licensing jurisdiction, over Yardley. How this change came about, we are told, is not known. In 1890 the Worcestershire justices created Yardley a petty sessional division of itself under 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, and since 1894 matters have been in dispute between the two counties. It is argued on behalf of Warwickshire, and this argument has prevailed in the Queen's Bench Division, that, as by the Licensing Act of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61) and other Acts licensing jurisdiction is attached to petty sessional divisions, on the transfer by agreement of Yardley, which formed part of the petty sessional division of Northfield, in Worcestershire, to form part of Warwickshire, and thus become part of the petty sessional division of Solihull, in Warwickshire, there were thereby transferred to the Warwickshire justices the jurisdictions ordinarily appertaining to justices sitting in petty sessional divisions, and that the administration of the licensing laws was one of these jurisdictions, and the justices of Warwickshire could, therefore, exercise licensing jurisdiction over Yardley. This argument and the judgment founded thereon ignore a difficulty which remains and which is not taken notice of by the Queen's Bench Divison. The difficulty in the way of this argument is that by the Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 88), by which a transfer by agreement of one part of a county to another county can alone take place, no general transfer of jurisdiction is authorized, but, on the contrary, the transfer of a limited jurisdiction is alone provided for—viz., a transfer "for the purposes of the said Act," "an Act for the establishment of county and district constables" (2 & 3 Vict. c. 93)—and this Act has nothing to do with the exercise of licensing jurisdiction. A transfer by agreement of one part of a county to form a part of another county, except for the purposes of the County Police Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 93), is nowhere authorized. It is true that by the Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 88) its provisions and also the provisions of the Act of 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 82), "An Act for the better administration of justice in detached parts of counties," are to apply to the transferred districts; but, in my judgment, neither in the Act of 1840 nor in the Act of 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 82) for the better administration of justice in detached parts of counties can it be found that licensing jurisdiction is dealt with or included. I am alive to the inconvenience of the justices of Warwickshire having police jurisdiction in Yardley and not licensing jurisdiction, though they have not administrative jurisdiction; and, as to summary jurisdiction and ministerial matters, see Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), s. 7. If I could I would come to the same conclusion as the Queen's Bench Division, but I am unable to construe the statutes so as to effect what the Queen's Bench Division has held to be effected thereby—viz., that the justices of Warwickshire are the justices to administer the licensing laws in Yardley. There is another ground which appears fatal to Warwickshire, which is that, by the terms of the agreement of 1857, the licensing jurisdiction in Yardley was not, in fact, agreed to be transferred to the justices of Warwickshire, but that Yardley was transferred to Warwickshire for the purposes only of the several Acts relating to county and district constables, which have no relation to the administration of the licensing laws; but it is unnecessary to say anything as to this. In my judgment Worcestershire is right, and its appeal must be allowed.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS v. PINNEY. (a.)

Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Glebe lands—Contract for sale—Non-payment of purchase-money—Specific performance—Right to sue—Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 108), and 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 57).

By an agreement made in July, 1873, D., a vicar, agreed to sell to trustees of settled estates, with the consent of the tenant for life and also of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the patron of the living, certain glebe lands for the sum of £24,963. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners were parties to and executed the contract. The title was accepted, and the tenant for life went into possession. Interest on the unpaid purchase-money (which was more than an investment would have produced) was paid regularly to the vicar and his successors in office until 1896, when the Ecclesiastical Commissioners brought an action claiming specific performance of the contract, or damages, or, in the alternative, the enforcement of a vendor's lien.

Held, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, by virtue of their statutory powers, were bound to see that the purchase-money was paid and secured, and that, therefore, they had a good cause of action.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from Bigham, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

By an agreement made in July, 1873, the Rev. John Digby Wingfield Digby, the then incumbent of Coleshill, Warwickshire, contracted with the trustees of the will of the then late Earl Digby, with the consent of the tenant for life under the same will, to sell to them certain glebe lands for the sum of £24,963. As the contract was made by virtue of the powers contained in the Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts, 1842 and 1858, the consents of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the patron of the living were necessary; and they were accordingly made parties to the agreement.

The rate of interest on the unpaid purchase-money was fixed by the contract at 4 per cent. The contract had never been completed, but interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. had been regularly paid to the incumbent of the living. In the meantime the value of the land had materially decreased, and was said to be worth now not more than £10,000. It was stated that the income paid to the incumbent was considerably more than it would have been had the contract been completed and the money re-invested by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The Commissioners ultimately brought this action, claiming specific performance of the contract or damages in lieu of specific performance, or, in the alternative, a vendor's lien on the property. The defendants were the then incumbent of the living, the tenant for life of the Digby estates, the trustees under the settlement of the Digby estates, and the legal personal representatives of one Baker, the trustee who was a party to the contract.

At the trial Bigham, J., dismissed the action, holding that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were merely consenting parties to the sale and had no other interest under the contract, and that they were wrong in making the incumbent a defendant: he should have been a plaintiff, as the promise was to pay him and the commissioners.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Astbury, Q.C., and Pochin, for the appellants.—Under the statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 57 there is a legal power to sell with the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the purchase-money must be paid to them as vendors. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Your right to receive the money does not depend on the contract, but on the statute. I do not see why you have not a statutory right to enforce payment of the purchase-money.] Under the contract itself the purchaser covenanted to pay the money to us, and under the statute we are entitled to enforce payment. Bigham, J., said that as there was a promise to pay two parties, the vicar and the commissioners, both should have been plaintiffs, and we were wrong in having made the vicar a defendant.

They referred to Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Wodehouse, 43 W. R. 395, [1895] 1 Ch. 552.

Eve, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the second defendant, the tenant for life.—The action is bound to be dismissed as against me, because I am not a party to the contract. I only have the land subject to the vendor's lien. The commissioners are only parties for the purpose of giving their consent if it is necessary. If the present vicar and the purchaser choose, they can put an end to the contract now, and leave the commissioners out. The provisions of the Act as to consent are similar to those of the Settled Land Act. The tenant for life cannot handle the purchase-money; it must be paid into court or to the trustees. [CHITTY, L.J.—The cases are not analogous, because the trustees under the Settled Land Act have no discretion. They need not approve or disapprove of the sale.] Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Wodehouse, relied upon by the other side, is an entirely different case. Here the land remains exactly as it was; there is no waste. The fact that the commissioners have a right to prevent anyone else receiving the money does not give them a right to sue for it.

T. H. Carson, for the present vicar.

Brinton, for the legal personal representative of Baker.

Hardy, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think this action has been disposed of a little too summarily, and it appears to me that, having regard to the facts stated in the statement of claim, and particularly having regard to the Act of Parliament 21 & 22 Vict. c. 57, it is not right to say that the plaintiffs cannot recover anything in the action as framed. I do not propose to say anything about the particular form of relief which would have to be given. We have not gone into the defences, and we know nothing whatever about them; but Bigham, J., has taken the summary view that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief in this action. Now, there I differ. Of course I know nothing whatever about the facts in the defence, and I say nothing to prejudice that; but the position of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners is not the position of a person who consents to something being done by third parties in an ordinary contract. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have, by statute, very important duties to perform, and for the performance of those duties they have rights conferred upon them; and, as I read the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 57, it is the duty of the Commissioners rather than their right to see that this money is properly obtained and secured. I say nothing about the technical form of pleading, but I cannot possibly construe this Act of Parliament and treat them as persons having nothing whatever to do with the money except to prove their consent to the sale. The contract is one of the circumstances which brings into existence the necessity for them to perform their duties and to exercise their rights which are incidental to that performance. I do not look upon this as an ordinary action for specific performance at all; it is something far more than that. It is an action brought by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in performance of their statutory duties, and, of course, the contract is important to be set out, because it is the existence of that contract which gives rise to those duties and gives rise to their rights. Whether they will succeed in getting a decree for specific performance in the narrow technical sense, or whether they will not, I do not know; or whether they will be compelled to fall back upon their lien I do not know; but it strikes me that their statutory right is to get this money if they can, and I am not at all satisfied that they cannot.

I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed, and that the matter must go back to be tried. As regards the costs, considering we know nothing about the merits, I think that the costs below and here ought to be costs in the action.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree.

Settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Second settlement.

By an ante-nuptial settlement, dated the 15th of March, 1879, the wife covenanted to settle after-acquired property on trust for herself for life, with remainder to her children. By another settlement, dated the 7th of May, 1879, the wife covenanted to settle after-acquired property on herself for life, with remainder to the husband for life, and, after the death of the survivor, with remainder to such persons as the wife should appoint. The marriage was solemnized on the 10th of May, 1879.

Held (in the absence of evidence), that the covenant contained in the first deed was not revoked by the second deed.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture dated the 15th of March, 1879 (being an ante-nuptial settlement in consideration of a then contemplated marriage between William Gundry Mills and Anna Ellen Gundry), the proceeds of sale of certain real estate were settled on trust for the intended wife for her life for her separate use, and after her death for her issue as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, for her children equally; and this settlement contained a covenant on the part of the intended wife to settle on the same trusts any property which she, the said wife, or she or the said William Gundry Mills in her right, should become entitled to at any time during coverture, exceeding £200 acquired at any one time. This settlement was executed in London.

By another indenture of ante-nuptial settlement made in consideration of the said intended marriage, and dated the 7th of May, 1879, certain furniture and property of small value was settled on trust for the said intended wife for life for her separate use, and after her death for the intended husband, the said William Gundry Mills, for life, and after the death of the survivor for such persons as the said intended wife should appoint, with certain remainders over in default of appointment. This settlement also contained a covenant by the intended wife to settle all property (except jewels, trinkets, and property not exceeding £50 in value acquired at any one time) to which she should be entitled at the time of her intended marriage, or to which she or the said William Gundry Mills in her right should at any time during the coverture become entitled, upon the trusts declared concerning the furniture.

This second settlement was executed at Fowey, and was prepared by different solicitors from those who prepared the first settlement, to which it did not refer. There was no evidence as to the circumstances which led to its preparation.

The marriage between William Gundry Mills and Anna Ellen Gundry was solemnized on the 10th of May, 1879.

William Gundry, the father of the wife, died in 1897, leaving a will under which the said wife, Anna Ellen Mills was his residuary legatee, and his residuary estate exceeded £100,000. This summons was taken out to determine upon the trusts of which settlement this sum should be held.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and Freeman, for Mrs. Mills.—A covenant to settle after-acquired property can be altered before marriage, it resembles marriage articles: Legg v. Goldwise, Cas. temp. Talbot 20; Fearne's Contingent Remainders, 10th ed., p. 107. The execution of the second settlement revoked the first so far as the two settlements were inconsistent.

Ingle Joyce and Waggett, for other parties.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Buckmaster, for issue of the marriage.—If a marriage takes place an executed settlement cannot be altered. [They cited Page v. Horne, 9 Beav. 570; Bond v. Walford, 34 W. R. 165, 32 Ch. D. 238; Thomas v. Brennan, 15 L. J. Ch. 420.] No intention to revoke the covenant in the first deed to settle after-acquired property, is shown.

Terrell, Q.C., in reply, cited Tweddle v. Atkinson, 9 W. R. 781, 1 B. & S. 393; Price v. Easton, 4 B. & Ad. 433; In re Anstis, 34 W. R. 483, 31 Ch. D. 596.

NORTH, J.—It is said that the mere fact that the second deed was executed after the first, both being before marriage, supersedes the first. I do not decide whether, under any circumstances, it would do so, but on the evidence before me I decline to say that it does so in this case. I have no evidence of the circumstances under which the two documents were prepared, or of any intention of the parties to the second document to supersede the first. I know, however, that if the second deed prevails, the wife will have power to appoint £100,000 away from her children. What the history of the matter is I do not know, but I decline, as a matter of law, to say that the mere fact that one deed is dated after the other makes the second deed a revocation of the first so far as they are inconsistent. Further, in the first deed considerable property of the father was settled; in the second deed only some furniture was settled, and there is no reference to the first deed. Under the circumstances I decline to say that the second covenant is to supersede the first. I do not say what conclusion ought to be arrived at if no evidence were obtainable, but in this case many parties are able to give me information, and do not condescend to do so.

CUMMINS v. PERKINS. (a.)

Practice—Married woman—Plaintiff—Action dismissed — Costs — Taxation — Certificate not yet issued — Receiver of separate estate—Equitable execution.

Where an action by a married woman suing in respect of her separate estate had been dismissed, with costs to be taxed "and payable out of her separate estate, and not otherwise," and her only separate estate consisted of her share in her deceased sister's estate which the trustees were about to distribute, and it appeared that, if she received her share, the defendants would not be paid their costs, the court, on motion by the defendants, and notwithstanding the fact that the taxing-master had not yet issued his certificate, appointed a receiver of the share to the extent of the amount of the bill of costs delivered by the defendants, to hold the same as a security for the costs when taxed.

Motion.

In 1897 Elizabeth Cummins, a married woman, suing in respect of her separate estate, brought an action against her former solicitors for damages by reason of a sale alleged to have been made by them at an undervalue of her reversionary share under the will of her sister, Sarah Ann Ellis, deceased.

The action came on for trial on the 22nd of July, 1898, and judgment was pronounced dismissing the action and ordering the plaintiff to pay to the defendants their taxed costs of the action, such costs to be payable out of the plaintiff's separate estate, but not otherwise, and directing that the defendants' taxed costs should be paid within twenty-one days after service of the present order and the taxing-master's certificate in pursuance thereof.

The judgment had been passed and entered, and the defendants carried in a bill of costs for £270, but owing to delay arising partly on account of the Long Vacation, and partly, as was alleged, from the plaintiff's non-attendance at the proceedings, the taxation had not yet been completed nor the taxing-master's certificate issued.

The only separate property of which the plaintiff was possessed consisted of her share in her sister's estate. The share had recently fallen into possession; and having regard to the fact that the trustees were about to distribute the estate, the defendants now moved for the appointment of a receiver of the plaintiff's share on the ground that, unless a receiver were appointed, they would in all probability lose the benefit of the judgment.

Warrington, Q.C., and Waggett, for the motion.—

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants ask for a receiver of so much of the plaintiff's share as is sufficient to satisfy the costs ordered to be paid to the defendants. The court has jurisdiction to make the order: In re Peace & Waller, 31 W. R. 899, 24 Ch. D. 405. In that case there was a certificate, whereas here there is none, but that difference is not material. Unless the defendants get the protection they seek they will not get their costs.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Peterson, for Mrs. Cummins.—This application is wrong. The defendants cannot get equitable execution when they cannot get legal execution, and here they cannot get legal execution because there is no certificate: In re Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, 43 Ch. D. 131, Waddell v. Waddell, [1892] P. 226.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that I must dismiss from my mind the difference between legal and equitable execution. I think the introduction of the words "equitable execution" only confuses the position. The facts are these. This lady has been ordered to pay these costs, the full amount of which cannot be ascertained until taxation. But there is a judgment against her to pay these costs, when ascertained, out of her separate estate. It has been proved that she has no separate estate except her share under the will of Sarah Ann Ellis. Therefore the order is that these costs shall be paid out of her share. The suggestion has been made that she will get her share paid to her, and then snap her fingers at the defendants, telling them to get their costs as and when they can. I am disposed to take the view that the court ought to interfere if it can, but I am told that such a course is against all the rules of court. I am not satisfied of that. I think that the plaintiff ought not to receive her share in full while these costs are unpaid. I shall, therefore, appoint the defendant, Mr. Perkins, who is a solicitor, receiver without salary of the share of the plaintiff in the estate of Sarah Ann Ellis to the extent of £270, but it is only to stand as a security for the amount actually found due to the defendants on their bill of costs.

PRESCOTT v. LEE. (a.)

Election law — Registration — Parliament — Notice of objection — Place of abode of objector — Mistake — Amendment — Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, sub-section 2—Registration Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 15), s. 18—Statute Law Revision Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 22)—Registration Order, 1895, Schedule III., Form (I.) No. 2.

A notice of objection to the party objected to (a person on the occupiers' list of voters for the borough of the Strand) was thus signed by the objector: "Francis Hunt, of 106, Drury-lane . . ." The party objected to contended that the notice of objection was invalid, because 106, Drury-lane was not the objector's place of abode. It was found by the revising barrister that the objector's true place of abode was 50, Nelson-road, Wimbledon; that 106, Drury-lane was the objector's qualifying property (a shop) within the said borough; that the address, 106, Drury-lane, was inserted in the notice by a "mistake" on the part of the objector, who thought he ought to give his address within the borough, and not his place of abode outside it; and that neither the party objected to nor anyone else was misled by the inaccurate statement of the objector's place of abode in the notice of objection.

The revising barrister held that the insertion of 106, Drury-lane in the notice of objection as the objector's place of abode was, in the circumstances, a "mistake" within the meaning of sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Registration Act, 1878, and, in the exercise of his discretion, he amended the notice by inserting therein the objector's true place of abode.

The Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Lawrance, J.; Wills, J., dissenting) affirmed the decision of the revising barrister.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough the Strand.

The form of a notice of objection served upon the appellant Thomas Prescott was as follows:

"To Thomas Prescott:

"I hereby give you notice that I object to your name being retained on Division I. of the occupiers' list of electors for the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields as a Parliamentary elector for the Parliamentary borough of the Strand and as a county elector for the administrative county of London, on the following grounds: [The grounds of objection were then stated.] Dated the 20th day of August, 1898.

"(Signed) Francis C. Hunt, of 106, Drury-lane, on Division I. of the occupiers' list of Parliamentary electors and county electors for the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields."

The appellant contended that this notice of objection was invalid by reason of the fact that "106, Drury-lane" was not the place of abode of the objector Hunt.

It was proved to the revising barrister, and found by him as facts, that the true place of abode of the objector Hunt was "50, Nelson-road, Wimbledon"; that the address 106, Drury-lane was inserted in the notice of objection by a mistake on the part of the objector, who thought he ought to give his address within the borough of the Strand and not his place of abode outside the borough; that 106, Drury-lane was the objector's qualifying property (a shop) in the borough where he could be found during the greater part of any week-day; and that, in the entry of the objector's name in the list of voters, the objector's true place of abode, "50, Nelson-road, Wimbledon," was correctly given in the second column (place of abode) of such entry.

The revising barrister upon these facts—holding that the insertion in the notice of objection of 106, Drury-lane (instead of 50, Nelson-road, Wimbledon) as the place of abode of the objector was a mistake within the meaning of sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878, and that neither the appellant nor anyone else was affected in any way by the inaccurate statement in the notice of objection of the objector's place of abode—amended the notice of objection by substituting therein the true place of abode of the objector; and the grounds of objection to the appellant being proved good, the appellant's name was struck off the list of voters.

Upon the request of the appellant Prescott the barrister stated this case for the opinion of the court—the question being whether, in the circumstances of the case, the barrister had power to amend the notice of objection.

Sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878, enacts that a revising barrister "may correct any mistake which is proved to him to have been made in any claim or notice of objection."

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 15), enacted that "the forms and instructions contained in the 2nd and 3rd schedules to this Act shall be used and observed in all cases to which they apply . . . but a disregard of any form or instruction shall not of itself invalidate any list, notice, or other thing."

By the Registration Order of the 25th of March, 1895 (made by the Queen in Council under the provisions of section 76, sub-section 7, of the Local Government Act, 1888), it is ordered that "the former instructions, precepts, notices, and forms under the Registration Acts shall be altered . . . and the instructions, precepts, notices, and forms in the schedules to this order shall be observed and be valid in law." Form (I.) No. 2 in that order is the form of notice of objection to the party objected to; and it prescribes that such notice shall be thus signed by the objector: "(Signed) A. B. of [place of abode] on the list of Parliamentary electors and county electors for the parish of . . ."

Section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885, is repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 22), which came into force on the 25th of July, 1898.

W. Graham, for the appellant. — The revising barrister had no power to make such an amendment as he made in this case, for his power to amend is limited to the correction of "mistakes," and the intentional filling in of one address for another is not a "mistake" at all. Moreover, this is not a case in which the court is asked to order a revising barrister to amend a misstatement or inaccuracy in the notice of objection, but to uphold an amendment by the revising barrister which he had no power under the Act to make: Barlow v. Smith, 1 Fox & Smith 293; Smith v. Chandler, 37 W. R. 351, 22 Q. B. D. 208. By the omission of the objector's true place of abode the notice was bad for want of description: Humphrey v. Earle, 36 W. R. 510, 20 Q. B. D. 294; and, being bad in form, ought not to have been acted upon as against the appellant.

H. H. Lawless, for the respondent. — Since the irregularity in the notice is one that arose from a "mistake," the revising barrister had discretionary power to amend it under sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Registration Act, 1878; and having decided that the alteration should be made, the court has no power to interfere: Adams v. Bostock, 30 W. R. 460, 8 Q. B. D. 259; Bollen v. Southall, 34 W. R. 44, 15 Q. B. D. 461; Hicks v. Stokes, 41 W. R. 123, [1893] 1 Q. B. 124.

W. Graham replied.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case my brother Lawrance, J., and myself have the misfortune to differ with the view taken by Wills, J., as we have come to the conclusion that the revising barrister had power to make the amendment. It seems to me that the Legislature intended to lay down rules which would ensure substantial uniformity in claims, notices of objection, and the like, under the Registration Acts; but these rules were never intended to defeat claims and objections (which would otherwise be valid) by reason of their not following with strictness the prescribed form in the schedule. Of course, however, the line must be drawn somewhere, as too great a degree of laxity could never be permitted. I think the line may safely be drawn at cases where, although there has not been a literal compliance with the forms, there has yet been substantial compliance, unaccompanied by any attempt to deceive or do any injury to others. It is obviously not desirable that words dealing with the popular franchise—claims on the one hand, and notices of objection on the other—should be construed with such special pleading nicety as to make it incumbent that paid experts should be necessarily called in for the purpose of giving effect to the rights which the Legislature intended to confer. Under section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885, it is provided as follows: [His lordship read the section, and proceeded:] That meant that substantial uniformity should be secured as to the forms of claims and notices, but it did not mean to deprive claimants and objectors of their rights, if their notices were otherwise valid, by reason of the fact only that the notices did not quite strictly adhere to the forms given in the schedules. In other words, no slavish adherence to these forms was required. If substantial compliance existed and all the information required was given, then the form was admissible. There must be substantial compliance with the form, and all information required to be given must be given. So much for the law as it stood under the Act of 1885. But section 18 of that Act has been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1898. The Order in Council of March, 1895, orders that the instructions, notices, and forms in the schedules to that order shall be observed and be valid in law; but the proviso contained in the repealed section 18 that a disregard of any form or instruction shall not of itself invalidate any notice is omitted. What is the effect of that omission? Does it make any practical difference? I do not think so. The same construction can be given to the Order as was given to the repealed section, and, if I am right in that view, then non-compliance with the letter of the form, if all the substantial requirements are fulfilled, will not of itself invalidate a notice.

The question, therefore, is narrowed to this—namely, what is the revising barrister's power to amend? That depends on 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 28, sub-section 2, which enacts that a revising barrister "may correct any mistake which is proved to him to have been made in any claim or notice of objection." It follows that if there is a mistake the revising barrister has jurisdiction to correct it. Was there a "mistake" in the present case? If not, then the revising barrister had no power to amend the notice as he has done, and the appeal must succeed. But I think the revising barrister had power to make this amendment, for, apart from the authorities, the law is perfectly clear that any person who is a voter may give notice of objection. The objector here was on the register; what did that involve? His name appeared on the list with his place of abode, and, also, the description of his qualifying property in the borough. The facts about the notice of objection are thus set out in the case. [His lordship then read certain paragraphs of the case.] The revising barrister says that the wrong address was given by the objector by mistake. During the argument counsel for the appellants contended that a restricted meaning ought to be given to the word "mistake"—restricted, namely, to a mistake of fact—as if, for instance, the objector had accidentally, in a fit of hallucination, written down an address which was not his at all. But I see nothing in the Act requiring us to limit the word in that way. It is clear that the objector, under an erroneous impression of his duty, had entered intentionally in the notice of objection his business address instead of his residential address. That appears to me to be a "mistake" which the revising barrister has jurisdiction to set right. I must now deal with the authorities in their order of date. [His lordship then referred at length to the cases of Adams v. Bostock, Bollen v. Southall, Smith v. Chandler, and Hicks v. Stokes.] I see nothing in these authorities which militate against the opinion I have already expressed—namely, that in this instance there was a mistake which the revising barrister had power to amend if he thought fit. In my judgment, therefore, the appeal fails.

WILLS, J.—It is with great reluctance that I have come to a conclusion in this case that obliges me to differ in my judgment from the other members of the court. The point is a narrow one, but important. The simple question is, What is the true meaning of the words in sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Act of 1878, "The revising barrister may correct any mistake." The kind of mistake I think the Act contemplated was such a mistake, for example, as where a man said one thing and meant to say another. When a man, as in the present case, puts on his notice of objection the very address he intended should appear there, I fail to see how his intentionally doing so can be said to have been a "mistake" on his part. It cannot be said that a man has made a mistake if he has done or said the very thing he all the time meant to do or say, because he had been induced to do what he in fact did by a process of reasoning which proceeded on a mistaken view of what the law required. It is true that the revising barrister in the case he stated mentions the word "mistake," but that does not, for the reason I have given, help the court to decide in his favour. He does not explain how the particular address came to be inserted by "mistake." The "mistake" made by the objector was the premises on which he based his conclusion that it was necessary to give an address in the borough. The statute only gives the revising barrister power to correct anything he finds wrong, when it appears to him to have been caused by a "mistake." There is no power given him to set right the erroneous conclusion which induced the objector to make a particular entry. The authorities that have been cited to us are cases where a mistake, in the true sense of the word, has come before the revising barrister; and where such is the case the statute authorizes the revising barrister to use his discretion and to amend or correct if he thinks fit. On this ground I fail to see that the revising barrister had jurisdiction in the matter; and therefore he amended this particular notice of objection without any right to do so.

LAWRANCE, J.—I concur in the view of the learned Lord Chief Justice, as in my judgment this was an error or mistake which by the statute the revising barrister had jurisdiction given him to correct, if he so thought fit. That discretion he has exercised, and in my opinion his amendment ought to be upheld. I do not myself think that the Legislature intended that the word "mistake" should be restricted to its purely literal and technical meaning, but that it must be read as having been used in its commonly-accepted sense. I am content to put my decision in the words of Lord Coleridge in the case of Bollen v. Southall, where he said: "With regard to the power of amendment I am much indisposed to construe it so as to encourage laxity; but I think it would make it almost nugatory to hold that the revising barrister had not the power to amend or correct mistakes in these notices, if the information they are intended to convey is really given, but given in an informal or inaccurate manner. I think the amendment made here was well within his power. I shall always be inclined to hold the exercise of the power of amendment within reasonable limits, because I am well aware of the very strong feelings which are excited in matters of this sort. Unless kept under proper restraint the agents on both sides will be apt to fall into a degree of laxity which I for one do not feel inclined to encourage." That is the view I take of the present case, and in my judgment the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs; leave to appeal given.

LINFORTH v. BUTLER.. (a)

Election law — Registration — Parliament — Notice of objection—Omission in body of notice of place of abode of person objected to—Validity—Parliamentary Registration Act. 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 15), s 18—Statute Law Revision Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 22)—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 76, sub-section 7—Registration Order, 1895, Schedule I., Form 5 (a).

Notwithstanding the repeal of section 18 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1885, an immaterial deviation —even though intentional—from any form prescribed in the Registration Order, 1895, will not of itself invalidate a claim or notice of objection; but if a claim or notice of objection fails in any substantial respect to give the information required to be given to the person who is to receive it, then it is invalid.

A notice of objection sent by post to a person whose name was entered on the register of ownership electors omitted to give (as prescribed in Form 5 (a), Schedule I., of the Registration Order, 1895), in the body of the notice itself, the place of abode, as described in the register, of the person objected to; but on the back of the notice of objection there was written, for postal purposes, the name of the person objected to and his place of abode as described in the register. The omission to give in the body of the notice the place of abode of the party objected to was intentional.

Held (reversing the revising barrister) that the notice of objection was not invalid on account of such omission.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Pudsey Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The name of the respondent appeared upon the ownership list for the Pudsey Division of the township of Leeds. A notice of objection was sent by the appellant to the respondent through the post in accordance with section 100 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18). The form of notice of objection applicable, was Form 5 (a) in Schedule I. of the Registration Order, 1895.

In filling up the form of notice, the appellant had omitted to insert—as prescribed in Form 5 (a)—in the body of the notice itself the place of abode of the respondent as described in the register; but on back of the notice the name and place of abode of the respondent were, for postal purposes, correctly written. The appellant intentionally omitted to insert in the body of the notice the respondent's place of abode, in order to avoid having to pay the extra halfpenny postage (which, as alleged, would have been in such case) required by the postal regulations.

The respondent contended that the notice of objection was invalid by reason of this omission.

The revising barrister held that the notice of objection was bad by reason of this omission, and allowed the vote.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 15), provided as follows: "The forms and instructions contained in the second and third schedules to this Act shall be used and observed in all cases to which they apply . . . but a disregard of any form or instruction shall not of itself invalidate any list, notice, or other thing." This section was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 22), which came into force on the 25th of July, 1898.

Section 76 (7) of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), provides as follows: "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty the Queen, by Order in Council, from time to time to alter the instructions, precepts, notices, and forms under the Registration of Electors Acts . . . and the instructions, precepts, notices, and forms specified in any such Order in Council shall be observed and be valid in law . . ."

The material parts of the form of notice of objection, Form 5 (a) prescribed by the Registration Order, 1895, is as follows: "To C. D., of [here insert the name and place of abode of the person objected to as described in the register]. Take notice that I object to your name . . ."

The revising barrister, at the request of the objector the appellant, stated the present case.

Lewis Thomas, for the appellant.—The notice is good. Section 18 of the Registration Act of 1885 shows that a disregard of mere form is not material.

W. Graham, for the respondent.—Section 18 was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1898, a month before the notice was given. The provision now in force, section 76 (7) of the Local Government Act, 1888, says that the forms specified by the Order in Council for the time being in force shall be observed. The Queen in Council seems to have considered it desirable that the address of the person objected to as it appeared on the register should appear on the face of the notice. The registration agents ought not to disregard this requirement in order to save a halfpenny postage. If the omission had been made by accident no doubt there would be power to amend. But that was not the case here, so that the revising barrister had no power to amend: Smith v. Chandler, 37 W. R. 351, 22 Q. B. D. 208.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I think that the revising barrister was wrong. Assuming that section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885, had been in force, I think that the notice would have sufficiently complied with the law. Has any alteration in the law been effected by the repeal of that section and by the subsequent Order in Council? The vote of respondent was being objected to on the ground that his qualification was not a good one, and a notice of objection was sent to him by post. The notice is as follows; I read only part of it: "To the Rev. Alexander Henry Butler: Take notice that I object to your name being retained in the Parliamentary list of ownership electors for the township of Leeds." As this notice was to go through the post there was written on the back of it, "The Rev. Alexander Henry Butler, 17, Virginia-road, Leeds."

The machinery prescribed by the law is that one notice shall be sent to the person objected to, and a similar notice shall be sent to the overseers. Both the person objected to and the overseers, in this case had ample notice; but it is said that the notice sent to the person objected to does not comply with the law. What is the object of the provision that the notice shall be in the form prescribed? The object is to ensure that the person objected to is properly described in the notice, and that the notice shall reach him. If there had been added to the notice the words "See address on the other side" it is almost impossible to argue that that would not have been a sufficient compliance with the law. It is said that the appellant's object in not complying strictly with the form prescribed was to save postage. If the notice, however, is in legal form, there is no objection to his saving his halfpence.

Now, under section 18 of the Registration Act, 1885, "a disregard of any form shall not of itself invalidate any notice." If, therefore, when that Act was in force there was a substantial compliance with the law, this notice would have been good. There could not then be any answer to the argument that there has in this case been a substantial compliance with the law. But it is said that the law is altered, that that section has been repealed, that it has been superseded by an Order in Council. Are we called upon to say that, under the present law, any deviation from the form invalidates the notice? I do not think so. The line can only properly be drawn at the point, that if the notice fails in any substantial respect to give the information required to be given to the person who is to receive it, the notice is bad.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills, J.) — Oct. 26.

PARKER v. ALDER. (a.)

Adulteration — Milk — Act of stranger — Liability of innocent vendor — Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6; Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.

A vendor of milk under a contract, consigned milk to a railway company for carriage to Paddington Station, where it was to be delivered to purchasers. On arrival at that station the milk was found to be adulterated by the addition of 9 per cent. of water. The adulteration took place without the knowledge of the vendor during the railway transit.

Held, that the vendor was liable to be convicted, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling, to the prejudice of the purchaser, milk which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded; but that the vendor's personal innocence of the adulteration was a fact to be taken into account in mitigation of punishment.

Special case stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as amended by section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, charging the respondent that on the 1st of January, 1898, at Paddington Station, being under a contract with the Metropolitan and Surburban Milk Supply Association for the sale and delivery to them of pure unskimmed milk at Paddington Station, he sold to the prejudice of the purchaser, in pursuance of such contract, milk which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. The respondent was a dairy farmer carrying on business at Wantage. By the terms of a contract entered into by him with the association he undertook to sell to the association pure unskimmed new milk in specified quantities and at specified prices to be delivered carriage paid in churns morning and evening from the 27th of March, 1897, to the 26th of March, 1898, to Paddington or any other railway station served by the Great Western Railway Co. near London, in such condition as to keep good and sweet a reasonable time after delivery. The course of business was for the churns consigned by the respondent to the association to be delivered by the respondent to the Great Western Railway Co. at Challow for transmission to Paddington, where the association took possession of them. It was proved that the particular consignment of milk in question was, when delivered to the railway company at Challow, pure, and in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the contract. The appellant, who was an inspector under the Act, took a sample of the milk on its arrival at Paddington, and it was found to contain 9 per cent. of added water. The magistrate found as a fact that the water was unlawfully added by some person a stranger to the respondent during the transit from Challow to Paddington.

The magistrate dismissed the information, being of opinion that, although the place of the delivery of the milk was Paddington, the property in the milk passed to the association at Challow, and therefore no sale within section 6 of the Act of 1875 took place at Paddington. The magistrate further held that even if there was a sale at Paddington the respondent was in law only liable for the acts and defaults of himself, his servants, and employees.

Section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, is as follows: "No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser." Section 3 of the amending Act of 1879 provides that any inspector may procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee.

R. C. Glen, for the appellant.—The property in the milk did not pass to the buyer till its arrival at Paddington. It is not necessary under section 6 to prove knowledge of the adulteration on the part of the seller, although the absence of knowledge may be material on the question of the amount of the penalty. In Brown v. Foot, 66 L. T. Rep. 649, 40 W. R. Dig. 6, the master was held liable for the act of his servant in adulterating milk, and no valid distinction can be drawn between the wrongful act of a servant and the wrongful act of some other person.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In my judgment the magistrate was wrong in holding that no offence had been committed by the respondent. I think that it is clear that, upon the proper construction of the contract between the respondent and the association, the risk of the buyers only began when the milk was delivered to them at Paddington Station. Delivery to the association was not completed by putting the milk in the train at Challow and leaving it to be carried by the railway company as agent for the buyers, and in my opinion the magistrate rightly construed the contract in saying that the place of delivery was Paddington; but I do not agree with his conclusion that, as between the buyer and the seller, the property passed at Challow. I think the property passed to the buyer on delivery at Paddington.

The inspector took a sample from the milk at Paddington, and it was found to be adulterated by the addition of 9 per cent. of water. The magistrate came to the conclusion, and we have no reason to find fault with his decision on this point, that the milk was pure when delivered by the respondent to the railway company at Challow, and that the respondent was no party, directly or indirectly, to the adulteration, which must have taken place in course of transit by the act either of a servant of the railway company or of some other person who had access to the churns.

The question is whether, under these circumstances, the respondent has committed the offence with which he is charged. That depends on the proper construction to be placed on the two sections which have been referred to. It is not unimportant to notice that section 5 of the Act of 1875, the section immediately preceding one of those in question, deals with certain offences as to which the person charged may meet the accusation made against him by showing that he did not know, and could not with reasonable diligence have obtained the knowledge, that the article in question had been dealt with in the manner prohibited. It is important to bear in mind the provisions of that section when one has to consider the construction to be placed on section 6. [His lordship read section 6 of the Act of 1875, and section 3 of the Act of 1879.] The only question which we have to consider is whether the respondent is brought within these sections, taking it, as we must, that he was no party to the adulteration, and had no means of protecting himself against it. I think he is. If one considers the scope of this Act, I think that to hold the respondent not responsible would be to open a very wide door towards defeating the Act, especially when one considers that it has been decided that an innocent vendor has been held liable for the unauthorized act of his servant committed beyond the scope of his employment, and even in defiance of direct instructions. There seems to me to be no difference between such a case as that, and this one. Looking at the scope of the Act and to the absence of reference to the necessity of proving scienter, I am of opinion that an offence is committed if in the course of carrying out a contract of sale an adulterated article is delivered.

I only wish to add that if the vendor is himself personally innocent, and that fact is known to the inspector, he ought not to institute proceedings; and if he does the magistrate should only inflict a nominal fine.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I was a party to the decision of Brown v. Foot, and that case has always been regarded as sound law and has been acted on. There does not appear to me to be any material distinction between the case of a man innocently selling an adulterated article owing to the fault of his servant, and the case of a man selling an adulterated article through the fraudulent act of a stranger. The Legislature, in dealing with the question, has intended to enforce drastic remedies, and it is not as if this was a solitary instance of the Legislature creating an offence independently of the moral character of the act.

I agree that if the magistrate is satisfied that the fraud which has been committed is one which it was it was impossible to guard against, a nominal penalty only should be imposed. Under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the magistrate has power, if he thinks the case a trivial one, to dismiss the summons.

Bankruptcy—Scheme of arrangement—Debt carrying interest exceeding 5 per cent.—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 23—Construction—Retrospective effect.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was passed upon the 18*th of August*, 1890, but did not come into operation until the 1*st of January*, 1891.

Section 23 of that Act provides: "Where a debt has been proved upon a debtor's estate under the principal Act, and such debt includes interest or any pecuniary consideration in lieu of interest, such interest or consideration shall, for the purposes of dividend, be calculated at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, without prejudice to the right of a creditor to receive out of the estate any higher rate of interest to which he may be entitled after all the debts proved on the estate have been paid in full."

Held, that the above section was not retrospective in its effect, and did not apply to a scheme of arrangement approved by the court upon the 25*th of June*, 1890.

Motion by the assignee of a creditor to determine the amount of dividend to which he was entitled under a scheme of arrangement approved by the court upon the 25th of June, 1890.

Upon the 31st of January, 1890, a receiving order was made against the debtor, and at the first meeting of creditors he proposed, and the creditors accepted, a scheme by which the property of the debtor divisible among his creditors should vest in a trustee, who was to distribute the net proceeds thereof among the creditors "in accordance with the law of bankruptcy." This scheme was approved by the court and the receiving order rescinded upon the 25th of June, 1890.

Upon the 18th of August, 1890, the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was passed, section 23 whereof provides that a creditor proving in a bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, cannot obtain a dividend upon interest at a rate higher than 5 per cent. until all other claims upon the estate have been paid in full. This Act came into operation upon the 1st of January, 1891. Among the proofs tendered against the debtor's estate was one for £10,153 1s. 8d. made by a money-lender named Robert Morris, and consisting largely of interest at a higher rate than 5 per cent. This claim was assigned for value by Morris to C. H. Wilson, the applicant in this case, upon the 30th of June, 1893.

In 1897 funds became available for the payment of a dividend out of the estate, but the trustee refused to pay Wilson any dividend upon such part of Morris's proof as consisted of interest at a higher rate than 5 per cent.

Wilson thereupon applied to the court for a declaration that he was entitled to dividends upon the full amount of the proof.

Reed, Q.C., and Frank Mellor, for the motion.—This scheme was approved by the court before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and no section of an Act of Parliament should be interpreted as having a retrospective effect unless such an intention is plainly expressed in the Act.

They cited Young v. Adams, [1898] A. C. 469, 46 W. R. Dig. 121; In re Joseph Suche & Co. (Limited), 24 W. R. 184, 1 Ch. D. 48; Hough v. Windus, 32 W. R. 452, 12 Q. B. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Herbert Jacobs, for the trustee.—The words of the section "Where a debt has been proved . . . under the principal Act" show plainly that the section was intended to have a retrospective effect. It would have been otherwise if the words had been "Shall be proved": Bourke v. Nutt, 42 W. R. 388, [1894] 1 Q. B. 725, per Esher, M.R., at p. 733. In Ex parte Pélly, 32 W. R. 748, 50 L. T. Rep. 754, it was held that section 4 of the Companies Act, 1883, had a retrospective effect.

Aug. 12.—WRIGHT, J. (after stating the facts).—The question here is whether section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, operates so as to govern the distribution of dividend under a contract made under a scheme which had taken effect before the Act was passed or came into operation.

For the applicant it is argued that the section operates only on bankruptcies occurring or schemes taking effect after the commencement of the Act; and, further, that in any case the scheme ought to be construed as a contract for distribution of the estate according to the Act which was in force at the time when the scheme was adopted and took effect. The latter of these contentions ought not, in my opinion, to prevail if it stood alone. In the absence of any express provision in the scheme for this particular matter, I think that the scheme must be construed as applying the bankruptcy law for the time being in force in so far as such law may not be inconsistent with the express provisions of the scheme, or excluded by any rule of law or rule of construction; and if this view is correct, the only question is whether there is a rule of construction which prevents the section from being interpreted as operating retrospectively. Perhaps no rule of construction is more firmly established than this, that a retrospective operation is not to be given to a statute so as to impair an existing right or obligation, otherwise than as regards matter of procedure, unless that effect cannot be avoided without doing violence to the language of the enactment. Some of the many authorities for this proposition are Main v. Stark, 15 App. Cas. 384, 39 W. R. Dig. 252; Gilmore v. Shooter, 2 Mod. 310, on the Statute of Frauds; Moon v. Durden, 2 Ex. Ch. 22, on the Gaming Acts; Hickson v. Darlow, 31 W. R. 417, 23 Ch. D. 690, on the Bills of Sale Acts; Waugh v. Middleton, 8 Ex. Ch. 352, an extreme case, but not disapproved of in Larpent v. Bibby, 5 H. L. C. 481; Williams v. Harding, 14 W. R. 503, L. R. 1 H. L. 9; Hough v. Windus; and Ellis v. McCormick, 17 W. R. 500, L. R. 4 Q. B. 271, on the Bankruptcy Acts; and In re Joseph Suche & Co. (Limited), on section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875. In the last-mentioned case Jessel, M.R., said: "Since this question came last before me I have consulted several of the other judges"; and referring to section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, he said: "I prefer on this occasion to rest my decision on the more general grounds that the section was not intended to apply to any case of a winding-up which had been commenced before the Act came into operation. I so decide because it is a general rule that when the Legislature alters the rights of parties by taking away or conferring any right of action, its enactments, unless in express terms they apply to pending actions, do not affect them. It is said that there is one exception to that rule—namely, that where enactments merely affect procedure and do not extend to rights of action, they have been held to apply to existing rights, and it is suggested here that the alteration made by this section is within the exception. I am of opinion that it is not. This is an alteration not merely in procedure, but in the right to prove for a debt which is not distinguishable in substance from a right of action before winding up, being simply a legal proceeding to recover a debt against a company in liquidation." One exception to the general rule has sometimes been suggested—namely, that where, as here, the commencement of the operation of an Act is suspended for a time, this is an indication that no further restriction upon retrospective operation is intended. But this exception seems never to have been suggested except in relation to statutes affecting procedure, such as Statutes of Limitation, and even in relation to them it is questioned in Moon v. Durden. Moreover, sections 6 and 8 of this Act have been held not to be retrospective, notwithstanding, though without reference to, this suspensory clause: see Ex parte Raison, In re Raison, 39 W. R. 271, and Reg. v. Griffiths, 39 W. R. 719, [1891] 2 Q. B. 145.

In the present case the enactment does not merely affect procedure. If the section is construed retrospectively, it will postpone the creditors' right to dividend beyond five per cent., and will pro tanto deprive him of the vested right of action which he possessed at the commencement of the Act and when the bankruptcy occurred. Then is the section so expressed as to be plainly retrospective? No doubt the words "where a debt has been proved under the principal Act" are capable of such a meaning. But this form of words is often used to refer, not to a past time which preceded the enactment, but to a time which is made past by anticipation—a time which will have become a past time only when the event occurs on which the statute is to operate. In former times draftsmen would have used the words "where a debt shall have been proved," but in modern Acts the past tense is frequently used where no retrospective operation can be intended. In Moon v. Durden even the phrase last mentioned was held not retrospective. It seems to me that the case for the trustee cannot be put higher than this—that either construction is possible; but if so, the authorities to which I have referred show that retrospective force ought not to be given to the section.

It is not necessary in the present case to decide whether the section would apply where the original contract was made before the passing or commencement of the Act, but a scheme is adopted and approved after the commencement of the Act. In such a case the question would probably depend on the provisions of the scheme as approved, and if a creditor in such a case assented without qualification to a scheme which according to its ordinary construction attracts the existing bankruptcy law, he might probably be held to have waived any right which he might otherwise have to stand upon his original contract.

It should be observed that by section 31 of the Act of 1890 that Act and the Act of 1883 are to be construed as one Act. This enactment, however, cannot have the effect of making the provisions of the Act of 1890 operative as from 1883; nor could it be so held consistently with the cases above cited of Ex parte Raison and Reg. v. Griffiths. The motion, therefore, must be allowed with costs.

POWELL v. BROWN. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Employment on or in or about a factory—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was proved that the deceased was a carter in the employment of the defendants, who were the occupiers of a timber yard, and that he was accidentally killed while engaged in stowing timber on a cart belonging to the defendants, which was standing immediately outside the defendants' premises.

The county court judge held that the deceased was employed "on or in or about" a factory within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and made an award in favour of the widow of the deceased.

Held, that the decision of the county court judge must be affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Liverpool County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The claim to compensation was made by the widow of a workman who had died in consequence of accidental injuries suffered by him in the course of his employment.

The deceased was a carter in the employment of the defendants, Brown & Backhouse, who were builders and contractors carrying on business in premises in Chatham-street, Liverpool, part of which they used for the purpose of sawing and stacking timber. At the time of the accident the deceased was engaged in stowing a load of timber from the defendants' works on a cart belonging to the defendants, which was standing in the street adjoining the defendants' premises, and close to the entrance to the premises. While he was standing on the timber in the cart, a piece of timber accidentally tilted and threw him on to the road, and he received injuries from which he died.

The county court judge held that the defendants' premises were a factory within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that the deceased was employed "on or in or about a factory" within that sub-section. He also found that the accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased's employment. He made an award in favour of the plaintiffs for £243 12s. 7d. By section 7, sub-section 1, "This Act shall apply only to employment . . . on or in or about a railway, factory," &c.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Tobin with him), for the defendants.—The deceased's employment was not employment "on or in or about a factory." It cannot be contended that he was employed on or in a factory. Neither, according to the true meaning of the section, was he employed about a factory. The word "about" is here used in a double sense. It is generally capable of two meanings—viz., first, "near" with regard to place; and secondly, "in relation to," or "ancillary to." Here it cannot simply mean "near" without any limitation; nearness alone is not sufficient. Neither can it be sufficient that the employment is ancillary to or incidental to the factory. The word "about" here must mean near to the factory and in connection with the business of the factory. The business of this factory was the work of sawing and shaping timber; and the deceased was not an employee of the factory, but was a carter in the general employment of the defendants.

Ruegg, Q.C., and A. P. Thomas, for the plaintiff.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the county court judge was correct. The deceased was at the time of the accident employed in stowing the defendants' timber on a cart in a place immediately outside the defendants' factory, where their goods were usually loaded. He was employed in close proximity to the factory, and he was employed in the factory business, for the stowing of timber was part of the business of the factory. It is said that he was not employed "on or in or about" the factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. I am of opinion that the case is within the Act. The Legislature thought the word "on" would not include all that they intended to include, nor would the word "in," so they added the word "about," which is an enlarging word. The question is really a question of fact, and the county court judge has found that the deceased was employed on or in or about a factory. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

SMITH v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Accident arising out of, and in the course of, employment—Questions of law—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of the death of a railway servant, who was killed in consequence of getting on to the footboard of a train in motion to speak to a passenger, the county court judge found as facts that the deceased was, on the day of the accident, in the employment of the defendants, and that his day's duty was not finished at the time of the accident, but that he did not get on to the footboard for any object of the defendants, but only for his own pleasure.

Held, that, by section 1, sub-section 1, the Act only applied to accidents arising both out of the employment and in the course of the employment; and that, on the findings of the county court judge, the accident did not arise out of the employment of the deceased.

In cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to entertain questions of law only.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Colne County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The claim to compensation was made by the widow and step-daughter of a workman who had died in consequence of accidental injuries suffered by him in the course of his employment.

The deceased was a platelayer in the employment of the defendant railway company, and he was occasionally employed to collect tickets.

On the night of the 3rd of September, 1898, he helped in collecting tickets at Nelson Station from a train which was travelling to Colne. Having collected the tickets he remained standing on the platform until the train began to move on its forward journey, when he got on to the footboard and said to an acquaintance of his who was travelling in the train, "I wish I was going with you to Colne." In getting off the footboard he in some way caught his foot and fell and was crushed between the platform and the train, and was killed.

The county court judge found as facts: That the deceased was, on the day in question, in the employment of the defendants, and his day's duty was not finished at the time of the accident; that he did not get on to the footboard for any object of the defendants, but only for his own pleasure; and that this was not obviously dangerous, and did not amount to wilful and serious misconduct on his part.

The county court judge held that the accident arose in the course of the deceased's employment, because it happened during the time he was being paid for attendance at the station, and while he was not neglecting in any way his duty for purposes of his own. He also held, with doubt, that the accident arose out of the deceased's employment, because it was an accident happening to him from the train about which his duties were concerned, and that, though the danger was increased by the mode in which he was behaving, this in the absence of wilful and serious misconduct did not prevent it arising out of his employment.

The county court judge made an award in favour of the plaintiffs for £160.

Section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is as follows: "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act."

The defendants appealed.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Acton, for the defendants.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and F. H. Mellor, for the plaintiffs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The appeal must be allowed. I am of opinion that in cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, this court has jurisdiction to entertain questions of law only. I take that to be the effect of section 4 of the Second Schedule, which says that the decision of the county court judge on any question of law shall be final, unless within the prescribed time either party appeals to the Court of Appeal. We have no jurisdiction to review any finding of fact arrived at by the county court judge, or other arbitrator. Here the county court judge has found certain facts, and the defendant company appeal on the ground that on those facts the plaintiffs have not brought their case within the Act. One of those findings of fact is that the deceased did not get on to the footboard for any object of the defendants, but only for his own pleasure. The substance of the Act is that masters are made insurers against accidents happening to their workmen, but only in the case of certain events mentioned in the Act. Section 1, sub-section 1, says, "If in any employment to which this Act applies"—that takes us to section 7, which makes the Act apply to employment on or in or about a railway, so that the deceased was in an employment to which the Act applies—"personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman," then the master shall be liable to pay compensation. It must be shown that the accident arose both out of the employment and in the course of the employment. The county court judge awarded compensation, holding that the case came within the Act. I do not decide whether the accident arose in the course of the employment, but, having regard to the finding of the county court judge that the deceased got on to the footboard not for any object of the defendants, but only for his own pleasure, it seems to me impossible to say that the accident arose out of his employment. It arose out of his getting on to the footboard for his own pleasure. I therefore think the award was wrong.

A jointress who is not so entitled must be charged with estate duty upon so much of the estate as is represented by the jointure, but is entitled to throw the duty so charged upon the whole estate, she keeping down the interest on the duty during her life. The better way to ascertain the capital value of the jointure is to assess it at a sum equivalent to the capitalized value of the jointure at the same number of years' purchase as the estate as a whole is capitalized for the purposes of duty, rather than to adopt the actuarial value of the jointure.*

By an indenture of settlement dated the 10th of December, 1861, executed on the marriage of Edward John Parker-Jervis with the defendant Grace Catherine Locker (then Grace Catherine Jervis, spinster), Edward Swinfen Parker-Jervis and E. J. Parker-Jervis, in exercise of a joint power of appointment given to them by a previous disentailing deed and resettlement dated the 27th of March, 1861, conveyed a certain estate called the Stone Aston estate to the use of trustees for eighty years to secure the defendant Grace G. Locker in the event of her surviving E. J. Parker-Jervis an annuity of £800 during the joint lives of herself and the said E. S. Parker-Jervis, with remainder to the use of E. S. Parker-Jervis for life, with remainder to the use that the said Grace C. Locker in case she should survive both E. S. Parker-Jervis and E. J. Parker-Jervis (which event happened) should thenceforth during her life receive a jointure of £1,000 per annum "without any deduction whatsoever, except in respect of income tax," with remainder to trustees for 200 years for securing such jointure, with remainder to trustees (who were also appointed general trustees of the settlement) for 500 years upon trust for raising £10,000 for portions for the younger children of the marriage of E. J. Parker-Jervis and Grace C. Locker his wife, with remainder to the use of the first son of the said marriage in tail male with divers remainders over. The settlement also contained powers for E. S. Parker-Jervis to appoint a jointure to a future wife, and to charge certain portions for his younger children.

The plaintiffs were the present trustees of the said term of 500 years and generally of the last-mentioned resettlement.

E. J. Parker-Jervis died on the 31st of July, 1868, in the lifetime of his father, leaving the defendant Grace C. Locker, one son Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis, and four daughters surviving him.

The defendant Grace C. Locker subsequently married William Thomas Locker, who died on the 21st of June, 1885.

Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis attained twenty-one on the 29th of September, 1884, and by a disentailing deed and resettlement dated the 14th of November, 1884, the Stone Aston estate and another estate called the Little Aston estate were settled (subject as to the Stone Aston estate to the limitations relating to the annuity and jointure in favour of the defendant Grace C. Locker and the portions for her daughters contained in the resettlement of the 10th of December, 1861) to certain uses in strict settlement not material to this report, with remainder to the use of E. St. V. Parker-Jervis for life, with remainder to the use of his first, second, third, and every other son successively in tail male with divers remainders over; and power was thereby given to E. S. Parker-Jervis to appoint to a future wife (his first wife having died on the 24th of June, 1884) a jointure of £500 per annum, and to charge the estates thereby settled with £10,000 as portions for his then present or future children, and to secure such jointure and portions by limiting a term or terms in the said settled estates, and it was thereby declared that these last-mentioned powers of jointuring and charging portions were to be substituted for the original powers contained in the resettlement of the 10th of December, 1861, which powers were thereby released by E. S. Parker-Jervis. A sum of £3 per cent. consols was thereby assigned to the plaintiffs to be held upon the trusts applicable thereto as if the same was capital money under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the plaintiffs were thereby appointed trustees thereof for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts and generally.

On or about the 15th of July, 1886, E. S. Parker-Jervis married the defendant Maude Parker-Jervis, and by the settlement dated the 10th of July, 1886, made upon such marriage, he appointed a jointure of £500 per annum to the said defendant in case she should survive him, and secured the same upon the whole of the estates settled by the settlement of the 14th of November, 1884, and charged them with £10,000 as portions for the children. There was no issue of the said marriage, and by his will (dated the 1st of July, 1892) E. S. Parker-Jervis charged the said last-mentioned estates with £10,000 as portions for two of his children by his first marriage, securing the same by a term of 600 years.

(a.) Reported by R. J. A. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

E. St. V. Parker-Jervis was only once married—namely, to Winifred Maria Parker-Jervis, to whom he was married on the 11th of March, 1889, and the defendant St. Vincent John Parker-Jervis, born on the 21st of July, 1891, was the eldest son of such marriage.

By an indenture dated the 20th of February, 1896, and made between the Reversionary and General Securities Co. (Limited) of the one part, and the defendant John Saltren Willett of the other part, the company, as mortgagees of the life estate of E. St. V. Parker-Jervis, granted and assigned the manors, lands, and hereditaments, moneys and investments subject to the uses or trusts of the resettlement of the 14th of November, 1884, to the defendant J. S. Willett, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for the term of 100 years from the day next before the day of the death of E. S. Parker-Jervis, if E. St. V. Parker-Jervis should so long live, freed from all right or equity of redemption by E. St. V. Parker-Jervis. The defendant J. S. Willett subsequently mortgaged his interest in the said settled estates to the defendants the University Life Assurance Society.

Upon the death of Edward S. Parker-Jervis on the 3rd of January, 1896, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of all the property comprised in the resettlement of the 14th of November, 1884, as passing upon the death of E. S. Parker-Jervis without allowing any deductions.

The two sets of portions of £10,000 each had been raised and paid, less estate duty, and no question had been raised concerning them.

An estate duty account had also been rendered to the commissioners comprising the whole of the estates and property subject to the uses and trusts of the resettlement of the 14th of November, 1884—namely, the Stone Aston and Little Aston estates and the sum of consols.

Inasmuch as the defendant Grace C. Locker's jointure arose under a disposition not made by E. S. Parker-Jervis—that is under the resettlement of the 10th of December, 1861—the amount of capital required to produce such jointure was treated by the commissioners as an estate by itself and was assessed by them at the sum of £24,670, on which duty at £4 per cent. together with interest on such duty was assessed at £1,022 17s. 4d. The figure of £24,670 was arrived at by capitalizing the jointure at the same number of years' purchase (between 24 and 25 years' purchase) at which the rental of the Stone Aston estate had been capitalized for the purpose of duty. The estate duty upon the whole of the rest of the estate was assessed at £7 per cent.

The plaintiffs proposed to negotiate a loan on mortgage of the Little Aston estate of £5,000, at £3 2s. 6d. per cent., to be applied together with a sufficient sum by sale of consols in payment of the duty as assessed by the commissioners, including that separately assessed on the defendant Grace C. Locker's jointure.

Various questions having arisen relating to the raising and incidence of the duty, the plaintiffs took out the present summons for the determination of the following questions:

(1) Whether the plaintiffs, as such trustees as aforesaid, had power under section 9, sub-section 5, of the Finance Act, 1894, to raise the amount of the estate duty payable on the death of the said Edward S. Parker-Jervis in respect of the said jointure of £1,000 charged in favour of the defendant Grace Catherine Locker upon the Stone Aston estates and any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred by them in respect thereof, by a mortgage of the said estates (i.e., all the settled estates) or a part thereof, notwithstanding that such jointure had been treated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the purposes of estate duty as an estate by itself, and had not been aggregated with any other property passing on the death of the said Edward S. Parker-Jervis.

(2) How the estate duty payable in respect of the said jointure of £1,000 was to be borne as between the persons interested in the Stone Aston estates, and in particular, whether such estate duty ought to be repaid by the defendant Grace C. Locker to the plaintiffs or other person or persons paying the same, or whether she ought to pay interest upon the amount of such duty to the defendant John Saltren Willett and the defendant society, and if so, at what rate.

(3) How the proportion of the estate duty payable on the death of the said Edward S. Parker-Jervis in respect of the estates comprised in the said indenture of resettlement of the 14th of November, 1884, to be borne by the defendant Maude Parker-Jervis, as being entitled to the said jointure of £500 charged thereon, was to be determined, and

(4) Whether the defendant Maude Parker-Jervis would be entitled to charge the proportion of estate duty to be borne by her as aforesaid upon the corpus of the said estates, and if so, upon what terms as to interest and otherwise.

Upon the first question raised by the summons a discussion arose at the hearing as to whether the trustees were properly accountable for the duty on the whole estates, and had power to raise the same, or whether the payment of the duty and the power of raising the same devolved upon the defendant J. S. Willett, who was the assignee of the legal tenant for life. The defendant Willett, however, by his counsel, consented to concur in the proposed mortgage, and his lordship thereupon, without determining the question whether the plaintiffs as such trustees as aforesaid had power to raise such duty, declared that the defendant J. S. Willett, as tenant for life, had power to raise the amount of the estate duty payable in respect of the whole of the estates (including Mrs. Locker's jointure) and any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred in respect thereof by a mortgage of the said estates or a part thereof, and directed the plaintiffs to raise so much of the estate duty on the whole estates (including Mrs. Locker's jointure) as they should think fit out of the consols, and the residue of the duty to be raised by the defendant J. S. Willett by mortgage of the Little Aston estate on the request of the plaintiffs.

The court then proceeded to consider the remaining questions raised by the summons.

Austen-Cartmell, for the trustees.—Assuming that the defendant Willett pays the duty, then he will be entitled under section 14 of the Finance Act, 1894, to recover the rateable part of the estate duty from the annuitants. Mrs. Locker may escape payment of duty, as her annuity is given to her free from any deduction except income tax; but it is not so in the case of Mrs. Parker-Jervis's annuity. There are two views regarding the valuation of the annuity for the purposes of duty. One is, that the duty is leviable on the actuarial value of the annuity; the other is, that the jointress ought to be treated as life tenant of so much of the estate as produces the annuity; and in the latter case she would get the benefit of the charge under either sub-section 1 or sub-section 6 of section 9, the result being that she would pay interest on the rateable part of the duty with which she is charged. Inasmuch as the tenant for life does not in effect pay the duty out of his own pocket, and is merely charged with interest on the duty, so an annuitant ought to be put in the same position pro tanto. Section 2, sub-section 1, and section 7, sub-section 7 (b), seem to bear out the latter view.

Reginald Hughes, for the defendants Mrs. Locker and Mrs. Parker-Jervis.—Mrs. Locker is not liable to pay any duty at all; she is entitled to her annuity free from any deduction whatsoever, except income tax. There could have been no possible deduction except for duty, that could have been in the settlor's mind. In In re Saunders, 46 W. R. 180, [1898] 1 Ch. 17, a gift of the net sum of £2,000 was held to be a gift free from succession duty. There are express words in this gift that no deduction shall be made. The jointress cannot in any event be required to do more than pay interest on the sum charged for duty. If the trustees do not pay the duty, the jointress is bound to pay it, and if she does, she is entitled to a first charge on the property under section 9, sub-section 1, and under section 6 she is entitled to the like charge as if the estate duty had been raised by means of a mortgage to her. The principle of the Act is that the duty is charged on the estate, and the limited owners have to support the burden of the charge so long as they get the income, and the person who gets the corpus bears the duty when he gets the corpus and not before. The actuarial method of valuation is a hazardous arrangement, and might not work with fairness. The sum to be charged will be ascertained on a similar basis to that on which the estate is capitalized. The commissioners have capitalized the estate at twenty-four and a-half years' purchase.

Jessell, for the defendant J. S. Willett, the assignee of the tenant for life.—This estate duty is not a deduction within the meaning of the clause in the settlement; it can be recovered under section 14, sub-section 1, from the jointress, for there is no "express provision to the contrary" within the meaning of that sub-section. The words are not wide enough to escape the principle of this Act. In re Saunders does not apply, because there the words were "net sum." The jointress ought to pay this duty. The commissioners have treated it as a separate estate, therefore she only has to pay £4 per cent. instead of £7 per cent., which would have been the rate had it been aggregated with the rest of the estate, so that she derives an advantage in that respect.

S. R. Earle, for the infant tenant in tail in remainder.—The general policy of this Act is that the estate duty shall fall upon the beneficiaries: In re The Countess of Orford, 44 W. R. 383, [1896] 1 Ch. 257. It could not have been the intention of the settlor in 1861 to exempt the jointress from this duty, and there are no words which would justify such exemption: In re Meyrick, 45 W. R. 120, [1897] 1 Ch. 99. She ought, therefore, to bear the burden of the duty.

He also referred to Vaizey on Settlements, pp. 923 and 925, and to the cases there cited, and also to Gleadow v. Leetham, 31 W. R. 269, 22 Ch. D. 269; Festing v. Taylor, 11 W. R. 70; Lord Lovat v. Duchess of Leeds, 10 W. R. 397, 2 Dr. & Sm. 62; and In re Bannerman's Estate, 21 Ch. D. 105, 30 W. R. Dig. 223.

Stallard, for the mortgagees of the life estate.

KEKEWICH, J.—There are two questions to be decided now, both arising under the Finance Act, but otherwise of an entirely different character, even though they both concern annuities, and both those annuities are jointure rent-charges. I will deal first with the question of whether Mrs. Locker is entitled to be paid her annuity or jointure, free from any deduction in respect of the estate duty leviable on the property out of which that annuity is payable, and on which it is charged. That stands entirely alone, and, assuming for the moment that she is bound to contribute to the estate duty, the question which will arise—namely, in what proportion she ought to pay—equally arises as regards the other annuity, so that that may be considered as completely distinct.

Without looking for the moment at any authorities; without, for the moment, referring to the Finance Act, let me consider the contract between the parties, because this is a contract. This is a settlement whereby an annuity is charged in the proper form on the estate for the benefit of Mrs. Locker, who is a contracting party. If the parties in so many words said that the annuity is to be paid free of any charge whatever—that is to say, if the owner of the property who charges that property with the annuity has contracted that so many hundred pounds—say, £100—shall come to the hands of the person in whose favour he makes the charge, it is rather startling to be told that that contract shall not take effect, and that some deduction shall nevertheless be made, and that the person entitled to the charge shall not receive £100, but something less. Many persons, no doubt, think that they are going to receive certain sums annually or quarterly, and do not receive it because the revenue makes certain deductions. I suppose that any member of the bar on receiving an appointment to the bench might think he was going to receive a salary of a certain amount, but he would soon find out his mistake, because the revenue takes care that he does not. The money is retained as against him and as against everybody else for income tax, and all the decisions as regards income tax have gone on this footing, that although it is possible to provide for the payment of an annuity clear of income tax, it has to be done by somewhat cumbrous machinery, and really you have to provide that in addition to the annuity which was necessarily chargeable with the income tax, there shall be raised a further annuity equivalent to the income tax, but, of course, a varying annuity according as the income tax rises or falls. You must get a contract to that effect, although perhaps not in those words, if you wish to free the annuity from income tax—that is to say, to enable the annuitant to receive an annuity without any deduction for income tax; but that, so far as I am aware, has never been extended to any other tax of any kind whatever, and it has never been said, so far as I know, and no counsel has ever suggested that it has been said, that other taxes are not deductions. By some legal interpretation it has been held again and again that income tax is not a deduction. To take one example. Wood, V.C., says in the case of Turner v. Mullineux, 9 W. R. 252, 1 J. & H. 334, quoted by Kay, L.J., in Gleadow v. Leetham: "This court always holds that income tax is not a deduction." It really is not in one sense, because it is a sum paid by the person entitled to the annuity, paid in respect of the income which he receives. It is not really chargeable until he receives the income. In that sense it is logically and technically not a deduction. Every other tax that prevents the annuity coming into the hands of the annuitant clear has always been held, so far as I am aware, to be a deduction.

Turning to this settlement, I find that the parties have contracted that Mrs. Locker shall be paid the £1,000 a year without any deduction whatever, except in respect of income tax. There is no attempt to make it clear of income tax; and not only that, there not being any desire to make any other exemption, the usual words are put in the settlement. Then it is said that that does not refer to the estate duty because that is not a deduction. It is unnecessary to say more on that point than I have already said. But then something more was said, that this was a settlement made in the year 1861, and it was impossible that the contracting parties should have contemplated such a charge as this estate duty, which is imposed more than thirty years afterwards. It is a sufficient answer to say that the parties did not contemplate that or any other duty; what they did contemplate was that the annuity should be paid without any deduction whatever. I think it is only fair to say that they must be taken to have contemplated some possible deduction for tax, because they have excepted deductions in respect of income tax, which shows that some deductions for tax were in their minds. But one need not dwell much on that, because they have contracted for it to be paid without any deduction whatever, and if the argument prevails that Mrs. Locker is to take £1,000 a year less some sum to be ascertained for the estate duty, she will not get £1,000 a year, she will get £1,000 a year with a deduction—that is, less some sum in respect of the estate duty. That seems to me not to be in accordance with the contract. Here I have these simple words, "without any deduction whatever," and I think that means on the contract that there was to be no deduction in the events which have happened in respect of the estate duty.

But then I am told that, apart from the contract, the Act is against my interpretation; and that depends upon section 14, which I will not read at length, but which provides that where the person who pays the duty, pays the whole, then he may recover from the person entitled to any sum charged on the property a rateable proportion—that is, a proper proportion which the owner of the charge ought to provide; but that must be under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary. It is argued that the clause in the settlement "without any deduction whatsoever," is not an "express provision to the contrary." It is not express, no doubt, in the sense which I mentioned, and which was argued as the right one, that there is no express mention of the estate duty, and there could not be, because of the date. I see no difficulty myself in saying that an express provision is that which expressly provides against any deduction, fairly including the one in question; and it is not necessary to say that there must be an express provision as regards estate duty. One observation probably will be sufficient to deal with that. If that argument is sound, no settlement dated before the passing of the Act, or at any rate before it was known to the public that this estate duty was contemplated by Parliament, could possibly contain an express provision, because it would have been impossible before it was passed by Parliament for anyone, even the most ingenious conveyancer, to frame words which would expressly mention the estate duty which was afterwards imposed.

Now, the other point is a very much more difficult one. We are dealing now with the question how the duty chargeable to the jointress is to be ascertained—a question which has not been dealt with, and probably did not occur to the framers of the Act in its full difficulty, and therefore we have no provision directly dealing with it. All one can do is to see what was the intention of the Legislature, having regard to the general scheme of the Act and to those special provisions which at all bear upon it. The question is this—I am not now dealing with Mrs. Locker—With what duty Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis, who is entitled also to a jointure, is to be charged. She must be charged with some—that is to say, she must pay some; some deduction must be made in respect of her duty. It is practically immaterial for this purpose whether the duty is charged on the whole or any part of the estate. I do not wish to encumber my view of the case with any distinction on that ground.

The first point which occurs to me as a guide is this: that the estate duty is by the Act charged on the property. It is quite unnecessary to go through the Act for the purpose of showing that it is the property which, as a whole, passes by the death which is charged with the estate duty. The Legislature does not concern itself as between the owner of the estate, the taxpayer, or the property paying—if I may use that expression—that is, the taxed property. It does not concern itself with any question arising between the taxed property and the different persons interested in that property for the purpose of ascertaining what is to be paid to the revenue. The Legislature takes the estate as a whole passing on the death, and says that property, whatever it is, shall be charged with duty at a certain rate. On that principle the duty is ascertained, and it has to be paid by some person. It is immaterial whether it has to be paid by the tenant for life. Then, not for the sake of the revenue at all, which is already thoroughly protected, but for the sake of assisting different persons to bear their own burdens in the proper rateable proportions, the Act contains several provisions distributing those burdens, and the question is how those burdens are to be distributed. Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis is entitled to a jointure of so much, chargeable on the estate, the whole of which is chargeable with the duty. One very ready way of ascertaining her proportion is to say: "You are entitled to a jointure of £1,000 a year, payable, it may be, out of property which realizes more than that, and you must bear the burden in exact proportion to the capital value of your jointure. The duty is charged on the capital value of of the whole. You are entitled to something, which, though it is an annual charge, and an annual charge of a limited duration, yet is capable of valuation by the simplest possible means—that is to say, by an actuarial assessment, and you must pay the duty on that." Of course, for many purposes, the actuarial assessment is the very best possible way, and if you apply it to a very large number of cases so as to strike an average, it would, on that average, work with very great fairness. There is no doubt about that. There is nothing which modern experience has proved more satisfactory than if an average is struck upon proper principles applied to a large number of cases it comes out absolutely true. I will not waste time by going into them, but many cases have come before me to illustrate that. It would work fairly enough in that way, but the question is whether that ought to be applied to a case which is one of a large number of cases where neither party can possibly have the benefit of the average. It is all very well to say that if you take a score, or fifty, or 100 jointresses and assess their jointures on that principle, they would not between them pay too much or too little, but would pay really exactly what they ought to pay; but it is another thing to say Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis will or will not pay too much. It is quite possible that she may pay a great deal too much—I mean much more than is fair and much more than is a reasonable proportion attributable to her interest. On the other hand, if she live to an old age, it is quite possible that she may have an advantage and pay too little; but it seems to me it is so problematical, so speculative, that I ought not to adopt that view if there is any other possible view. Now, I think there is another possible view, and I think it is, on the whole, a reasonable one and one which I ought to adopt. I do not propose to go through the different sections of the Act. They, no doubt, will have again and again to be construed before we get to an exact interpretation of them; but it seems to me tolerably clear that this lady is entitled to a charge on the estate for the duty which she pays, and that whatever part of the duty she, or anybody else, pays is by the Act imposed on the estate, and is paid out of the inheritance. If she is liable to pay the duty in the first instance on the whole, she would be entitled to a charge for what she pays. That seems to me to be so, applying this 9th section, to which Mr. Cartmell has referred me. She is in the position of a person having a charge on the estate. In respect of that charge, duty will have to be paid. She is entitled, so it seems to me, to say, "You charge that duty on the whole estate, and so far as I am a mortgagee, though of a limited character, I must keep down the interest on that charge. I shall only do it during my life, it may be a short time or a long time." Then the answer to that is, "Yes, but on your death there will be nobody left to pay that interest, and the result will be that it will have to be borne by the inheritance, it may be by a tenant for life in possession or by a tenant in tail; but practically in legal language it will have to be borne by the inheritance." That is quite fair. I think that is exactly what is the scheme of the Act. The scheme of the Act is that it shall be levied on the inheritance, and the inheritance shall bear it. I think it would be going contrary to the general scheme of the Act if I were to say that any part of the duty as a whole on the capital sum ought to be borne by any person having a limited interest. No doubt, in one sense, every person having a limited interest bears a proportion of the duty. He bears it in proportion to his limited interest. The tenant for life unfortunately is perfectly aware he bears a heavy burden. He bears it in this way, that instead of having the clear income which his predecessor had—I am speaking, of course, of estates free from incumbrances—he has it less a charge on the property which has to be raised by mortgage or otherwise; and the result is he has to pay his £4 per cent., or whatever it is, on that charge during his life. If the property is sold he has less income from the property. If it is paid out of capital money there is a cesser of interest arising from that capital money, but in either case the burden of the duty is cast upon the inheritance. If the view which I take is the right one, and this lady has to bear her proportion of the duty during her life, the same thing will follow. The inheritance for this purpose may be taken to be the tenant for life in possession and the jointress, both of them being limited owners. The jointress is a limited owner, and she will pay interest on the sum ascertained according to her rateable proportion of the entire property. The rest will be that of which the tenant for life remains in possession, and he will have to pay interest on the sum charged on that proportion, and so during the joint lives they will divide the charge in a fair way. If she dies first he will pay the interest on the whole. That seems to me to be the scheme of the Act, and having gone through these different clauses, which I do not propose to go through again in detail, they all seem to me to point that way, and I have not seen any clause which in the slightest degree contradicts it. I repeat, there is is no provision in the Act to that effect. It seems to me to have been left very much at large. I have to consider how best to ascertain that which is undoubtedly true—namely, that the jointress must bear a fair proportion of the duty. I think that is the way to do it. We know here (there is no doubt about it) what the value is. The parties have ascertained that. But if you do not know it, you will have to ascertain what is the proportion of the inheritance of the whole estate which is required to pay the duty on the jointure—that is to say, so much of the estate as is represented by the jointure. That sum will be actually, or will be supposed to be, raised by mortgage. It may be paid by appropriation of capital money, and she must pay interest on that sum at a fair rate. There being no provision of the kind, that difficulty also arises, but I suppose the proper way would be that she should pay £4 per cent. on the charge. In the present case Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis will pay interest at the rate of £3 2s. 6d. per cent., as that is the rate at which, as I understand, the money can be raised.

Bankruptcy — Practice — Costs — Taxation — Retaining fees—Discretion of master—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, r. 353, and Scale of Solicitors' Costs, General Regulations, rr. 1, 2.

On the taxation in bankruptcy of the bill of costs of a solicitor of the trustee in bankruptcy, the taxing-master has a discretion to allow retainers to counsel; but, unless under very exceptional circumstances, such retainers will not be allowed.

Ex parte application to reverse the decision of the taxing-master of the High Court in bankruptcy who had disallowed a retaining fee paid to counsel by the solicitor of the trustee in the bankruptcy of Nordmann.

The taxing-master had disallowed the retaining fee on the ground that it was the almost universal practice of his office not to allow such fees.

George Castle (solicitor), for the application.—The taxing-master in bankruptcy has the same discretion as the other taxing-masters of the High Court to allow retaining fees: see The Annual Practice, 1898, p. 200; and the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, Scale of Solicitors' Costs, General Regulations, rr. 1 and 2, which provide:

1. "All costs save as in this scale provided which shall be properly incurred under the provisions of the Act or Rules shall be allowed on the 'Lower Scale' in Appendix N. to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883."

2. "All court fees and other proper disbursements shall be allowed in addition to the remuneration in this scale provided."

[Mr. Registrar HOPE referred the court to rule 353 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890: "When no provision is made by the Act or these rules, the present law procedure and practice in bankruptcy matters shall, in so far as applicable, remain in force. And, save as provided by these rules or rules amending them, the Rules of the Supreme Court shall not apply to any proceeding in bankruptcy."]

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[WRIGHT, J.—I think I had better see the taxing-master and find out what his reasons are for disallowing these fees.]

Oct 31.—WRIGHT, J.—In this case I have seen the taxing-master, and, it seems to me, looking at the rules to which I have been referred, I cannot properly say that the taxing-master would not have a discretion to allow retaining fees, but, having regard to the long-established practice in the taxing-master's office, I think it a discretion which ought only to be exercised in very exceptional cases.

Upon the facts, however, in the present case, I see no reason to interfere with the decision of the taxing-master; but as the applicant desires it, the case must go back to the master for review. There will be no costs of this application.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This is an appeal from the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks, who has refused to the appellants to permit the word "Solio" to be registered as applicable to their photographic paper. Before dealing with the decision itself, I think it desirable, from what occurred in the course of the argument, to say something as to what sources of construction we are entitled to appeal to in order to construe a statute. Among the things which have passed into canons of construction, as recorded in Heydon's case, 3 Co. Rep. 7B, we are to see what was the law before the Act was passed, and what was the mischief or defect for which the law had not provided—what remedy Parliament appointed, and the reason of the remedy.

Now, the law before the Act now in question was passed was one which had given rise to considerable litigation, and is contained in section 64 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. Section 64 of that Act provided that a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars—sub-section (c): "A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, or fancy word or words not in common use." That was the law passed in 1883, and on the 24th of February, 1887, a commission was appointed to inquire into the duties, organization, and arrangements under the Trade-Marks Act so far as related to trade-marks and designs. It appeared by the report of the commissioners that complaints had been made as to the working of the Act of 1883, and in that part of the report relevant to the present controversy it is stated that "the most difficult question which has arisen upon the enactment under consideration is to determine what may be properly regarded as 'fancy words.' Words are, undoubtedly, a most popular form of trade-mark, but some limit must obviously be put upon the words which an individual may be permitted to register and claim the exclusive use of. The expression 'fancy words' is certainly not a happy one, and has naturally given rise to considerable differences of opinion as to its meaning." The report proceeds: "It is manifest that no one ought to be granted the exclusive use of a word descriptive of the quality or character of any goods. Such words of description are the property of all mankind, and it would not be right to allow any individual to monopolise them and exclude others from their use. Again, geographical words, which can be regarded as descriptive of the place of manufacture or sale of the goods, are open to obvious objections. One manufacturer or merchant cannot properly be allowed to prevent all his competitors from attaching to their goods the name of the place of their manufacture or sale. The mischief would not be the same where the person seeking to register was the first who had manufactured or sold the goods in the place the name of which he seeks to appropriate as a trade-mark. But there are objections to giving a monopoly even in that case; and to attempt to draw any such distinction would be likely to lead to difficulty and litigation. We think, therefore, that geographical names ought only to be permitted where they clearly could not be regarded as indicative of the place of manufacture or sale. We would add upon this point that we think that where any English word would be rejected as not entitled to registration, no person ought to be permitted to register its translation into any other language. The question has been raised whether a word having the same sound as one entered on the register, though differently spelt and with a different meaning, should be registered. The question in such a case would seem to be whether the resemblance between the old mark and that applied for was such as to be calculated to deceive; if it were it ought, of course, to be rejected."

I think no more accurate source of information as to what was the evil or defect which the Act of Parliament now under construction was intended to remedy could be imagined than the report of that commission. Turner, L.J., in Hawkins v. Gathercole, 3 W. R. 194, 6 De G. M. & G. 1, and adding his own high authority to that of the judges in Stradling v. Morgan, Plow. 199, after enforcing the proposition that the intention of the Legislature must be regarded, quotes at length the judgment in that case, that the judges must collect what that intention is "sometimes by considering the cause and necessity of making the Act, sometimes by comparing one part of the Act with another, and sometimes by foreign circumstances" (thereby meaning extraneous circumstances), "so that they have ever been guided by the intent of the Legislature, which they have always taken according to the necessity of the matter, and according to that which is consonant to reason and good discretion;" and he adds: "We have therefore to consider not merely the words of this Act of Parliament, but the intent of the Legislature, to be collected from the cause and necessity of the Act being made, from a comparison of its several parts, and from foreign (meaning extraneous) circumstances, so far as they can justly be considered to throw light upon the subject." Lord Blackburn, in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson, 26 W. R. 217, at p. 220, says: "In all cases the object is to see what is the intention expressed by the words used. But, from the imperfection of language, it is impossible to know what that intention is without inquiring farther, and seeing what the circumstances were with reference to which the words were used, and what was the object, appearing from those circumstances, which the person using them had in view."

It appears to me that to construe the statute now in question, it is not only legitimate, but highly convenient, to refer both to the former Act, and to the ascertained evils to which the former Act had given rise, and to the later Act which provided the remedy. These three things being compared, I cannot doubt the conclusion.

Now, the objection pointed out by the commissioners was that a particular individual should not be permitted to take exclusive possession of any part of our language; and this objection appears to have been in the mind of the framers of the earlier statute when they made the phrase "fancy word" part of the definition of what might be registered as a trade-mark. It was the use of that phrase and its accompanying qualification which gave rise to much litigation, and I am certainly not disposed to hold that cases decided under that Act can have any bearing upon the construction of that part of the Act now under construction, which was obviously intended as an alteration and amendment of the former Act. The present Act provides, among other things, by section 10, that a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least certain particulars, one of which is "an invented word or invented words." This word "Solio" is claimed to be an invented word; and it has been adjudged not to be an invented word, and apparently (though I think the association of the two things involves an incorrect construction of the statute) because it is a word which has reference to the character or quality of the goods. I think it is an invented word within the meaning of this statute. I know of no such word as "Solio" in any sense which would make it intelligible here, although it is an Italian word meaning a throne, and although it is a Latin word in the ablative case with the same meaning.

Not much reliance, however, is placed upon the word having some meaning in a foreign tongue; but what is put is that it may have extracted from it some meaning in relation to the character or quality of the goods, because the letters S O L may be understood to mean the sun. And it is true that Shakespeare in "Troilus and Cressida" speaks of our planet "Sol," and that inasmuch as the goods in question are photographic papers and sunlight is operative in producing impressions on photographic paper, it comes within the prohibition against using words which are descriptive of the character and quality of the goods in respect of which the word is sought to be registered. My answer is that "Solio" is not "Sol," and "Sol" is not "Solio." It certainly is a very strange thing that you should take three letters out of a word, and by the somewhat circuitous process that has been adopted here, arrive at the conclusion that it is not an invented word, and that it does describe the character and quality of the goods. I desire to give my opinion with reference to the particular word, and not to go behind it. I can quite understand suggesting other words—compound words or foreign words—as to which it would be impossible to say that they were invented words, although perhaps never seen before, or that they did not indicate the character or quality of the goods, although as words of the English tongue they had never been seen before. Suppose a person were to attempt to register as a single English word "Cheapandgood" or even, without taking so gross an example, using a word so slightly differing from an ordinary and recognised word as to be neither an invented word nor, avoiding the prohibited choice of a word, indicating character or quality. The line must be sometimes difficult to draw; but, to my mind, the substance of the enactment is intelligible enough, and the Comptroller has to make up his mind whether in substance there has been an infringement of the rule. Of course, also, words which were merely misspelt, but which are nevertheless in sound ordinary English words, and the use of which may tend to deceive, ought not to be permitted.

I am satisfied in this case to say that the word "Solio" is an invented word, that it does not indicate the character or quality of the goods, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks having refused to register "Solio" as a trade-mark in respect of photographic paper, the applicants, who are the appellants at your lordships' bar, appealed to the Board of Trade, who referred the appeal to the court. Kekewich, J., held that the application had been rightly refused, and his judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The ground upon which the court proceeded was that the word "Solio" had reference to the character or quality of the goods, and was therefore incapable of registration. The court of Appeal held itself bound by a previous decision of the same court in the case of In re Farbenfabriken Application, to hold that an invented word could not be registered if it had any reference to the character or quality of the goods. The question turns upon the construction of the section which, by section 10 of the Act of 1888, is substituted for section 64 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883.

The section to be construed provides that a trade-mark "must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars." Then follow several particulars distinguished by the letters (a) to (e).

The last two of these are as follows: "(d) An invented word or invented words; or (e) a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name."

Before considering the effect of this legislation, I think it is well to refer to the fact that these two particulars of which a trade-mark may consist were not to be found in the Act of 1883. On the other hand, "fancy word or words not in common use," which were amongst the essential particulars in section 64 of the Act of 1883, are not to be found in the substituted section. It had been held that they did not cover words that were descriptive, and the section had given rise to much litigation and some divergence of judicial opinion. I cannot doubt that this was the origin of the legislation by which the words appearing in the principal Act were omitted, and the provision found in the later Act substituted.

In In re Farbenfabriken Application, North, J., said he did not see how he could hold "Somatose" to be an invented word under sub-section (d), having regard to the decisions with respect to such words as "Herbalin," "Washerine," and "Valvoline." All these decisions had reference to the provisions of section 64 of the Act of 1883 with regard to fancy words. In my opinion, none of the decisions upon that part of the original section have any bearing on the new provisions to be found in the substituted section, the purpose of which was, I think, to get rid of the expressions which had occasioned much embarrassment, and of all the distinctions and decisions which had been founded upon them. Those decisions, so far from affording any guide to the true interpretation of the particulars designated (d) and (e), are likely to lead to error if applied to these new provisions.

Addressing myself, then, to the terms of the substituted section, I am unable to find any justification for qualifying the provision "(d) an invented word or words" by the condition that they shall have no reference to the character or quality of the goods. By the words which introduce the section, the particulars designated under the headings (a) to (e) are treated as separate and distinct. "A trade-mark must consist of at least one of the following essential particulars." What warrant is there, then, for transferring words found in any one of these particulars to any other of them? With all deference to the learned judges who have thought otherwise, I can see none. It seems to involve an interpretation of the language used which is not its natural grammatical construction. In In re Farbenfabriken Application A. L. Smith, L.J., said: "It is impossible, I think, to hold that the Legislature intended that an invented word might be a word having reference to the character or quality of the goods, whereas a non-invented word might not. There would be no sense in so holding." I am unable to agree with this view. There seems to me to be the broadest distinction between the two cases. Under (e) any word in the English language may serve as a trade-mark; the commonest word in the language might be employed. In these circumstances it would obviously have been out of the question to permit a person, by registering a trade-mark in respect of a particular class of goods, to obtain a monopoly of the use of a word having reference to the character or quality of those goods. The vocabulary of the English language is common property; it belongs alike to all; and no one ought to be permitted to prevent the other members of the community from using, for purposes of description, a word which has reference to the character or quality of the goods.

If, then, the use of every word in the language was to be permitted as a trade-mark, it was surely essential to prevent its use as a trade-mark where such use would deprive the rest of the community of the right which they possessed to employ that word for the purpose of describing the character or quality of goods. But with regard to words which are truly invented words—words newly coined, which have never theretofore been used—the case is, as it seems to me, altogether different; and the reasons which required the insertion of the condition are altogether wanting. If a man has rightly invented a word to serve as his trade-mark, what harm is done, what wrong is inflicted, if others be prevented from employing it, and its use is limited in relation to any class or classes of goods to the inventor? So far, then, from seeing no reason for a distinction between the particulars designated in (d) and (e), there seems to me abundant reasons for not interpolating in (d) words which the Legislature has used only in relation to (e). In a later part of the judgment to which I have already referred, A. L. Smith, L.J., says that to constitute an invented word within the meaning of the section it must be a word coined for the first time. "Such a word," he says, "is, of necessity, incapable of having reference to the character or quality of goods, because, ex hypothesi, it is an entirely new, unknown word incapable of conveying anything." With this—subject to a qualification to which I will refer in a moment—I entirely agree. An invented word has of itself no meaning until one has been attached to it. But this circumstance does not seem to me to be any ground for qualifying with a condition not applied to them the terms "an invented word or words."

In considering the case of an application to register a trade-mark under (d), the only question which in my opinion has to be determined is whether the word sought to be registered is an invented word. In In re Meyerstein's Trade-Mark Kay, L.J., said: "There is extremely little invention in the matter." It may be that the word "Satinine," which was there in question, was objectionable on other grounds; but if the word be an "invented" one I do not think the quantum of invention is at all material. An invented word is allowed to be registered as a trade-mark, not as a reward of merit, but because its registration deprives no member of the community of the rights which he possesses to use the existing vocabulary as he pleases. It may no doubt sometimes be difficult to determine whether a word is an invented word or not. I do not think the combination of two English words is an invented word, even although the combination may not have been in use before, nor do I think that a mere variation of the orthography or termination of a word would be sufficient to constitute an invented word, if to the eye or ear the same idea would be conveyed as by the word in its ordinary form. Again, I do not think that a foreign word is an invented word simply because it has not been current in our language. At the same time, I am not prepared to go so far as to say that a combination of words from foreign languages so little known in this country that it would suggest no meaning except to a few scholars, might not be regarded as an invented word. It is in this respect that I desire to qualify my assent to A. L. Smith, L.J.'s, proposition that an invented word can never have a meaning.

Coming now to the particular case under discussion, I cannot doubt that the word "Solio" is an invented word, unless it is to be regarded as the Italian word solio, which means a throne, in which case it has certainly no reference to the character or quality of photographic paper. If it is not to be so regarded, it has of itself no meaning. As I have said, I think it unimportant, if it be an invented word, whether it has reference to the character or quality of the good or not; but if this were the test of the validity of the word as a trade-mark, I must say that I think there is no such reference. I daresay that it might occur to some minds given to etymology that sol, the Latin word for sun, was a component part of it when they found it connected with photographic paper, but the same minds would equally find other root bases for the word if they found it connected with boots or agricultural implements. It seems to me to have no reference to the character or quality of the goods in the sense in which those words must have been used by the Legislature. I think the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. In 1883 the Legislature for the first time allowed persons to register as trade-marks words not used as trade-marks before August, 1875. The privilege was conferred by adding to the words "a distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket," which were substantially taken from the Act of 1875, the words, "or fancy word or words not in common use." To be capable of registration as a new trade-mark, it was therefore required by the Act of 1883 that the word proposed to be registered should be a "fancy word," "distinctive," and "not in common use." Everybody knows the trouble which that enactment gave. In trying to construe it the courts were almost driven to despair, until at last in the Court of Appeal the learned judges declared that, to be a fancy word, a word must be "obviously meaningless," though one of those two learned judges seems to have retracted or qualified his opinion before the next case was called on.

For these very troublesome words in the Act of 1883 the Act of 1888 substituted the expression "an invented word or words." It made the substituted expression a separate, independent, and sufficient condition of registration. And now, if a proposed trade-mark consists of or contains an invented word or invented words, it is capable of registration. But the word must be really an invented word: nothing short of invention will do. On the other hand, nothing more seems to be required. If it is an invented word—if it is "new and freshly coined" (to adapt an old and familiar quotation), it seems to me that it is no objection that it may be traced to a foreign source, or that it may contain a covert and skilful allusion to the character or quality of the goods—I do not think that it is necessary that it should be wholly meaningless. To give an illustration, everybody will remember that in a book of striking humour and fancy, which was in everybody's hands when it was first published, there is a collection of strange words where "there are" (to use the language of the author) "two meanings packed up into one word." No one would say that those were not invented words. Still, they contain a meaning—a meaning is wrapped up in them if you can only find it out. The object of putting a restriction on words capable of being registered as trade-marks was, of course, to prevent persons appropriating to themselves that which ought to be open to all. There is a "perpetual struggle" going on, as Fry, L.J., has observed in In re Dunn's Trade-Marks (41 Ch. D. 439, 37 W. R. Dig. 186), "to enclose and appropriate as private property certain little strips of the great open common of the English language. That," he added, "is a kind of trespass against which I think the courts ought to set their faces." And I think the Legislature has set its face against it both in the Act of 1883 and in the Act of 1888. There is little danger of the apprehended mischief if invention is required as a condition of registration. After all, invention is not so very common. Turning to the present case, I think the word "Solio" may pass for an invented word, and not the less so because it was hit upon by a lucky accident. I should think so even if I thought that it contained in itself an obscure reference to the great source of light. The goods were intended to be used for photographic purposes; but speaking for myself I must confess that, without explanation from others—better scholars, it may be, or worse—it never would have occurred to me to connect "Solio" with the Latin word for the sun. I therefore agree in the motion proposed.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of opinion that, upon the true construction of section 10 of the Act of 1888, sub-sections (d) and (e) of section 10 are independent of each other, and that no portion of sub-section (e) can be introduced into sub-section (d). The two sub-sections represent different heads, which entitle the trade-mark to be registered. Sub-section (d) refers to an invented word simpliciter; sub-section (e) refers to a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods.

In this case "Solio" is, so far as the English language is concerned, an invented word; indeed, Lindley, L.J., in his judgment in the Court of Appeal says, "Nobody ever heard of it before, and in that sense it is an invented word;" but he proceeds to hold that it had some reference to the character or quality of the goods, and consequently could not be registered. I find no such restriction in sub-section (d); the restriction on the use of such words is in sub-section (e); and I cannot see how a limitation or restriction found in sub-section (e) can be introduced into sub-section (d). Therefore, given an invented word, in my opinion it is capable of registration. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The separation of the clauses in the section of the statutes in question by the letters "d" and "e" and the alternative particle "or," satisfy me that the two clauses are independent, and to be construed as independent provisions, so that the terms of section (e) do not control or affect the terms of section (d). At the same time I agree with your lordships, and particularly with what has been said by Lord Macnaghten, in thinking, especially after the decision to be given in this case, that the Comptroller-General will be fully warranted in taking care that there shall not be admitted, under the guise or cover of words called "invented" by the applicant, words really in ordinary use, which might, in a disguised form, have reference to the character or quality of the goods. There must be invention, and not the appearance of invention only. It is not possible to define the extent of invention required, but the words I think should be clearly and substantially different from any word in ordinary and common use. The employment of a word in such use, with a diminutive or a short and meaningless syllable added to it, or a mere combination of two known words, would not be an invented word; and a word would not be "invented" which, with some trifling addition or very trifling variation, still leaves the word one which is well known or in ordinary use, and which would be quite understood as intended to convey the meaning of such a word.

PRESTON (MAYOR, &c.) v. BIORNSTAD.
THE "RATATA." (a.)

Ship — Harbour authority — Collision — Damage — Efficient tugs.

The appellants were the port and harbour authority of Preston, and were entitled to make contracts for towage of vessels using that port. The respondent's ship, under the directions of the harbour authority, was towed up the river on the flood tide towards Preston, preceded by two other vessels, also in tow. These tugs were hired by the appellants. Owing to the delay of the foremost tug the respondent's ship grounded and received considerable damage.

Held, that the appellant corporation were liable for the damage caused.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (The Ratata, [1897] P. 118, 45 W. R. Dig. 118, 152) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Mayor and Corporation of Preston from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Chitty, L.JJ.) reversing the decree of the President (Sir F. H. Jeune), who had dismissed the action.

The facts were given in the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The plaintiffs in this case are the owners of a Norwegian barque called The Ratata, and they sue the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Preston for damage caused to that vessel by the grounding of it in the River Ribble on the 24th of July, 1895.

The corporation of Preston are the port and harbour authority, and, besides filling that character, they have the right to make contracts for towage of vessels using the port of Preston, and to licence other persons to exercise the same business. It is important to bear in mind the two capacities filled by the corporation. It appears that the port of Preston is a considerable distance from the sea, and the ordinary course of business is that the harbour-master, who appears to act in a double capacity, arranges the time when vessels shall be towed up the river during the time that the state of the tide allows them to reach their destination in safety. The width of the river is such that only one vessel can occupy its width at the same time; when, therefore, there are more vessels to be towed up in the same tide they must go in line one after the other.

On the occasion on which the accident arose the directions as to the time of departure were given in ordinary course by the harbour-master. The Ratata was towed by a steam-tug, and two other vessels started to accomplish the same end—namely, the arrival at Preston during the same tide, before the ebb should create any danger of grounding. The vessel now in question was placed last of the line of ships, and according to the evidence there should have been no difficulty in arriving at the port before the tide should ebb. The Vixen was the name of the steamer which was towing the foremost vessel, and for some reason The Vixen was unable to proceed at the ordinary rate at which it was expected and intended to proceed. The result was that The Ratata grounded before arriving at her destination, and received considerable damage in so doing. The action was brought to recover the damage incident to this misfortune.

The contract of towage was preceded by a correspondence, which in substance invited the owners of The Ratata to come to the port, but undertaking to lighten the ship, if it should be proved to be necessary, at the expense of the corporation. No written contract between the parties has been put in evidence, but your lordships are invited to infer what the contract was from the ordinary course pursued between shipowners and contractors for towage. Looking at the facts, I should infer that while on the one hand there is no warranty by the contracting towers that the vessel shall arrive in time to avoid grounding, on the other hand I think it is clear that they undertook to exercise reasonable care and skill in the performance of the obligation which they took upon themselves for hire and reward in conducting the business of the towage to its consummation. Looking at the nature of the thing to be done, I should say they were bound to have reasonable knowledge of the state of the tide, inasmuch as they are to give the signal for the starting of the operations; reasonable care and skill in conducting the operation itself, where, as in this case, a number of vessels have to be brought up during the same tide; and reasonable care in providing adequate steam power to accomplish the object in question. It appears to me that in this case it is made out that they failed in the contract obligation which they undertook, and I think the plaintiffs were entitled to complain that in the combined operations the defendants were conducting either—first, they did not lighten the ship sufficiently; or secondly, that they did not place The Ratata, considering her draught, as lightened by them, as first in the line; or thirdly—and on this matter most reliance was placed at the trial—that they supplied an inefficient steamer to the leading vessel, the necessary effect of which was to delay The Ratata, which could not pass or go abreast of the vessel thus made to proceed too slowly, and the catastrophe undoubtedly did arise from the unusual and abnormal slowness of The Vixen.

It is said that The Vixen was not the property of the corporation, but was only hired by it for the occasion. It appears to me that that consideration is immaterial. The Vixen was engaged in what I have called the "combined operation," an operation which is necessarily combined by reason of the circumstance that the river will not permit two vessels to go abreast. If the corporation put an inefficient tug at the head of the line it follows that the effect of that inefficiency of the leading tug will involve the consequences, not only to the vessel that that tug itself is drawing, but to all the other vessels that follow it. Indeed, it was but faintly contended that, if the vessel had belonged as property to the corporation, the corporation would not have been liable for the inefficiency of the tug which they provided. It was said that the corporation were not liable for a chartered tug; but this chartered tug was under the general direction and control of the corporation. It was performing corporation work for which the corporation was to be paid, and it appears to me that the ownership of the tug, in the sense of its ultimate ownership, is immaterial. For the time during which this contract business was being performed it was the tug of the corporation, and its inefficiency was an inefficiency for which the corporation, as contractors for towage with reasonable care and skill, were responsible.

But it is then said that the plaintiffs should have given evidence to show that The Vixen on this occasion was inefficient, and should have proved the cause of its inefficiency, which might, peradventure, be some cause for which, upon the contract in question, the corporation would not have been responsible. I am of opinion that this is altogether erroneous. The fact that it was an inefficient tug on this occasion is proved by the defendants themselves when they show how on other occasions it had properly and efficiently performed its functions. If it was suggested that it was some extraordinary and unusual event—and as this was not a contract of warranty the defendants would have been entitled to insist on that as a defence—it was for the defendants to prove it. Two causes only are suggested in the course of the trial: one, the badness of the coal—itself supplied by the corporation; the other, the unskilfulness or neglect of the stokers. In either event, as it appears to me, the corporation cannot avail themselves, as against the owners of The Ratata, of the unskilfulness of their tug or the bad material, the use of which placed the obstruction in the way of The Ratata and was the cause of the calamity.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

False and maticious prosecution—Bankruptcy petition—Reasonable or probable cause—Motive—Abuse of remedy sought—Fraud upon court.

A plaintiff or petitioner who institutes and insists in a process before the bankruptcy or any other court, in circumstances which make it an abuse of the remedy sought, or a fraud upon the court, cannot be said to have acted in that proceeding either with reasonable or probable cause. But to constitute an abuse of process or a fraud upon the court, mere motive, however reprehensible, will not be sufficient; it must be shown that the remedy would be unsuitable and would enable the persons obtaining it fraudulently to defeat the rights of others.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, and DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The appellant, in August, 1896, brought the present action of damages against the respondent, before the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The declaration sets forth that the respondent falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, presented a petition to the judge in bankruptcy, praying that a sequestration order might be made in respect of the estate of the appellant, according to the provisions of the New South Wales Bankruptcy Act of 1887, upon the allegation that the appellant had committed an act of bankruptcy, inasmuch as he did not comply with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice procured at the instigation of the respondent to be issued by one Alexander Hallen against the appellant; that the appellant showed cause against the said petition, and disputed the commission of the said act of bankruptcy, and that the said petition was dismissed; that it was afterwards ordered by the judge in bankruptcy that the said bankruptcy notice should be set aside, and that it was thereupon declared by the judge that the said act of bankruptcy had not been committed by the appellant; that all proceedings in respect of the said petition were, upon such dismissal and order and declaration as aforesaid, determined; and that the appellant had, by reason of the premises, been damaged in his business and otherwise. The declaration was met by a note of pleas and demurrer for the respondent, the terms of which it is unnecessary to recite.

Upon these pleadings the parties joined issue, and the case went to trial before Cohen, J., and a jury, on the 14th of December, 1896, when three witnesses, including himself, were examined for the appellant. At the close of the appellant's evidence, the respondent moved for a nonsuit, which was allowed by the presiding judge. On the 29th of December, 1896, the appellant filed a rule nisi, calling upon the respondent to show cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and a new trial granted. After hearing counsel for the appellant, the court by a majority, consisting of Darley, C.J., and Owen, J., refused the rule. Stephen, J., was of opinion that the rule should be allowed to go on, in order that the points raised might be more fully argued.

It appears from the evidence that the appellant, who had previously carried on business as a stevedore and wool presser, on the 2nd of August, 1893, entered into partnership, for the term of five years, with one William Collins, under the firm name of H. J. King & Co., for the purpose of carrying on the business of wool pressers, stevedores, and shipping agents, at Sydney and elsewhere. By the contract of co-partnery it was stipulated that Collins should, if he thought fit, be at liberty to remain in his employment of shipping clerk in the office of the German Australian Steamship Co., and to accept any other similar position during the continuance of the partnership; and also that the appellant should have the active conduct of the business of the firm, and should receive a salary of £400 per annum, payable in equal monthly instalments. The respondent was the manager of the German Australian Steamship Co. He was desirous of becoming a partner of the firm of H. J. King & Co., and it was in consequence of the refusal of his employers to allow him to accept that position that Collins became a partner. The respondent was also agent for one Ernest Wood, a merchant in London, who, on the 14th of August 1893, agreed to advance the sum of £500 to the appellant and Collins in loan, for behoof of the new firm. The advance was arranged by the respondent on Wood's behalf. It does not appear that any capital was contributed by the appellant; but Collins put into the business a sum of £200, which he borrowed from the respondent.

On the 17th of March, 1894, the sum of £500, which Wood had agreed to lend to the firm, was paid to the appellant and his partner, Collins; and, upon the same day, they executed a bill of sale to Wood of the plant, stock-in-trade, machinery, fixtures, and book-debts of the firm in security of the loan. The appellant requested that the bill of sale should not be registered; and to that the respondent, as representing Wood, consented. Further advances were subsequently made to the firm by Mr. Wood, through the respondent; the entire loan amounting, on the 26th of March, 1896, to £1,599 11s. 6d. On that date, the firm agreed that the bill of sale of the 17th of March, 1894, should extend to, and stand as security for the whole loan then due to Mr. Wood.

In July, 1894, Charles Taylor, who was recommended by the respondent, became a member of the firm, under an agreement with the appellant and Collins. He paid £1,000 into the firm, and in return received the right to one-eighth share, and to a salary of £350 per annum, payable by monthly instalments. During the following year there was some unpleasantness between the respondent and Mr. Collins, which resulted in the latter leaving the employment of the German Australian Co. Thereupon the respondent informed the appellant that Collins would have to leave the firm of H. J. King & Co., else he would not finance the business, and would "close down under his bill of sale." On the 5th of June, 1895, Collins retired from the firm, his interest having been purchased by the appellant and his partner Taylor for the sum of £250. In order to meet that payment the respondent advanced £100 in cash to the firm, who gave Collins their promissory note for the balance of £150. It was proposed at that time that, in consideration of his advance, the partners of the firm should hold, at the disposal of the respondent, part of the share in the business which they had purchased from Collins; but, although the matter was discussed between the appellant and the respondent, the arrangement does not appear to have been carried into effect.

In the beginning of the year 1896 the firm of H. J. King & Co. was evidently not in a prosperous condition. Hallen, one of their employees, who, in April, 1895, had been injured on board a German ship which they were loading, recovered judgment against the appellant and Taylor for £341 18s. 9d. on the 20th of February, 1896. The injured man had been insured by the firm, but the office with which the insurance was effected had gone into liquidation. After the judgment the appellant had interviews with the respondent, at some of which Taylor was present, the object and result of which are thus explained by the appellant in his evidence: "I wanted defendant to lend me more money, as he had done on many occasions. He declined. Defendant or Taylor proposed I should go out of H. King & Co. It was in the beginning of March. I had several interviews. I don't know anything was said about money. I was simply to go out of the business and get nothing. I declined. Defendant pressed me on many occasions to do this." On the 26th of March, 1896, the respondent, acting on behalf of his constituent Mr. Wood, gave formal notice to the firm that, in default of immediate payment of the sum of £1,599 11s. 6d. then due to Mr. Wood he would take possession of the chattels and things comprised in the indenture of the 17th of March. Default having been made, the respondent entered into possession. The appellant states in his evidence, "I did not consider the firm indebted to Wood in £1,599 odd;" but the statement can hardly be accepted, because the witness admits that the amount named stood in the books of the firm at the credit of Wood, and it is not disputed that on the 26th of March, 1896, his partner Taylor executed, on behalf of the firm, an acknowledgment which was indorsed upon the original bill of sale, to the effect that the debt then due to Wood amounted to £1,599 11s. 6d. On the 30th of March, 1896, the appellant sent a letter to the respondent, making an offer (which was declined on the same day) to pay a specified sum as in full discharge of the liabilities of his firm. In that letter the appellant wrote that, if the respondent could not see his way to accept the offer therein made to him "I shall feel constrained to sequestrate the estate for the protection of the creditors."

On the 7th of April, 1896, Hallen, under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1887-1888, took out a bankruptcy notice against the appellant, requiring him to make payment of the sum of £341 18s. 9d., for which he, Hallen, held a joint and several decree against the appellant and his partner, Taylor, within seven days after service of the notice, excluding the day of notice. The notice was served on the appellant upon the following day, the 8th of April. Their lordships may observe that there is no evidence beyond the following facts, which are not conclusive, tending to support the averment made by the appellant in his declaration, to the effect that such notice by Hallen was procured or issued at the instigation of the respondent. The respondent on the 2nd of April, 1896, gave to Sly and Russell, who conducted the present suit on his behalf in the court below, his promissory note for £150, as an advance to Taylor, for whom they were then acting, in order to enable him to meet his liabilities under Hallen's decree. Sly and Russell, after correspondence with Hallen's solicitor in regard to the sum which would be accepted from their client, on the 8th of April, 1896, endorsed the promissory note to him, in satisfaction of Taylor's indebtedness.

No payment having been made by the appellant within the time prescribed by the notice, Hallen, on the 16th of April, 1896, presented a petition for sequestration of his estate to the judge in bankruptcy, in which he set forth that the appellant was indebted to him in the sum of £191 18s. 9d., being the balance of the sum of £341 18s. 9d. contained in the judgment aforesaid. On the 5th of May, 1896, the appellant paid to Hallen the sum of £218 4s. 2d., being in full of the balance of £195 due by him, together with interest and costs. On the 11th of May, 1896, Hallen, who had by that time received payment of his debt, with interest and costs, withdrew his petition for sequestration.

On the 8th of May, 1896, the respondent, who was a creditor of the appellant for the sum of £260 10s. due by promissory note of the 12th of February, 1896, filed, in that capacity, a petition for an order sequestrating the appellant's estate. The petition set forth that, within six months before the date of its presentation, the appellant had committed an act of bankruptcy, inasmuch as he had failed, within the period prescribed by the Act, after service of the bankruptcy order by Hallen on the 8th of April, to comply with the requirements of the notice, or to satisfy the judge that he had a counter-claim, set-off, or cross-demand equal to or exceeding the amount of the judgment debt, which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. The petition was opposed by the appellant; and, on the 3rd of July, 1896, the registrar in bankruptcy, after hearing evidence, made an order to the effect that the petition of the respondent "be and the same is hereby dismissed out of this court."

On the 7th of August, 1896, Manning, J., sitting as judge in bankruptcy, made an order in these terms: "Upon motion made to me this day on behalf of the above-named Hugh John King" (the present appellant) "and upon reading the bankruptcy notice herein dated the seventh day of April last, and the affidavits of the said Hugh John King and of Henry White sworn on the sixteenth and eighteenth days of May last, and there being no appearance for the judgment creditor, upon hearing Mr. Wise as counsel for the said Hugh John King: It is ordered that the said bankruptcy notice issued herein by the said Alexander Hallen on the said seventh day of April last past, be and the same is hereby set aside. And it is further declared that no act of bankruptcy has been committed by the said Hugh John King under the said notice of the said seventh day of April last past." From the terms of the foregoing order, it is obvious that the respondent was no party to these proceedings; and it is not wonderful that Hallen, the judgment creditor who took out the notice, should not have appeared in them, seeing that he had obtained full payment of his debt with costs more than two months previously. Independently of these considerations, their lordships are of opinion that the order of the learned judge, in so far as it declares that no act of bankruptcy had been committed by the appellant, went beyond his jurisdiction, and was unwarranted by the Bankruptcy Act of the Colony. These Acts define, with great minuteness, the various ways in which an act of bankruptcy may be constituted, one of them being by a bankruptcy notice under section 4 (2) of the principal Act. When an application is made for a sequestration order, which complies with the requirements of sections 6, 7, and 8 of the same Act, ample discretion is vested in the judge either to grant or refuse the petition; and, if a sequestration order be made, it may subsequently (section 5 (II.)) be discharged or annulled. But whilst the judge may, in his discretion, competently refuse to follow up an act of bankruptcy by issuing a sequestration order, the statutes give him no jurisdiction to annul an act of bankruptcy, or to declare that it never was committed. There is no authority to be found for the procedure of the learned judge, save in the fifty-first of the general rules framed by the court, which provides that "when the judge makes an order setting aside the bankruptcy notice, he may at the same time declare that no act of bankruptcy has been committed by the debtor under such notice." Now, the only power which the court has to frame rules is confirmed by section 119 of the principal Act, and it is strictly limited to rules "for the purpose of regulating any matter under this Act." In the opinion of their lordships, a rule empowering the judge to make a declaration that no act of bankruptcy had been committed under the notice is in no sense a regulation either framed or calculated to carry out the objects of the Act. It is, in their opinion, the new creation of a jurisdiction which the Legislature withheld, it is inconsistent with and so far repeals the plain enactments of the statute, and it takes away from creditors the absolute right which the statute gave them of founding a petition for a sequestration order upon the bankruptcy notice.

Upon the hearing of this appeal, it was maintained for the appellant that the orders of the court below ought to be reversed, and the action remitted for new trial, upon two separate grounds: the first of these being that certain documentary evidence had been unduly rejected by the presiding judge; and the second, that the learned judge, instead of directing a nonsuit, ought to have submitted to the jury certain issues which were only fitted for their consideration. Their lordships do not think that either of these objections, which they will notice in their order, is well-founded.

At the trial, the decision of the registrar, dated the 3rd of July, 1896, dismissing the respondent's petition for an order sequestrating the appellant's estate, was admitted without objection. But an objection was taken when the appellant's counsel tendered in evidence, "the full written judgment" delivered by the registrar on that occasion. The document thus tendered was, in their lordships' opinion, rightly rejected by the presiding judge. Section 8, sub-sections 2 and 4, of the New South Wales Act of 1887, give the registrar no jurisdiction, except to grant or to dismiss a creditor's petition for sequestration. The terms of that clause and of these sub-sections are substantially the same with those of section 7, sub-sections 2 and 3, of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and it was held by the Court of Appeal, in Ex parte Vitoria, 42 W. R. 529, [1894] 2 Q. B. D. 387, that the decision of the registrar, affirming the insufficiency of the petitioning creditor's debt, did not constitute res judicata. Lord Esher, M.R., observed, "all that he (i.e., the registrar) can do is, to refuse to make a receiving order in respect of the judgment debt. That is the limit of his discretion. That being so, the case does not come within the doctrine of res judicata at all." In their lordships' opinion, these observations are equally applicable to the statute of New South Wales. The order made by the registrar on the 3rd of July, 1896, is very properly confined to a simple dismissal of the respondent's petition. The reasons by which he was influenced, or which he may have thought fit to assign in delivering judgment, are immaterial, because they could not raise an estoppel against the respondent; and the document tendered, if it had been admitted, would have amounted to nothing more than hearsay evidence of the opinion of an individual upon points which he had no jurisdiction to determine.

In support of his other and more serious objection to the conduct and result of the trial, the appellant's counsel mainly relied upon the evidence, as showing or tending to show that, in presenting his petition for a sequestration order, the respondent was actuated, not by an honest wish to secure payment of the debt which the appellant owed him, but by a desire to effect the exclusion of the appellant from the firm of H. J. King & Co. He maintained that the respondent's resort to sequestration in bankruptcy, with that motive and with that object, constituted an abuse of the process of the court, and a fraud; and that the judge ought, in some form, to have remitted to the jury the question whether the respondent had been guilty of such abuse and fraud, with the direction that, in the event of their answering the question in the affirmative, they ought to return a verdict for the appellant.

Their lordships do not dispute the soundness of the proposition that a plaintiff or petitioner, who institutes and insists in a process before the bankruptcy or any other court, in circumstances which make it an abuse of the remedy sought, or a fraud upon the court, cannot be said to have acted in that proceeding either with reasonable or probable cause. But, in using that language, it becomes necessary to consider what will, in the proper legal sense of the words, be sufficient to constitute what is generally known as an abuse of process or as fraud upon the court. In the opinion of their lordships, mere motive, however reprehensible, will not be sufficient for that purpose; it must be shown that, in the circumstances in which the interposition of the court is sought, the remedy would be unsuitable, and would enable the person obtaining it fraudulently to defeat the rights of others, whether legal or equitable.

In Ex parte Gallimore, 2 Rose 424, a tenant moved to set aside a commission of bankruptcy, issued at the instance of his landlord upon two grounds, (1) that he was not a trader within the meaning of the statutes then in force, and (2) that the commission had been taken out by his landlord, contrary to the good faith of their mutual contract, with the object of determining his mineral lease. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon) directed issues to try the question whether the applicant was a trader. With regard to the second ground upon which the motion was based, the noble and learned lord, in giving judgment, observed, "I see no reason why the process in bankruptcy should not be affected by the same species of fraud which would affect and set aside any other process in any other court." In the subsequent case of Ex parte Wilbran, 5 Madd. 1, which depended before the Vice-Chancellor (Sir John Leach), a mercantile firm who were creditors of another firm arrested its individual partners, all of whom put in bail, with the exception of Wilbran, who remained in prison for two months, when he was made bankrupt by the incarcerating creditors. Wilbran then petitioned to supersede the commission, on the ground that it had been unfairly used for the purpose of dissolving the partnership in so far as he was concerned. The petition was opposed by the creditor firm, who did not, apparently, dispute the fact that they desired and intended to put an end to Wilbran's connection with his firm, but pleaded that such motive was not a ground of interference, either on general equity, or as an abuse of the commission. Sir John Leach, after conferring with the Lord Chancellor, dismissed the petition. His honour said "that a commission was, in a qualified sense, a legal right, like an action, and that courts of justice had no concern with the motives of parties who asserted a legal right. In Ex parte Harcourt, 2 Rose 203, the bankrupt himself, with a view to dissolve the partnership, procured a commission to be issued against him. Being the bankrupt's commission it could not stand. In Ex parte Gallimore the commission was used for a fraudulent purpose. He fully adopted the principle of these cases. Here it appeared that the petitioning creditors, having no concert with the other partners, desired to operate a dissolution, considering it an advantageous measure for them that the bankrupt should not continue in a firm with which they had large dealings. There was in this no fraud, and it is not enough that there be a bye-motive unless there be fraud."

The very intelligible principle which was recognized in Ex parte Wilbran does not appear to their lordships to have been departed from in any of the subsequent decisions which were brought under their notice by the industry of the appellant's counsel. Motive cannot in itself constitute fraud, although it may incite the person who entertains it to adopt proceedings which, if successful, would necessarily lead to a fraudulent result; and it is not the motive, but the course of procedure which leads to that result, which the law regards as constituting fraud. In In re Davies, 25 W. R. 239, 3 Ch. D. 461, the Court of Appeal refused to make an adjudication in bankruptcy where it was clearly shown that the proceeding had been used and was meant to be used for the illegitimate and fraudulent purpose of extorting money from the debtor. And, again, in Ex parte Griffin, 28 W. R. 208, 12 Ch. D. 480, the same court, although there was a good petitioning creditor's debt, and an act of bankruptcy had been committed, refused to make an adjudication. The ratio of the decision was thus explained by James, L.J.: "I think I never knew a case so transparent as to the fraud with which the whole thing was conceived, and the oppression which it was intended to exercise. It would, I think, be a shocking thing for any court of justice in a civilized country to be made the instrument of proceedings like these."

Counsel for the appellant argued, with great plausibility, that on the trial of a case like the present, involving the inquiry whether the proceedings complained of were taken without reasonable and probable cause, it is within the province of the jury, and not of the judge, to find the facts upon which the question of probable cause depends, and that it is for the judge, upon these facts, to determine the question of law. The rule was so laid down by the House of Lords in Lister v. Perryman, L.R. 4 H. L. 521, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 14. Their lordships admit the propriety and cogency of the rule in any and every case where the facts admit of its application. But it appears to them that the circumstances of the present case, as these are disclosed in the evidence of the appellant, are very different in their character from the facts, as appearing in the evidence, with which noble and learned lords had to deal in Lister v. Perryman. It certainly is not the duty of the presiding judge to submit any issue of fact to the jury which is not fairly raised by the evidence. There is, no doubt, evidence by the appellant tending to show that the respondent, in petitioning for a sequestration order, was influenced by a desire to get the appellant out of the firm of H. J. King & Co. But their lordships have been unable to find in the evidence any fact or circumstance calculated to raise the question whether, in petitioning for sequestration of the appellant's estate, the respondent had committed a fraud upon the law or upon the court; and, in their opinion, the learned judge would not have been justified in raising such an issue, even if he had been invited to do so.

Their lordships are satisfied that, in point of fact, no such issue was raised by the appellant in either of the courts below. There is no reference to it in the note made by the presiding judge of the argument of the appellant's counsel against the respondent's motion for a nonsuit; and, what is of more importance, it is not raised in the memorandum for a rule nisi which was filed by the appellant. In that document, it is pleaded (Art. 7) that the learned judge ought to have ascertained by the verdict of the jury whether the respondent presented his bankruptcy petition for the concealed purpose of forcing the appellant out of the partnership of H. J. King & Co.; and also (Art. 11) ought to have directed the jury that "the presentation of a petition for an ulterior private purpose other than the equal distribution of a debtor's assets is a fraud upon the court of bankruptcy." A direction in these terms would, according to their lordships' opinion, have been clearly erroneous. A desire and intention, on the part of the petitioning creditor, to terminate a partnership connection between the debtor and a firm which owed money to him and to Mr. Wood, whom he represented as agent, is simply a bye-motive, which would not taint his procedure unless there were proof of positive fraud, which is absent in this case. It was not necessary for the learned judge to submit any question to the jury as to the alleged motive of the respondent; because, on the assumption that it did exist, which has never been seriously disputed, there are no legal grounds for coming to the conclusion that the respondent had acted without reasonable and probable cause.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from. The appellant must pay to the respondent his costs of this appeal.

Lottery—Prize competition—Prediction of number of births and deaths in London in a given week—Chance—Skill.

A newspaper proprietor advertised in his paper that a prize of £1,000 would be given to the person who correctly predicted the number of births (male and female) and deaths in London, as disclosed by the Registrar-General's returns, during the week in which the particular number of the paper was published. Each prediction had to be written on a voucher printed in the paper, and forwarded to the proprietor.

Held, that the competition was not a lottery.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Lawrance, J., at the trial of the action with a jury at Leeds. The facts were as follows:

The defendant was the proprietor of a paper called the Rocket. He announced in the issue of the paper for the 11th of December, 1897, that a prize of £1,000 was offered for a correct prediction of the number of male and female births and the number of deaths in London during the week ending the 11th of December, 1897. The competitors had to fill in and sign the accompanying voucher, paste it on a sheet of paper, and send it with a coupon cut from the front page of the Rocket in accordance with the instructions given. The voucher contained the following words, "I say that the number of births and the number of deaths in London during the week ending the 11th of December, 1897, as disclosed by the Registrar-General's returns, will be—" Then followed spaces for the competitor to insert the number of births (male), births (female), and deaths. The answers were to be sent in so as to reach the office of the Rocket not later than the first post on the 10th of December. Competitors were not limited to one prediction, but each prediction had to be written on a voucher cut from the current issue of the paper. If more than one correct prediction was received the £1,000 would be divided. The advertisement also stated that according to the Registrar-General's returns the number of births and the number of deaths in London during the week ending the 12th of December, 1896, were as follows, births (males) 1,342, ditto (females), 1,213; deaths, 1,539."

The plaintiff alleged that he had sent in a correct prediction and brought this action against the defendant to recover the £1,000. The action was tried without pleadings, and the defence raised at the trial was that the plaintiff's answer had never been received. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, but on the application of counsel for the defendant, Lawrance, J., entered judgment for the defendant on the ground that the competition was a lottery. The plaintiff appealed. The defendant had died since the trial of the action, and his personal representatives had been served in the notice of appeal, but they did not appear.

Brooke Little, for the plaintiff.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that this competition was a lottery. The winning of the prize by making a correct prediction was not dependent on mere chance. This competition afforded scope for the exercise of some degree of skill—namely, in the making a calculation from the returns of the Registrar-General for previous years as to the probable number of births and deaths in London during the week in question.

He referred to Caminada v. Hulton, 60 L. J. M. C. 116; Morris v. Blackman, 2 H. & C. 912, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 80; Taylor v. Smetten, 11 Q. B. D. 207, 31 W. R. Dig. 115; Barclay v. Pearson, 42 W. R. 74, [1893] 2 Ch. 154; Stoddart v. Sagar 44 W. R. 287, [1895] 2 Q. B. 474.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion this competition was not a lottery. The cases show that to constitute a lottery the matter must be one depending entirely on chance. The solution of the question in this case did not depend entirely on chance. Although it depended largely on chance, there was an element of statistical inquiry brought into the matter. The paper itself gave the number of births and deaths during the corresponding week in the previous year. That would serve as a start for the competitors to make inquiries, and thus an element of investigation and research was introduced into the competition, and the successful prediction was not entirely due to chance. In Caminada v. Hulton a Divisional Court, consisting of Day and Lawrance, JJ., held that an offer of prizes to any purchaser of a book who should fill up a coupon with the names of the winning horses in certain races about to take place was not a lottery, upon the ground, as I understand, that the skilled knowledge of the competitor for the prize was an ingredient in the matter, and their view has been confirmed in Stoddart v. Sagar. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY and COLLINS, L.JJ., concurred.

BONNER v. TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON PERMANENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Assignment—Sub-lease by way of mortgage—Original lessee compelled to pay rent—Right of original lessee to recover from sub-lessee of assignee.

ants for the residue of the term, except the last day, by way of mortgage. The mortgage contained a covenant on the part of the defendants that, if they entered into possession of the premises under their powers, and received the rents and profits, they would pay the rent reserved by the original lease. The defendants entered into possession, and P. became bankrupt. The defendants did not pay the rent reserved by the original lease, and the lessor compelled the plaintiffs to pay it.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover from the defendants the amount so paid for rent.

Appeal from the judgment of Channell, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by lessees who had assigned their lease to recover from mortgagees of their assignee £97, the amount of ground-rent which they had been compelled to pay to the lessor.

By a lease dated the 3rd of April, 1882, Henry Moore demised the premises in question to the plaintiffs for a term of ninety-nine years at a rent of £20 per annum.

On the 5th of April, 1889, the plaintiffs assigned the term to one Price, who covenanted to pay the rent and to indemnify the plaintiffs therefrom.

On the 18th of October, 1889, Price mortgaged the premises to the defendants by a sub-demise of the term except the last day, as security for certain advances made by them to him. The mortgage contained a covenant on the part of the defendants that, if they entered into possession of the premises under their powers and received the rents and profits, they would pay the rent reserved by the lease of the 3rd of April, 1882.

In 1890 the defendants entered into possession of the premises and remained in possession and in receipt of the rents and profits.

In 1891 Price was adjudicated bankrupt.

The defendants did not pay the rent which accrued due while they were in possession, and the lessor compelled the plaintiffs to pay it.

At the trial of the action Channell, J., held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the amount from the defendants, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 30.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an action by plaintiffs who are lessees of premises for a long term to recover from the defendants £97, being rent they have had to pay to their lessor under the covenants in their lease, which rent accrued during the time the defendants were in possession of the premises as mortgagees by way of demise from an assignee of the term. Between the plaintiffs and the defendants there exists neither contract nor privity of estate; the defendants were not liable to pay to the plaintiffs the rent in question, nor were they liable to pay it to the plaintiffs' lessor. In these circumstances my brother Channell gave judgment for the defendants, being of opinion that the action was not maintainable, and that the principle of the decision in Moule v. Garrett, 18 W. R. 697, 20 Ibid. 416, L. R. 5 Ex. 132, 7 Ibid. 101, did not apply, the defendants being under-lessees and not assignees of the term as in the case cited. My brother Channell held, as I read his judgment, that no request by the defendants to the plaintiffs to pay their lessor the rent in question on their behalf could be implied whereon to maintain the action, and I am of opinion that he was right.

The facts are these. On the 3rd of April, 1882, the owner of the premises, Moore, demised them to the plaintiffs for a term of ninety-nine years at the rent of £20 per annum, which the plaintiffs covenanted to pay. On the 5th of April, 1889, the plaintiffs assigned to Price the residue of the term, Price covenanting with the plaintiffs to pay the covenanted rent and indemnify the plaintiffs therefrom. On the 18th of October, 1889, Price demised by way of mortgage the term less one day to the defendants to secure advances made by them to him, and the defendants covenanted with Price that, if they should enter into possession of the premises and receive the rents and profits, they would pay the yearly rent of £20 per annum reserved by the lease of the 3rd of April, 1882. In November 1891, Price was adjudicated bankrupt. The defendants have entered into possession of the premises under their mortgage, and have received the rents and profits thereof in part satisfaction of their mortgage debt, and they have remained in possession ever since. The defendants have not paid the rent which accrued whilst they were in possession, and Moore, the landlord, has compelled the plaintiffs, his lessees, under the covenant in their lease with him, to do so; they have done so, and they now sue the defendants to recover the amount they have thus had to pay to Moore.

It is clear that no contract or privity of estate exists between the plaintiffs and the defendants, nor between the original lessor, Moore, and the defendants; and, unless there be circumstances from which a request to pay can be implied, or in other words a contract can be implied between the defendants and the plaintiffs that the defendants would indemnify the plaintiffs if they paid to their landlord the rent accruing whilst they, the defendants, were in possession, there are no circumstances which will support an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover the amount so paid. It is true that Moore could sue the plaintiffs, his lessees, upon their covenants with him in the lease. It is also true that the plaintiffs, the lessees, could sue their assignee, Price, upon his covenant with them. It is also true that Price could sue the defendants, his under-lessees, upon their covenant with him. But how can the plaintiffs sue the defendants? I omit Price's trustee in bankruptcy, for he, in my opinion, does not affect this case. It is said that the case of Moule v. Garrett shows that the plaintiffs can sue the defendants to recover what they have been compelled to pay to their lessor, and that this case falls within the principle of that case. Now what was the case of Moule v. Garrett? It was a case in which there had been two assignments of the term, the defendant being the second assignee thereof. First of all there was, as here, a lease from the lessor to the lessee, Moule, the plaintiff in the action, containing the usual covenants by a lessee. Moule afterwards assigned the term to Bartley, who afterwards assigned the term to the defendant Garrett, who then committed breaches of covenants in the lease. Moule, having been compelled under his covenant with his lessor to pay to him damages for these breaches committed by the defendant Garrett, the assignee of Bartley, sued Garrett to recover the amount so paid by him, Moule, to his lessor. It was held that, inasmuch as both the plaintiff and the defendant were compellable to pay to the original lessor the damages accruing to him for the breaches of covenant by the defendant whilst assignee of the term, the former by reason of his covenant with the original lessor and the latter by reason of his being assignee of the term and having committed the breaches whilst assignee, and inasmuch as the plaintiff had been compelled to pay damages to his lessor for these breaches of covenant by the defendant, which the defendant was also compellable under privity of estate to pay to the lessor, he, the defendant, was liable to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of these payments of which the defendant had had the benefit. For, as Willes, J., puts it in Roberts v. Crowe, L. R. 7 C. P. 629, at p. 637, 20 W. R. C. L. Dig. 18, the lessee is liable for breaches of covenant committed by the assignee, but being only secondarily liable he has his remedy over against the person primarily liable—that is, the assignee. The ratio decidendi of Moule v. Garrett is this: If A. is compellable to pay B. damages which C. is also compellable to pay B., then A., having been compelled to pay B, can maintain an action against C. for money so paid, for the circumstances raise an implied request by C. to A. to make such payment in his case. In other words, A. can call upon C. to indemnify him: see the notes to Lampleigh v. Brathwait, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, at p. 160 (9th ed.), and cases there cited. To raise this implied request both A and C. must, in my judgment, be compellable to pay B., otherwise, as it seems to me, the payment by A. to B. so far as regards C. is a voluntary payment, which raises no implication of a request by C. to A. to pay. If Cockburn, C.J., in his alternative reason in Moule v. Garrett for holding the defendant liable meant this by the expression "by the legal default of another," I agree; but if it means by a default for which he was not compellable to pay in that case to the original lessor, I do not agree, and none of the other learned judges who decided that case adopted what Cockburn, C.J., then said, and, indeed, Willes, J., expressly points out that the obligation of the contract must be common to the plaintiff and the defendant, and the whole benefit must be taken by the defendant. In the present case the defendants are underlessees of an assignee of the term, and are not liable at all to the original lessor for rent whenever it accrued, there being between them and the original lessor neither contract nor privity of estate, and there is no suggestion that there were goods upon the demised premises available for distress other than the goods of the mortgagor Price, even if this would have sufficed to maintain the action, about which I say nothing, for it is not before me. The above, in my judgment, is what was decided in Moule v. Garrett, and the present case, as it appears to me, is an attempt to stretch the decision of that case and to say that the principle therein laid down applies equally to the case of an underlessee of an assignee who is not compellable to pay the original lessor as to the case of an assignee who is compellable to pay the original lessor. It will be seen upon looking at the case of Penley v. Watts, 7 M. & W. 601, at p. 608, that Parke, B., deals with this exact point. He says: "The lessee and his assignee are liable to precisely the same extent, and the assignee is a surety for the lessee, but that is not the case in a sub-lease." And, again, in Moule v. Garrett, in the Exchequer Chamber, when it was suggested that the case of an underlessee of an assignee and an assignee of an assignee were the same, Blackburn, J., said: "No; because the underlessee has never come under any obligation to the lessor, but here the defendant, by taking the same estate which the plaintiff had, has become liable to the same obligation," and this is the foundation of the judgment of the Court of Exchequer delivered by Channell, B., and the ground upon which the judgment was upheld in the Exchequer Chamber. The fact that in this case the defendants covenanted with Price, the assignee, that if they, the defendants, became mortgagees in possession they would pay the rent, gives Price a remedy against them subject to any set-off which may exist between him and them, and does not give the present plaintiffs a right of action against them. In my judgment, for the reasons above, this action is not maintainable. I agree in the judgment of my brother Channell and think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment: The only question in this case is as to the liability of the defendants, who are mortgagees by sub-lease of an assignee of a lease originally granted to the plaintiffs, to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of rent recovered by the lessor against them on their covenant in the lease. The mortgagees entered into possession of the leasehold property by virtue of their sub-term in 1890, and the assignee became bankrupt in 1891.

Now, primâ facie, a sub-lease of a lessee or assignee of a term comes under no liability to the original lessor, either for payment of rent or performance of covenants in the original lease. This is true, whether the sub-lease be by way of sale or by way of mortgage, and entry into possession of the sub-term does not make the sub-lessee liable to the lessor. But it is said that the present case is distinguishable from the ordinary case by the fact that the mortgagees expressly covenanted with their mortgagor (assignee of the lease) that, if they entered into possession, they would out of the rents and profits received by them (among other things) pay the rent, and that they have been, as they have, in possession during the whole time during which the rents recovered by the lessor against the plaintiffs, original lessees, have been accruing. The argument is that they are thus placed in the position of the defendants in Moule v. Garrett, who were held liable to repay to the plaintiff money which the latter had been compelled to pay to the original lessors for breach of covenant in the original lease. In that case the plaintiff, like the plaintiffs here, was original lessee, who had assigned the term before the breach on which he was sued, but the defendants were not, like the defendants here, holders of a sub-term, but were the actual owners at the time of the breach by puisne assignment of the whole of the original term, and in that capacity liable, by privity of estate, to the original lessors for the very damages which had been recovered by them against the original lessee, who in the action was seeking to recover them over. Both plaintiff and defendants were under a direct obligation to pay the rent to the lessors, but the defendants reaped all the benefit of the payment. It was treated as plain that, as between the plaintiff and defendants, the liability of the defendants to the original lessors by privity of estate was in the nature of a primary liability, that of the plaintiff by privity of contract being secondary; and on this ground the plaintiff was held entitled to recover over against the defendants, as though he was in a manner surety for them for payment of their debt. Here there is no privity either of estate or contract between the defendants and either the original lessor or the plaintiff, so that there can be nothing analagous to the relation of principal and surety between them. The reasoning in Moule v. Garrett, therefore, has no application.

If the assignee had been solvent, the plaintiffs would have had a sufficient remedy in recourse to him. The fact of his having become bankrupt can give no right of action against the defendants on the principle of Moule v. Garrett which did not otherwise exist. The Legislature has made provision in the Bankruptcy Acts for the adjustment of rights of bankrupt holders of leases and other parties interested, and it is in bankruptcy, if anywhere, that the plaintiffs must find their remedy.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: In this case Moore by an indenture of lease dated the 3rd of April, 1882, let to the plaintiffs two houses numbered 12 and 14, Lordship-lane, Tottenham, at the yearly rent of £20. The plaintiffs on the 5th of April, 1889, assigned the term to Edward Price, who covenanted to pay the rent of £20 a year reserved by the lease of the 3rd of April, 1882, and to indemnify the plaintiffs therefrom. By an indenture of mortgage dated the 18th of October, 1889, Price, in consideration of the sum of £400 lent him by the defendants, the Tottenham and Edmonton Permanent Investment Building Society, demised to the defendants the said houses for the remainder of the said term of ninety-nine years except the last day of such term by way of mortgage for securing to the society the payment by the mortgagor of 180 advance instalments of £3 14s. each, payable monthly, and all fines and other sums which according to the rules of the society might become payable by him. The mortgage deed provided for the mortgagor remaining in possession until default by the mortgagor in the payment of the instalments and fines or in the payment of the rent reserved by the lease under which the mortgagor held, and that, if such default should be made, the society might distrain for the amount of the monthly payments and fines, and the amount of any payments made by the society under the powers thereby conferred upon them, as for rent in arrear upon a common demise, and might enter into possession of the premises or the rents and profits thereof, and might demise or sell the premises, and should, out of moneys so received by them, whether the same were the rents and profits or purchase-money, pay in the first place the rent reserved by the lease under which the mortgagor held, and, in the next place, retain for the said society all advance instalments, fines, &c., and also such further sum of money as should be equivalent to the sum which, according to the rules of the society, would have to be paid by the mortgagee in case he were about to redeem, and pay the surplus, if any, to the mortgagor. Price has become bankrupt, and the defendants have gone into possession. There is no evidence what rents, profits, or proceeds they have actually received. The only remaining fact is that the plaintiffs have been called on to pay, and have paid, the principal rents since April, 1892.

The question raised in this case—namely, whether an underlessee who is a mortgagee by way of demise from an assignee of the lessee, and who is in possession of the demised lands, can be sued for money paid by the lessee, who has been compelled according to his covenant to pay the rent reserved by the principal lease, has not, so far as I know, been directly determined until now. It is plain that, generally speaking, an underlessee, whether holding of the lessee or of the assignee of the lessee, cannot be under any obligation to indemnify the lessee against the claim of the lessor for the rent reserved by the lease, because the underlessor generally is presumed to indemnify the underlessee against the rent payable by the principal lease (see Jones v. Morris, 3 Exch. 742), and the payment of the rent would not therefore be for his relief. The case of Moule v. Garrett does not determine the question, although it goes far to define the principles upon which the question must be decided. In Moule v. Garrett the defendants were not underlessees, but assignees of the term, and the ground upon which they were held to be liable was that, the lessee and the defendants both being liable to the lessor upon all the covenants in the lease, which ran with the land, the former by contract and the latter by privity of estate, the defendants, having had the whole benefit for which the covenant was entered into by the plaintiff as lessee, were liable to recoup to the plaintiff the amount which he had been compelled to pay the lessor for breaches of covenant occurring during the defendants' possession. Channell, B., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the court, says: "It is true that there is no express covenant between the parties, but they are each liable to the lessor for the performance of the covenants; they are each directly liable, and the lessor may sue either at his option; but the assignee having at the time the estate which has been the consideration for the covenants ought, as between himself and the lessee, to perform them"; and in the Exchequer Chamber Blackburn, J., says: "I express my entire concurrence in what fell from Channell, B."; and Willes, J., says: "I concur upon the ground that where two parties have become bound, the one by contract and the other by estate, to perform the same covenant, the former is entitled to indemnity against the latter to the extent of his interest, although there is no immediate privity of contract between them; and I think that the defendants are liable in this action by reason of their having had the whole benefit for which the covenant was entered into by the plaintiff as lessee. The principle of the decision in Deering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 2 Bos. & P. 270, appears to govern the case." Cockburn, C.J., bases his judgment on precisely the same ground, but adds: "There is another ground upon which the judgment of the court below may be upheld—namely, that the premises, the subject-matter of this lease, being in the possession of the defendants, they were the parties whose duty it was to perform the covenants to be performed upon and in respect of those premises, and whose immediate duty it was to keep those premises in repair. By reason of their default the plaintiff, the original lessee, became liable (although he had parted with the estate) by the terms of his covenant to make good to his lessor the damage which had arisen from the default of the defendants; and I take it to be a general proposition applicable to such a case as this, that, where one man is compelled to pay damages by reason of the default of another, he is entitled to recover compensation from the person through whose default that damage is occasioned. The reason for this rule appears to be well stated in Mr. Leake's excellent work on contracts. The passage referred to runs thus: "Where the plaintiff has been compelled by law to pay, or, being compellable by law, has paid money which the defendant was ultimately liable to pay, so that the latter obtains the benefit of the payment by the discharge of his liability, under such circumstances the defendant is held indebted to the plaintiff in the amount": Leake on Contracts, 1st ed., p. 41. Now, what (according to the judgments of Channell, B., Blackburn and Willes, JJ.) were the conditions upon which the liability of the defendants to the plaintiff was based? First, that the plaintiff and defendants were both liable to be sued by the lessor for the same breaches of the same covenant; second, that the defendants had had at the date of those breaches the whole benefit of the land the subject of the lease containing that covenant.

These being the conditions upon which the defendants in Moule v. Garrett, the sub-assignees of the lease, were held liable, it is necessary to consider whether one finds these conditions in principle present in a case in which lessees, who have been compelled to pay the rent reserved by the lease, are seeking to get recoupment from underlessees of an assignee of the lease, who are in possession as mortgagees. Now, first, as to the common liability of the lessee and underlessee, they clearly are not both liable to be sued by the lessor for rent. The lessee alone can be sued, and the underlessee is only liable to the lessor in the sense that the lessor has a remedy in rem by distress on goods on the property demised and by the power of re-entry for non-payment of rent or breach of covenant. It is in this sense only that the underlessee can be said to be liable to the lessor for the rent, and, so far as distress is concerned, his direct liability is limited to cases in which he happens to have goods on the land, although he may have an indirect liability to indemnify against distress those who, by his license having goods on the land, have been compelled to redeem their goods from distraint. Is this a common liability within the reason upon which the condition is based? I think it is not. I am now dealing only with the principle upon which the common law liability is based. There is a common law principle of liability and also a principle of liability in equity, and these two principles differ. The common law principle requires a common liability to be sued for that which the plaintiff had to pay, and an interest of the defendant in the payment in the sense that he gets the benefit of the payment, either entirely, as in the case of the assignee of a lease, or pro tanto, as in the case of a surety who has paid and has his action for contribution against his co-surety. The principle in equity seems wide enough to include cases in which there is community of interest in the subject-matter to which the burden is attached, which has been enforced against the plaintiff alone, coupled with benefit to the defendant, even though there is no common liability to be sued. In such a case it seems to me a plaintiff may recover in equity, although there is no common liability to be sued. The two principles are well illustrated by the cases of Hunter v. Hunt, 1 Q. B. 300, and the observations of Eyre, C.B., in Deering v. Winchelsea. The former was a case in which one underlessee of a separate portion of premises, the whole of which were held under one original lease at an entire rent, who had paid the whole rent under threat of distress, brought an action against an underlessee to recover from him a proportion of the money which he had so paid as money paid to his use, and it was held that at law he had no right of action. In the latter case the Lord Chief Baron, in dealing with the principle in equity, takes as an illustration of the equitable principle a series of cases in some of which the defendant seems to have been under no liability to be sued, but in which the goods of one had been legally taken or sacrificed for the benefit, not of himself alone, but of himself and others, and says that "the reason is that they are all in æquali jure, and as the law requires equality, they shall equally bear the burden. This is considered as founded in equity. . . . The principle operates more clearly in a court of equity than at law. At law the party is driven to an audita querela or scire facias to defeat the execution and compel execution to be taken against all. There are more cases of contribution in equity than at law." The audita querela, which is a defendant's writ, and the scire facias both assume a legal liability to judgment or execution in some person other than him against whom judgment has been obtained. The case also of Leigh v. Dickeson, 33 W. R. 538, 15 Q. B. D. 60, in which it was held that one tenant in common of a house who expends money upon the repairs of the house has no right of action against his co-tenant in common for contribution in respect of money so expended, is based upon the consideration that there is no common liability to repair, and seems further to show that in equity as well as at law there must at least be a legal liability on the plaintiff to pay the sum or bear the burden in respect of which he seeks recoupment or contribution from the defendant. This seems to me to account for the common law condition that the defendant cannot be liable to be sued for money paid unless he is personally liable to be sued for the money which the plaintiff claims to have paid to his use. The common law condition may also be explained by reference to the form of action, "money paid to the use of the defendant at his request," for it seems that, unless the defendant is under a personal liability to pay the money which the plaintiff has assumed to pay for him, one cannot imply the authority from the defendant to the plaintiff to make the payment on his behalf. This proposition does not, of course, extend to cases where the contractual relation of the parties, whether by express contract, or by contract to be implied from their dealings with one another, raises a request or authority to pay, but otherwise I believe it of universal application in an action for money paid: see Lewis v. Campbell, 8 C. B. 541, p. 549. For these reasons I think that the right of the lessor to distrain or re-enter does not constitute a liability in the underlessee to the lessor within the meaning of the condition of the common law principle. But the plaintiff may be entitled to recover within the equitable principle, if he has been compelled to pay or bear the burden, and can establish that the defendant has such an interest or benefit as to make the maxim apply qui sentit commodum, debet sentire et onus; but in my judgment an underlessee has no such interest in the lease or benefit from the payment of the rent as to make that maxim apply or to bring him within the equitable principle. The equitable principle seems to me based upon natural justice requiring that equity should neutralize inter se the accident that the burden has been borne by one for the benefit of others associated with him in interest, whether such incidence of burden is the result of election of a plaintiff who might have sued all those interested, or whether it is the result of the requirements of the law as to the parties to actions, or whether it is the result of what may be more properly called "accident," like the "jettison" of a part of a cargo severally owned, or the seizure of wines on behalf of the Crown in right of prisage. For each of these cases the application of the equitable principle depends on community of interest in something in respect of which one has borne a burden for the benefit of another or others. The covenant in accordance with which a lessee pays rent or expends money in repairs is a covenant in a lease in which the underlessee has no interest. He has no contractual interest and no estate is vested in him; the only sense in which it can be said that he has an interest in the lease is that the lessee or assignee of the lease who has granted the underlease cannot defeat his own grant by a collusive surrender of the lease to the original lessor, and it does not seem to me that this fact constitutes such an interest in him that he can within the equitable principle be said to have an interest in the lease containing the covenant under which the lessee is compellable to do the act alleged to have been done for the benefit of the underlessee. The case of the assignee of a lease, on the contrary, does show the necessary interest, as is well-illustrated by the judgment of Popham, C.J., and the whole court in The Dean and Chapter of Windsor's case, quoted by Tindal, C.J., in Tremeere v. Morison, 1 Bing. N. C. 89 at p. 98, "that the action of covenant did lie, although the lessee had not covenanted for him and his assigns; for such covenant which extends to the support of the thing demised is quodammodo appurtenant to it, and goes with it: and in respect the lessee hath taken upon him to bear the charges of the reparations the yearly rent was the less which goes to the benefit of the assignee and qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus." It may be remarked on this passage that the rent payable by the underlessee has no necessary relation to the rent reserved by the lease.

In conclusion, in my judgment the defendants have not within either the equitable or common law principle such an interest in the lease that it can be said that the payment by the lessees of the rent reserved by the lease was a payment for their benefi or relief, and I do not think that it makes any difference that the underlease was in fact a mortgage by demise.

The only other question with which I have to deal is the question whether there is anything in the provision in the underlease or mortgage by demise for the application of the rents and profits to the payment of the rent reserved by the lease in case the mortgagees go into possession which will enable the plaintiffs to maintain this action. I think not. It is plain that, apart from the provision for the application of rents and profits, an underlessee who has bought an interest by way of underlease from an assignee of the lease by the payment of a lump sum cannot, according to any principle, be called on to pay again for that for which he has already once paid by ndemnifying the lessee against the periodical rent as it accrues from time to time. Now, so far as the clause for the application of the rents and profits is concerned, first, it is plain that the lessee cannot at law take advantage of a contract to which he is not a party. It may be true that the trustee in Price's bankruptcy, who does not seem to have disclaimed, may be entitled to compel application of the rents, profits, and proceeds to the payment of the paramount rent, as being a fund held by the defendants in trust for that purpose, and the plaintiffs are, I think, entitled to insist upon the trustee in Price's bankruptcy on proper terms taking proceedings to enforce the application of the fund; but I do not think that the lessees can, at all events in this action as framed and with these parties, enforce that trust. It is not as if the defendant society was in course of liquidation and the lessees were attempting to carry in a proof to enforce the indemnity due from the estate to their debtor. It is sufficient, however, to say that the judgment of Channell J., in the action before him was quite right, and that the plaintiffs cannot in it recover any indemnity from the defendants.

With regard to the second ground upon which Cockburn, C.J., based his judgment in Moule v. Garrett I do not think that it is anything more than a statement of the principle of Deering v. Winchelsea, which principle is the foundation of all the cases in which the assignee has been held liable to recoup a lessee who has been compelled to pay rent as it were as surety for the assignee. It seems to me that no injustice is done to the plaintiffs by holding that they must fail in this action, for I am of opinion that if they take proper steps against the trustee in bankruptcy, they can in effect recover this rent from the defendants, provided the state of things is such that the trustee can compel the defendants to apply moneys received to the payment of these rents in arrear; and, moreover, as the trustee has not disclaimed, they have, it seems, a remedy against the trustee personally as an assignee of the lease in respect of such rents as have accrued since the bankruptcy, unless and until the trustee assigns over. I have only to add with regard to the cases of Sapsford v. Fletcher, 4 T. R. 511; Taylor v. Zamira, 6 Taunt. 524; Dawson v. Linton, 5 B. & Ald. 521; and Exall v. Partridge, 8 T. R. 308, which were cited to us, that each of these cases turned really on the contractual relations of the parties.

In re STOCKPORT RAGGED AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS. (a.)

Charity—Industrial school—Endowment—Mortgage of property—Petition—Consent of Charity Commissioners—"Cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools"—Words ejusdem generis—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), ss. 62, 66.

The proviso at the end of section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, that the "exemption" thereby conferred shall not extend to "any cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools," does not extend to all schools, but only to the schools there mentioned and others of a similar description.

Decision of Stirling, J. (46 W. R. 455, [1898] 1 Ch. 610), affirmed.

Government grants and contributions by school boards and other public bodies to an industrial school are not voluntary contributions within the meaning of section 62.

The trustees of an industrial school which possessed land and buildings occupied by the school, and was maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by a Government grant and contributions from public bodies, presented a petition asking for the consent of the court to a mortgage of the school lands and buildings.

Held, that the consent of the Charity Commissioners was required to the presentation of the petition and the proposed mortgage, the property to be mortgaged being a permanent endowment.

Whether the Charity Commissioners have jurisdiction over the voluntary subscriptions of a charity which is maintained by voluntary subscriptions and possesses a permanent endowment yielding no income, quære.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J. (reported 46 W. R. 455, [1898] 1 Ch. 610).

The facts were as follow: Prior to 1865 a school for poor children had existed at Stockport, which was managed by a committee, and was supported at first entirely by voluntary contributions, but these were afterwards augmented by a Government grant. In 1865 the committee purchased a freehold house and grounds called Town End House. The consideration was a perpetual rent-charge of £20 a year, and on the 28th of November, 1865, the premises were conveyed to three nominees of the committee, subject to the rent-charge. No trusts were declared by the indenture of conveyance. By the aid of donations from the Marquis of Westminster and other voluntary contributions the existing building was improved and new buildings erected, and the school was carried on on the premises. In 1866 the school was certified under the Industrial Schools Act, and was thenceforth called the Stockport Ragged, Industrial, and Reformatory Schools.

The annual rent-charge of £20 was always paid out of the general funds of the charity.

By an indenture dated the 20th of June, 1866, the three nominees above mentioned conveyed the Town

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

End House property, subject to the rent-charge, to fifteen trustees upon trust to permit the land and schoolhouse to be used as a ragged, industrial, and reformatory school, to be governed by a committee of management constituted and empowered as therein provided, and having the exclusive management and disposal of the funds and finances of the school. And the trustees were thereby empowered to sell the premises thereby conveyed, and to apply the proceeds in building or acquiring other larger and more convenient premises, to be settled on the same trusts as the premises thereby conveyed.

On the 7th of November, 1887, a lease for the term of 999 years, from September, 1887, of a piece of land in Dial Stone-lane, Stockport, was granted to three nominees of the trustees at the annual rent of £20, and on this site the committee of management built a schoolhouse for girls. The cost of so doing was defrayed by the committee, as to £2,000 by subscriptions, and as to £1,500 and upwards by a balance which they had in their hands, derived from legacies and from voluntary contributions and profits from the school children's industrial occupations during previous years. This building was completed in 1888, and the annual rent was paid out of the general funds of the school.

In February, 1890, a strip of land adjoining the girls' school was demised to the same three persons for a similar term and similar purposes. Owing to the growth of the town of Stockport the present buildings had become unsuitable, and the committee of management proposed to remove the boys' school to a better position, and for that purpose to sell the present premises, and out of the proceeds, together with a sum to be raised by mortgage of the girls' school, to erect a larger and more commodious school for boys. The trustees accordingly presented a petition under the provisions of Sir Samuel Romilly's Act (52 Geo. 3, c. 101), that they might be at liberty to execute such deeds as might be necessary for carrying the proposed mortgage into effect, and to apply the moneys to be raised thereby to the erection of the proposed new school.

A site had already been purchased by the committee for £1,000, which had been paid out of the general funds of the charity in the hands of the committee of management. The site had been conveyed to the nominees of the charity in fee.

The petition came on before Stirling, J., and was opposed by the Charity Commissioners on the ground that the proviso at the end of section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, excludes all schools from the exemption conferred by the section; and, further, that the property proposed to be mortgaged was an endowment within the meaning of section 66 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, and that the sanction of the Charity Commissioners to the mortgage was necessary.

The evidence showed that the income of the school was derived from a grant from Government, contributions from school boards, boards of guardians, and other public authorities, subscriptions from residents in the neighbourhood of Stockport, and the earnings of the school children in their industrial capacity.

All donations or bequests made to the school were applied in aid of these voluntary contributions and other sources of income.

Stirling, J., held that the property proposed to be mortgaged was an endowment within the meaning of section 66 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, but that the school was not included in the exception at the end of section 62. He accordingly thought that the consent of the Charity Commissioners was not necessary to the presentation of the petition, and gave the liberty prayed for.

The Charity Commissioners appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appeal.—The property proposed to be mortgaged is clearly an "endowment." We submit that it does not fall within the exemption clause in section 62 at all. This charity is not entirely maintained by voluntary subscriptions; nor is it maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from endowment, because this endowment produces no income. In any case, however, we submit that the proviso takes the case out of the section.

Henry Johnston, contra.—These schools are not a charity within the definition of section 66 of the Act of 1853. A gift of which capital only is applicable for the purpose of the charity is not an endowment, and, except for the purposes of section 44 and 62, is no more than a voluntary gift. This is a charity wholly maintained by voluntary subscriptions, and is within the exemption in section 62, and is not excepted by the proviso at the end of that section.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—LINDLEY, M.R.—This case turns upon that very obscure section, the 62nd section of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

Stirling, J., has held that the exception at the end of that section does not include the schools mentioned in the petition, and that the consent of the Charity Commissioners to the presentation of the petition and the proposed mortgage was not necessary.

The Charity Commissioners have appealed from that decision, and they ask this court to make a declaration that under the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, the consent of the Charity Commissioners to the presentation of the petition and the proposed mortgage is necessary.

The Stockport Ragged, Industrial, and Reformatory School is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions. It has payments made to it by boards of guardians and other boards for pupils who are sent to be educated there.

It has a Government grant as well, and it has also certain landed property, and the object of the present application to the court is to raise money by a mortgage of that part of this landed property which consists of the girls' school and the new boys' school.

I will first of all address myself to the main question on which the Charity Commissioners appealed—namely, what is the true construction of the proviso at the end of section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

The Charity Commissioners contend that by virtue of this proviso all schools are taken out of the exemptions enumerated in the section. Now, the section enacts that the Act shall not extend to certain universities, colleges, cathedrals, or collegiate churches, and so on, giving a long list of exemptions, amongst which are enumerated Roman Catholic charities or institutions, which is an important exemption; and at the end of the list there is this proviso: "Provided always, that the said exemption shall not extend to any cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools."

The Charity Commissioners ask the court to read the expression "other schools" in the largest possible sense, so as to exclude all schools whatever from the exemption, and therefore to bring them within their jurisdiction. I agree with the decision of Stirling, J., that this cannot be the meaning of the section. There are two ways of reading it: one is that the exemption shall not extend to any school; the other way of reading it is that the exemption shall not extend to any cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other schools more or less like them. Stirling, J., has adopted the second construction, and it appears to me that this is the natural and proper construction. I am quite aware that there have been cases, such as Anderson v. Anderson (to which I drew attention during the argument), where the Court has protested against pushing the doctrine of ejusdem generis too far. It is very often pushed too far; but I cannot conceive why the Legislature should have taken the trouble to specify in this section such special schools as cathedral, collegiate, and chapter, except to show the type of school which they were referring to, and, in my opinion, "other schools" must be taken to mean other schools of that type.

If we were to adopt the other construction for which the counsel for the Charity Commissioners contend, and to hold that all schools were in 1853 and are now within their jurisdiction, we should, having regard particularly to the exemption of Roman Catholic charities and institutions, be running entirely contrary to the real meaning of the Legislature. I cannot help regarding this as the great point in the case, and upon it I think Stirling, J., was perfectly right.

But another point has been raised which was not so much pressed below, and in fact seems to have been rather lightly passed over. Mr. Cozens-Hardy, for the Charity Commissioners, contends that the school is within their jurisdiction because it does not fall within any of the exemptions. There, for reasons which I will give, I think he is right. Passing over the universities, colleges, and so on, the first material exemption is in favour of a charity. Having regard to the statements in the petition and the evidence as to how these schools are maintained, I do not think that they can be brought within that exemption. At all events, it is not proved that they can. Having regard to this Government grant, and to the fact that board schools and boards of guardians contribute to them, I feel great difficulty in saying that the schools come within this exemption.

Then, coming to the next one, "Where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from any endowment, the powers and provisions of the Act shall with respect to such charity extend and apply to the income from endowment only to the exclusion of voluntary subscriptions and the application thereof." I do not quite understand the words "where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from any endowment." Why cannot a charity be maintained by some other means? In other words, those two sources do not exhaust the whole of the income of a charity. Here we have got this case. This charity is unquestionably maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions. Is it maintained partly by income arising from any endowment?

Now, "endowment" there, in accordance with In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, must mean some endowment not arising from the investment of voluntary subscriptions. It is said by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, and in point of language I can see no answer to it, that this school land and school buildings do not yield income, and therefore you cannot say that this charity is maintained partly by income arising from any endowment. There is no income from endowment if you read the word "endowment" in that narrow sense. As I say, I do not see the answer to that on the words; but if that is the true mode of interpreting the expression "partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income arising from any endowment," and you hold that this school is not within the exemption, what do you do? You throw the whole school under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners and give them power over the voluntary subscriptions, which is a result very formidable, and certainly one not contemplated by the Act of Parliament, and, I should say, contrary to what is obviously meant, which is that the Charity Commissioners shall not have jurisdiction.

If in order to avoid that startling result one puts an artificial sense on the word "income," although there is none, by treating the institution as occupying the lands and schools at an occupation rent, receiving it on the one hand and paying it on the other—if you look at it in that way, then you bring the endowment within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, because, subject to certain exemptions, they are to have jurisdiction over the income from the endowment; and further, if you put that forced construction on the language in order to escape from the consequences which flow from the other construction, then it will follow that the Charity Commissioners have the power and the right to be consulted about this mortgage.

I do not propose at present to decide the very knotty point whether the Charity Commissioners would have general power over the voluntary subscriptions of schools like this. I see the difficulty, but I leave it until it arises. Construe the clause as you will, it appears to me the Charity Commissioners ought to be consulted about this particular mortgage. Therefore, although I agree with Stirling, J., upon what I call the great point of the interpretation of the proviso, I think he has inadvertently fallen into a mistake in saying it follows that in this case the Charity Commissioners ought not to be consulted. The consequence is that his order must be varied in accordance with the notice of appeal, and there must be a declaration that under the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, the consent of the Charity Commissioners to the presentation of the petition and the proposed mortgage is necessary.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point that was seriously argued before Stirling, J., was upon the proviso at the end of the 62nd section. If the proviso is applied it takes the charity out of the exemption, and therefore leaves it, under the main provisions of the 62nd section, within the jurisdiction of the commissioners. Upon the construction of the proviso I entertain no doubt whatever. The proviso is that the exemption shall not extend to "any cathedral, collegiate, chapter, or other school." It appears to me that, reading those words by themselves, and seeing what a number of endowed schools there are in the country, it cannot be the intention of the Legislature, when it begins by speaking of "cathedral, collegiate, chapter" in that way, and then goes on to "or other schools," that all other schools of whatever character or denomination, including Roman Catholic and the like, shall be included within the proviso, and, therefore, taken out of the exemption. The reason why "cathedral" and "collegiate" are put in is plain from the opening part of the 62nd section, which relates to cathedral or collegiate churches, and takes them out of the general jurisdiction. Now, there are schools attached to cathedral or collegiate churches, and such of those schools as are charities are intended to be put back into the jurisdiction. The class of schools mentioned—namely, "cathedral, collegiate, or chapter," are of the most peculiar and special class of schools connected with the Church of England. I do not stay to say what is meant by "chapter." There seems to be some difficulty about it, whether there is in this country such a thing as a chapter school. The word may have some meaning counsel has not explained, but that is a class of school indicated. I am of opinion that the "other schools" cannot be read by itself, but must be schools of the like class. I entirely agree with Stirling, J.'s, observations on this point, and I shall not weaken them by repeating them.

Then, with regard to the other point which was mentioned to Stirling, J., but not seriously argued, I think the commissioners are right. With the intention of founding a school, land was taken by conveyance to certain persons who did not declare the trusts thereof. The money for the purpose of building the school was subscribed by the Marquis of Westminster (as he then was) and some other gentlemen, and the school was duly erected.

After the school had been erected a conveyance was made to trustees by the deed of 1866, and under that deed the land with the buildings thereon became, and was, a permanent endowment, an endowment which the trustees were no longer able to treat as being income. The trusts declared by the deed were—first, that the building should be used as a school. Then there was a power of sale, with a direction to lay out the money in purchasing a better site for a school, but the land proposed to be thus acquired was subject to the same trust as the original land.

In these circumstances the trustees had a power of sale which they have purported to exercise. They have agreed to sell the land and school above mentioned, and they purpose with the purchase-money when they get it, and with the money they are going to raise on mortgage, to provide and build a new boys' school.

Now, it seems to me, without going through this very troublesome 62nd section, that the commissioners are right, at any rate as to their consent being required; and it is quite enough for the decision of the case that here there was a fixed permanent endowment. Now, the Charity Commissioners contend that their consent to the presentation of this petition was requisite under the 17th section of the Act of 1853—a consent which I understand they have given, but without prejudice to the appeal.

I am not much disposed to unravel this tangled skein of the 62nd section, and the only observation I make about it is that I conceive that the Legislature did not intend that any charity that was maintained by voluntary contributions should, so far as it was so maintained, be within the jurisdiction of the commissioners; but it is not necessary, in my opinion, to dive further into the section, or try to find its meaning if the commissioners are right on the simple point (and on that my decision goes) that there is here a permanent endowment in the shape of land which the trustees cannot treat as income.

In re WASDALE.
BRITTIN v. PARTRIDGE. (a.)

Trustee—Notice—Assignment—Notice to trustees—Notice to new trustees—Priority.

An assignee who has given notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of his assignment is not bound to give notice to every new trustee, and is entitled to priority over a subsequent assignee who has taken his assignment after the death or retirement of all the original trustees and given notice to the new trustees.

This was a summons raising the question whether an assignee who has given notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of his assignment is bound to give fresh notice on the appointment of new trustees.

The facts were as follows: Under the will of Matthew Wasdale, who died in 1856, Edward Nix Watson became entitled to a reversionary interest in the proceeds of sale of certain lands devised to trustees upon an imperative trust for conversion.

By an indenture dated the 9th of February, 1871, Edward Nix Watson assigned this interest to John Samuel Partridge, who in the same month gave notice of the assignment to Dingley Askham Brittin and Robert Burton, then the sole trustees of the testator's will.

In June, 1881, the survivor of these trustees died, and thenceforth down to 1896 his executors appear to have acted as trustees of the will of Matthew Wasdale. On the 1st of July, 1896, the plaintiffs were duly appointed trustees of that will.

By an indenture dated the 27th of February, 1897, Edward Nix Watson assigned his interest under the will of Mr. Wasdale (still reversionary) to Louisa Bell, widow, by way of mortgage to secure repayment of £400.

On the 28th of February, 1897, Mrs. Bell gave notice of her incumbrance to the plaintiffs, the trustees of Wasdale's will.

Subsequently the interest of E. N. Watson fell into possession, and as it was claimed both by Partridge and by Mrs. Bell, the present summons was taken out by the plaintiffs, the trustees of the will, to determine the priority between them.

R. F. Norton, for J. S. Partridge.—I gave notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of the assignment. The death of the trustees cannot take away my priority. The only case against me is Timson v. Ramsbottom, 2 Keen 35. Ward v. Duncombe, 42 W. R. 59, [1893] A. C. 369, is in my favour.

Eustace Smith, for Mrs. Bell.—The facts in Timson v. Ramsbottom, were very much the same as in this case. The whole rule as to notice was established to give protection against fraud, and it ought to apply on the appointment of new trustees.

He referred to Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1; Foster v. Cockerell, 3 Cl. & Fin. 456; Browne v. Savage, 7 W. R. 571, 4 Drew. 635; Phipps v. Lovegrove, 21 W. R. 590, L. Norton replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 8.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued:

The assignment to Partridge is earlier in point of date, and is consequently entitled to priority unless the subsequent assignee establishes that she has a better title in equity.

It has been held that where, as here, a fund consisting of personal estate is vested in trustees a subsequent assignee who gives notice of his assignment to the trustees has a better title in equity than a prior assignee who has entirely omitted to give notice of his: Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1; Foster v. Cockerell, 3 Cl. & Fin. 456. If, however, one only of the trustees in existence at the date of the second assignment had notice of the prior assignment, that assignee does not lose his priority: Ward v. Duncombe, 42 W. R. 59, [1893] A. C. 369.

It has been further held in Timson v. Ramsbottom, 2 Keene 35, and In re Hall, 7 L. R. Ir. 180, that an assignee who has given notice to one only of several trustees is not entitled to priority over a subsequent assignee who takes his assignment after the death of the trustee to whom notice was given. In the latter case the Vice-Chancellor in Ireland gave as a reason that it is the fault of the earlier assignee that he did not give notice to both trustees, and refers to Meux v. Bell, 1 Hare 73.

So far as the decisions have gone, I am now asked to hold that an assignee who has given notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of his assignment is not entitled to priority over a subsequent assignee who has taken his assignment after the death or retirement of all these trustees and who gives notice of such assignment to the new trustees. That, as I think, goes beyond the decisions in Timson v. Ramsbottom and In re Hall, for in both cases the assignee omitted to give notice to a trustee in existence when he took his assignment.

The principle on which the doctrine of the court as to notice is founded was the subject of much discussion in the House of Lords in the recent case of Ward v. Duncombe. Lord Herschell, after referring to Dearle v. Hall, Loveridge v. Cooper, says: "It is impossible, I think, to read these judgments without seeing that the leading consideration which induced the court to lay down the rule that he who gives notice has a better equitable right than a prior incumbrancer who has given no notice was this, that any other decision would facilitate fraud by the cestui que trust, and cause loss to those who might have used every precaution that was possible to ascertain, before parting with their money, that the title they were taking was a valid one, and who might have done everything they could to render that title secure"; and Lord Macnaghten says: "I have made these observations, not for the purpose of impugning the authority of the rule in Dearle v. Hall. The rule is settled law. But it seems to me that when your lordships are asked to extend the rule to a case not already covered by authority, it is proper to inquire into the principles upon which the rule is said to be founded. For the reasons which I have already given, I do not think that those principles are so clear or so convincing that the rule ought to be extended to a new case. There is one argument which I ought to notice before I conclude. It was said that if the mortgage had not been created until after Mr. Sharp's death, and the mortgagees had then given notice to the surviving trustee, they would have gained priority. That may be so. But that is not this case. I take leave, however, to doubt whether the proposition on which the argument is founded can be treated as settled law. There is no authority for it that I know in this country but the case of Timson v. Ramsbottom before Lord Langdale, M.R. I do not think that that case can be regarded as one of much weight, for it was appealed, and after the appeal was opened the parties came to a compromise, and moreover, it will be observed that his lordship seems to have thought that the notice in that case was insufficient even during the lifetime of the person who received it, because he held that each one of the other holders of the fund being executors 'had separate authority to receive and pay on account of the estate,' and he thought that if they had no notice of the assignment they 'might have made payment without incurring any liability on that account.' As Westbury, L.C., says in Willes v. Greenhill, 10 W. R. 33, 'It is well established, whether rightly or wrongly, that upon assignments or mortgages of equitable interest in property held by trustees, the duty devolves upon the assignee or mortgagee to give to the trustees notice of the assignment or incumbrance. But it may be that when an assignee or mortgagee has once discharged that duty he has done all that the rule requires of him, and that for the rest the law holds, as Lord Cairns lays it down, and that he is not, on a change of trustees, to be deprived of his pre-existing equitable title by the diligence or by the happy thought of a subsequent incumbrancer. Certainly I can imagine nothing more inconvenient than that it should be possible to have a scramble for priorities on the appointment of new trustees. Nothing, I think, would be less likely to conduce to the security of equitable titles."

In my opinion it would be imposing an unreasonable burden on assignees to hold that they are under an obligation to give notice to every new trustee, or are to be treated as guilty of neglect to take reasonable precautions if they omit to do so. I think, therefore, that the title of Partridge must prevail.

ELLIS v. BEDFORD (DUKE). (a.)

Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Class actions—Preferential rights of market gardeners in Covent Garden Market under 9 Geo. 4, c. cxiii.—R. S. C., ord. 16, rr. 1, 9.

Ord. 16, r. 9, which provides for persons suing or being sued as representing a class, only extends to cases where the class have or claim some beneficial proprietary right which is being asserted or defended in the action.

By the Act for the Regulation of Covent Garden Market (9 Geo. 4, c. cxiii.), certain stands were exclusively appropriated to the reception of wagons and carts belonging to growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, and herbs, at tolls or rent according to a schedule, and such growers were to be deemed to be persons having preferential rights to resort to such stands under the provisions of the Act. The plaintiffs in the above action were six market gardeners, who sued on behalf of themselves and all other such growers as aforesaid attending Covent Garden Market for a declaration that the defendant, the owner of the market, should not deprive them of preferential rights as to stands conferred by the statute.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant applied to set aside the proceedings, on the grounds that the plaintiffs, as having separate and distinct causes of action, could not join, and also could not, as private individuals, sue on behalf of a class of the public.

Held, that the growers, as a class, had not any proprietary rights in respect of the market under the provisions of that Act in their favour, and that such right as the growers as a class had thereunder was in the nature of a public right which must be enforced at the suit of the Attorney-General.

Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 321, [1893] 1 Q. B. 435, followed.

Held, also, that the plaintiffs had not and did not claim any right to relief "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or transactions," and therefore the six several claims of the plaintiffs as individuals were not rightly joined under ord. 16, r. 1.

Summons.

The plaintiffs in the above action were six market gardeners, who sued on behalf of themselves and all other growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs, within the meaning of the enactment referred to below, for a declaration that the defendant, who was the owner of Covent Garden Market, was not entitled to exclude them from certain preferential rights as to stands conferred by the Act for the Regulation of Covent Garden Market (9 Geo. 4, c. cxiii.), and they also claimed consequential relief. The said Act, after certain provisions as to a portion of the said market delineated in a plan therein referred to, which provisions are not material for the purposes of this report, contains amongst others the following provisions (section 7): "That the remainder of the said market shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, be appropriated as follows, namely: Those parts thereof which are marked respectively in the said plan with the letter (B) shall be divided into stands, which stands shall be called 'The Casual Cart Stands,' and shall (except and subject as hereinafter mentioned) be exclusively appropriated to the reception of wagons and carts in which fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs shall be brought to the said market for sale, and for the exposing to sale and selling such fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs on the stand to which the same shall be brought, subject to such tolls or sums of money as are in the schedule to this Act in that behalf mentioned, and the growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs shall be deemed to be the person having the preferable right to resort to such stands under the provisions of this Act. Those parts of the said market which are marked respectively in the said plan with the letter (C) shall be divided into stands, which stands shall be called 'The Yearly Cart Stands' and shall (except and subject as hereinafter mentioned) be exclusively approriated to the reception of wagons and carts of or belonging to growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs, and to the exposing to sale and selling the fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs grown or reared by such growers and be let by the said Duke [i.e., of Bedford], his heirs or assigns, being owners of the said market, or their tenants thereof by the year or for any shorter period at such yearly or other rents and subject to such tolls or sums of money as are in the schedule to this Act in that behalf mentioned, and the person to whom any such stand shall be let shall be deemed to be the holder thereof, and the person having the preferable right to resort thereto under the provisions of this Act.

"Those parts of the said market which are marked respectively in the said plan with the letters (F and G) shall be divided into stands, which stands shall be called 'The Yearly Pitching Stands' and shall (except and subject as hereinafter mentioned) be exclusively appropriated to the exposing to sale and selling fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs, and may be let by the said Duke, his heirs or assigns, being owners of the said market, or their tenants thereof exclusively to growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs by the year or for any shorter period at such yearly or other rents and subject to such tolls or sums of money as are in the schedule to this Act in that behalf mentioned, and the person to whom any such stand shall be let shall be deemed to be the holder thereof and the person having the preferable right to resort thereto under the provisions of this Act."

The plaintiffs in the above action were all growers of fruit, vegetables, roots or herbs, and frequenters of the market for the purpose of sale, and they complained that the defendant, who was the owner of the market, did not within the meaning of the Act comply with the provisions aforesaid of the Act relating to the stands and the exaction of tolls. They alleged that they had each been refused stands when unlet, and also alleged excessive charges. They submitted that the defendant had not the right to admit others to the use of certain stands so long as growers presented themselves and required the use thereof, and alleged that the defendant made it a practice either to refuse to growers the use of such stands or by filling such stands with others than growers to prevent growers having the use of such stands, with the result that growers had to go to other parts of the market or to places outside the market, or to the public streets, where, the restrictions contained in the Act not being applicable, the defendant charged higher rates than would have to be paid under the Act, and with the further result of injury to the growers in their trade. They further alleged that in each case of refusal of stands to any of the plaintiffs no objection had been made to such plaintiff as a proper tenant, but, although several of such stands were unlet and growers were desirous of tenancies, the defendant had stated his practice to be not to let such stands.

The defendant now applied to set aside the writ and all proceedings in the action on the ground that the plaintiffs, as having separate and distinct causes of action, could not join, and that also they could not as private individuals sue on behalf of a class of the public in respect of public or other statutory rights.

By ord. 16, r. 1, several plaintiffs are allowed to join in one action distinct causes of action if the right to relief arises out of the same transaction or series of transactions, and there would be a common question of law or fact if they brought separate actions; by rule 9, where there are numerous persons having the same interest, one or more may sue on behalf of all.

Levett, Q.C., Danckwerts, and A. Gwynne James, for the defendant, supported the application.

Asquith, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and J. T. Prior, for the plaintiffs.

B. 435.

ROMER, J.—This application gives rise to questions of some nicety. The first point I have to consider is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to sue on behalf of themselves and all other growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, or herbs within the meaning of the Act 9 Geo. 4. c. cxiii. Now, as pointed out in Temperton v. Russell, ord 16, r. 9, which provides for persons suing or being sued as representing a class, only extends to cases where the class have or claim some beneficial proprietary right which is being asserted or defended. I have, therefore, to consider whether the growers in question as a class have a beneficial proprietary right under the above Act which is being asserted in this action. On consideration of the provisions of that Act in favour of the growers with regard to Covent-garden Market, I am unable to come to the conclusion that the growers as a class have any proprietary rights in respect of the market. All members of the public have a right to go to and use the market, and it appears to me that, by the Act, all that in substance is provided is that those members of the public coming to use the market who are growers shall have preference over the rest of the public in using and having let to them certain parts of the market. Of course, if any individual grower had let to him under the Act a part of the market he would, during the letting, and in respect of the part let, have a proprietary right. But I cannot see that growers as a class can be said to have a proprietary right in respect of the market merely because if any member of the class chooses to go to and use the market he can claim to be preferred over what I may call an outside member of the public in using or having let to him a portion of certain specified parts of the market. If I held the opposite view I do not see how I could avoid also holding that the public as a class had a proprietary right in respect of the market, because, as against the owner of the market, it had a right of access to, and user of, the market. It appears to me that such right as the growers as a class have under the Act is in the nature of a public right, which must be enforced when necessary by the Attorney-General. Of course, any member of the class who has been injured by the provisions of the Act being disregarded will have his remedy in respect of his own individual injury. But where the complaint is that the rights of the growers as a class have been disregarded and relief is sought on behalf of the class by way of declaration of right or injunction, then I think the Attorney-General is the proper person to sue.

It was suggested that questions under the Act might arise as between the growers as a class and the rest of the public, and that the Attorney-General must then represent the general public. But in a case of that kind the difficulty could be met by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown representing the one section of the public and the Solicitor-General representing the other section. A similar difficulty in other cases has in this way been got over. The views above expressed dispose of the plaintiffs' case so far as it seeks relief on behalf of the growers as a class.

But I have still to consider the general claims of the six plaintiffs as individuals. Each of those claims is perfectly distinct from the others, and depends for its determination upon its own facts, and constitutes in substance a separate action as against the defendant. The question whether these six separate claims are rightly joined depends upon ord. 16, r. 1. On consideration it appears to me that the six plaintiffs, so far as their individual claims are concerned, have not and do not claim any right to relief "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions" within the meaning of those words as used in the above rule. The right to relief of each plaintiff depends upon the transactions peculiar to him under which it is allegd he has been specially injured as an individual. These transactions are not the same as those on which the other plaintiffs have to rely in support of their special injuries and of their special claims in respect of such injuries, and the transactions on which the plaintiffs have respectively to rely to support their claims are not made one merely because the defendant is alleged to have made a practice of disregarding the rights of growers. For these reasons it appears to me that the six several claims of the plaintiffs as individuals are not rightly joined in one action. I think, therefore, that the further prosecution of this action, as at present constituted, ought not to be allowed. But, in order to save unnecessary expense, I will give the plaintiffs liberty to elect, if they can agree between themselves to do so, to continue the action on behalf of any one of the plaintiffs so far as he seeks relief as an individual, and to enable that to be done I give liberty to amend writ and statement of claim. The election and amendment must be made within fourteen days from the drawing up of this order. The plaintiffs must pay the costs of the defendant incurred in the action up to the present time, including the costs of this application. If no election and amendment be made under the liberty above given, then the statement of claim will be struck out, and all further proceedings in the action will be stayed.

In re WREXHAM, MOLD, AND CONNAH'S QUAY RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Company—Company borrowing ultra vires—Debenture-holders—Subrogation.

A railway company exceeded their powers in borrowing largely from their bank for the purposes of paying the interest due on their authorized issue of debentures. At the time of the last overdraft for the purpose of paying the debenture interest proceedings were pending against the company, but of this the bank had no knowledge. Judgment was subsequently recovered in these proceedings against the company and a receiver appointed. The bank claimed to be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the debenture-holders in respect of the overdraft, and that their debt should be paid by the receiver in priority to any payment to the debenture-holders.

Held, that the bank was not entitled to be paid out of moneys in the receiver's hands before interest due and payable to the debenture-holders was paid.

It subsequently came to the knowledge of the bank that there were A, B, and C debenture stockholders, and that the income of the company was sufficient to pay the interest on the A. debenture stock and leave a surplus available for the B debenture stockholders.

Held, on a further application by the bank, that they were not entitled to be repaid in priority to the B debenture stockholders even to the extent of the interest on the A stock paid out of the bank's money.

Adjourned summons.

By the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Act, 1883, the company was authorized to create and issue debenture stock to the amount of £350,000, and under another similar Act in 1888 a further issue was authorized to the amount of £145,000.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nearly the whole of the debenture stock authorized by these two Acts had been issued permanently charged upon the undertaking of the company.

The railway company kept a current account with the Wrexham branch of the North and South Wales Bank (Limited), the working expenses of the railway being paid out of, and the receipts of the company paid into, this account. This account was also drawn upon for the purposes of paying the interest on the debenture stock, and this from time to time caused a considerable overdraft. Towards the end of July, 1897, the bank consented to an application on the part of the railway company to allow a further overdraft of about £10,000 to meet the debenture interest due on the 1st of August, and accordingly, about the 3rd of August, a sum of £9,672 was paid by the bank as interest to the debenture stock-holders.

On the 5th of August, 1897, the Great Central Railway Co. obtained judgment against the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Co. in respect of a sum of £59,128, and on a petition presented on the 12th of August. When the fresh overdraft for the debenture interest was allowed by the bank they had no knowledge that any proceedings were pending against the railway company.

The current account was discontinued by the receiver on the 5th of November, and on this, together with bank charges and interest, a debt of £7,601 was owing to the bank.

The bank in the present proceedings claimed that they were entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the debenture-holders in respect of this sum of £7,601 with interest at 5 per cent., and took out the summons for a declaration to this effect and for an order that the receiver should pay the amount they claimed in priority to any payment to the debenture-holders.

Neville, Q.C., Methold, and Danckwerts, for the bank.—The overdraft at the bank was a debt that the railway company had no power to incur, but the bank's money was applied in paying a debt that the company were legally bound to pay, and the bank is entitled to stand in the shoes of the debenture-holders to the extent of the interest so paid: Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co. v. Blackburn Building Society, 33 W. R. 309, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 857; Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 35 W. R. 822, 19 Q. B. D. 155; In re Cork and Youghal Railway Co., 18 W. R. 26, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 748. The debenture-holders must be taken to have assigned their interest to the bank, and thus the bank has a charge on the undertaking, and should be paid by the receiver in priority to the debenture-holders.

Cur. adv. vult.

ROMER, J.—This is an extraordinary application. The applicant, the bank, has already in these proceedings brought in a claim to be admitted as a creditor of the railway company, and so far neither the railway company nor the debenture stock-holders have disputed the claim of the bank to be regarded as an ordinary creditor of the railway company. But the bank now applies to the court and seeks in substance to establish as to the sum mentioned in its summons, being money borrowed from it by the railway company, that the railway company had no power to borrow this money, and consequently did not become liable to repay it. The bank seeks to establish that it is not directly a creditor in order to assert that thereby it is placed in a better position than if the money had been validly borrowed. And it seeks to establish this startling proposition in the following way: It contends (1) that the borrowed money was applied in paying interest on the debenture stock of the railway company, which is a charge on the undertaking of the company; (2) that on the principle of the well-known cases cited before me the bank is therefore entitled to stand in the shoes of the debenture stock-holders to the extent of the interest so paid; and (3) that the bank is, moreover, entitled not only as against the railway company but as against the debenture stock-holders themselves to be considered as assignees of that interest as if it had never been paid, and as having a charge or something in the nature of a charge on the undertaking of the railway company which gave it a right to call upon the receiver, when he has moneys in his hands available for payment of subsequent interest due on the debenture stock, to pay the bank before he pays the debenture stock-holders their interest. At the present time the receiver, has not, and he may never have, any moneys in hand available for payment of the ordinary debenture-holders their interest, and no one is at present concerned in considering whether the bank is an ordinary creditor of the railway company, either by reason of the original borrowing or by reason of the debts of the railway company, which that company was legally liable to pay. The real object, therefore, of the present application is to obtain a decision of the court, as against the debenture stock-holders, that the bank's claim has priority over their interest. The first two contentions of the bank I may therefore pass by, or assume to be correct if its third contention fails. And, dealing with this third contention, I cannot see on what principle I can hold as against the debenture stock-holders that they are to be treated as ranking after the bank. No authority whatever gives sanction to any such claim on the bank's part. As to the past interest, the stock-holders never assigned it to the bank. It was paid by the railway company in the ordinary way so far as they were concerned, and it did not matter to them or form any matter for inquiry on their part how the railway company got the money to pay that interest. There are, no doubt, expressions in some of the judgments in the cases of subrogation above referred to which speak of the person who has lent money to a company which the company was not legally liable to repay, but which was applied in paying the legal debts of that company, as being entitled under the circumstances of those cases to be considered as assignee of the debts and rights of the creditors paid. But those expressions were used with reference to the only question before the courts in those cases, which was whether as between the person who lent the money to the company and the company he could be regarded as having a claim in respect of that money, and in no wise concerned questions between that person and the creditors whose debts were paid.

The argument on the part of the bank that, as between the creditors paid and the person whose money went in paying them, he is to be treated as if those creditors had actually assigned to him their debts and securities, is, in my opinion, unfounded. If well-founded it would lead to the most astonishing results. For instance, consider the case of a creditor of a building society whose debt is secured on the land of the society. If that society is being wound up, could a person from whom the society illegally borrowed money come forward and by proving that his money went in paying off part of the secured creditor's debt, be entitled as against that creditor to have the security applied in repaying the money borrowed before it was made available to the secured creditor for the payment of the balance of his debt. Clearly not, and yet it appears to me that the bank's contention in the present case would lead to such a result. I therefore hold that the bank is not to be regarded in these proceedings as a creditor whose debt is to be paid by the receiver in priority to the debenture stock-holders. I propose, therefore, to make this declaration: Declare that the bank is not entitled as against the debenture stock-holders to have any part of its claim paid out of moneys in the receiver's hands before payment thereout of interest due and payable to the debenture stock-holders. Beyond that it appears to me unnecessary to make any further order on this summons beyond ordering the bank, which has substantially failed, to pay the costs. But it should be stated that this is not to prejudice any claim of the bank or any application it may make in respect of any moneys that may be in the hands of the receiver after paying all interest due and payable to the debenture stock-holders, and available for payment of other debts of or claims against the railway company.

Dec. 16.—It subsequently came to the knowledge of the bank that there were A, B, and C debenture stockholders, and that the income of the company was sufficient to pay the interest on the A debenture stock and leave a surplus available for the interest on the B debenture stock, and an application was made by the bank that to the extent of the interest on the A stock paid out of the bank's money the bank was entitled to be repaid in priority to the B debenture stockholders.

ROMER, J., without calling on the debenture-holders, delivered judgment as follows: This case is restored to be heard on a fact and particular contention on the part of the bank not previously before me. It appears that the income of the company is sufficient to pay the interest on the A debenture stock and leave a surplus available to pay the interest on the B debenture stock. The bank contends that, on the principle of subrogation, to the extent of the prior interest on the A stock paid off by the bank, it is entitled to be ranked as debenture-holders, and to be paid in priority to the B debenture stock. Much of what I previously said applies to this contention, and need not be repeated. I may, however, again point out that the bank advanced its money under no contract purporting to give it a security for the money, and that the B stockholders knew nothing of the source from which the money came which paid the former interest, and were not bound to inquire. I cannot see any sufficient reason why the B stockholders should now find themselves placed in the position of having a charge second not only to that of the A stock, but to that of the bank. It is said they are not injured because if the bank's money had not been applied in paying off the A interest it would still rank for payment. But suppose the case had been that the railway company had at the time when the bank lent its money other assets which could and should have been applied in paying off the A interest, and that the railway company's insolvency had arisen from a subsequent unexpected loss, are the B stockholders to be now affected because, instead of applying their other assets at the time in paying the A interest, the railway company chose to pay it out of the money borrowed from the bank? And if not, is the court to embark in an investigation as to what the exact pecuniary position of the company was at the time of the borrowing? I think not; and if the principle advocated by the bank is correct, where is it to stop? There might have been years of past interest paid off by money illegally borrowed from the bank. If the bank's contention be correct, all those years' interest might have been accumulating against the B stockholders without their knowledge or consent, and so that all further payment of interest to them would practically cease. They would certainly thereby be greatly prejudiced, yet during all the time of the accumulation they would have had no opportunity of protesting against it or of applying for any remedy. I cannot accede to the application. It appears to me to be wrong in principle and supported by no authority. The case of Blackburn District Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., L. R. 29 Ch. D. 902, is no authority for this application. All that was there done was to allow bankers from whom money had been illegally borrowed by the building society, and which money had been applied in paying off members who had given notice of withdrawal, to stand in the place of those members as against the building society. That was no extension, to my mind, of the prior cases, for the withdrawing members, so far as concerns the building society, were in the position of creditors or quasi-creditors, so that in allowing the principle of subrogation to apply in that case the court was not extending the old cases, or doing anything more than allowing the bankers who found the money there to rank as creditors of the society. Such a point as that involved in the case before me was not before the court, and certainly was not argued. It appears at p. 911 of the report of that case that the right of the bankers there was not objected to by their opponents, and when the court said that they thought the claim was right, it was, in my opinion, in the view that without argument the case was a simple one of the principle of subrogation in no wise affecting a question of secured creditors' rights. For these reasons I think the application fails, and the applicants must pay the costs incurred subsequent to my last order.

LILLEY v. FOAD. (a.)

Mortgage — Receiver—Mortgage of business—Appointment by mortgagee—Extent of agency—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 24—Management of business—Payment of debts—Statute of Limitations.

A receiver appointed by a mortgagee under a power contained in the mortgage deed, which incorporates and extends the powers conferred by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 24, is not limited in the exercise of those powers to matters arising between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, but may by his acts affect the rights of others; and this is so where the receiver is appointed after the death of the mortgagor.

And therefore, where a receiver so appointed as above mentioned, acting within the powers so conferred upon him, paid to a creditor an instalment of a debt contracted by the mortgagor in connection with the mortgaged property, such payment operates as an acknowledgment of the existence of the whole debt on the part of the executrix of the mortgagor, whose agent the receiver is, and prevents time running under the Statute of Limitations.

A receiver so appointed as above mentioned, and being authorized by the terms of his appointment to manage and carry on a business which was the subject of the mortgage, is authorized to pay debts incurred by the mortgagor in respect of the business.

This action was commenced by an originating summons taken out by J. E. Lilley on behalf of himself and all other creditors of F. W. Hale, deceased, against Jane Foad, the executrix of Hale, for the administration of Hale's real and personal estate, and the following issues were tried before Byrne, J.: (1) Whether there was a debt due to the plaintiff or not; (2) if there was a debt, whether it was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The facts were as follows: By an indenture dated the 13th of December, 1886, and made between Jennette G. B. Von Swartwout and her husband, and F. W. Hale and his wife, reciting that J. G. B. Von Swartwout was entitled to a certain business connected with the manufacture and sale of patent medicines for her separate use for life, and that Mrs. Hale was the owner for "her separate use of the reversionary interest in the same business," it was agreed that the business should thenceforth be considered as belonging to F. W. Hale during the life of J. Von Swartwout, and after her death to Mrs. Hale, "subject and charged . . . with an annual sum of £520, payable without any deduction except property tax (if any), during a period of five years from the date of those presents to" J. G. B. Von Swartwout "her executors and administrators (whether she shall survive for that period or not), by equal weekly payments of £10."

The agreement contained a covenant by Mr. and Mrs. Hale, jointly and severally, to pay the annuity of £520, and certain provisions as to how the business was to be carried on. Then followed a clause to the effect that if the annuity should fall into arrear for four weeks, or if Mr. or Mrs. Hale should sell or encumber the business, J. Von Swartwout, her agents or attorney, might enter into possession of and hold, manage, and carry on the same for her own benefit, and that the business should then be assigned to her subject to the proviso for redemption in the event of payment of the arrears of the annuity. Clause 9 of the agreement was as follows: "In case the said J. Von Swartwout shall at any time become entitled to enter into possession of the business as aforesaid, the powers conferred by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, upon a mortgagee when the mortgage money has become due shall, so far as the same are applicable to the terms and conditions of these presents, thereupon become exercisable. And it shall be lawful for the said J. Von Swartwout, either by herself or by her agents or attorney, in lieu of taking possession or before or after taking possession of the business, to exercise the power of appointing a receiver conferred by the said Act. And by way of extension of the provisions of the said Act, it is hereby also agreed that any receiver appointed under the said power in that behalf shall be at liberty, if so directed in writing by the said J. Von Swartwout, her agents or attorney, to manage and carry on the business as he may think fit, and that any moneys he or the said J. Von Swartwout, her agents or attorney, may pay or expend for that purpose, and whether before or subsequent to redemption by the said F. W. Hale or other the person or persons entitled tot he business as aforesaid, shall be considered as charged upon the business with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum."

Hale in carrying on the business became indebted to the plaintiff for printing. In October, 1888, the debt was £1,000, and it was arranged between them that this should be paid off by instalments of £25 per month. These instalments were paid down to the time of his death by Hale, who in the meantime continued to carry on the business. He died on the 16th of June, 1891.

By his will Hale appointed the defendant, Miss Foad, and one Richardson, who had acted as his manager, his executrix and executor.

Richardson renounced probate, and the will was proved by the defendant only. Under the will the defendant was beneficially entitled to all Hale's estate, subject to debts and charges thereon.

Until the 29th of July, 1891, the business was carried on by Richardson and one Lewis, who was also in Hale's employment at the time of his death.

At the time of Hale's death the annuity was in arrear to the extent of £1,010, and by a document under her hand dated the 29th of July, 1891, which referred to the agreement of the 13th of December, 1886, J. Von Swartwout appointed a receiver in these terms: "I hereby, in virtue of the powers vested in me for that purpose by the said agreement, appoint Frederick Johnson as receiver of the said business with full power to manage and carry on the same as he may think fit, but subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in the said agreement," and the receiver was to be remunerated by a percentage on his gross receipts.

After the death of Hale four sums of £25 each were paid to the plaintiff on account of his debt, the first sum being paid on the 8th of July, 1891, by Richardson before the appointment of the receiver, the second on the 6th of August by Johnson, the receiver, the third and fourth by Lewis on the 4th of September, and on the 2nd of October, 1891. In October, 1891, a fresh receiver was appointed by the annuitant, and he declined to make any further payments to the plaintiff. As regards the first payment the learned judge was not satisfied on the evidence that it was made by Richardson as the agent of the executrix, and the decision of the case turned upon the payment by Johnson on the 6th of August, 1891. This summons was taken out by the plaintiff on the 3rd of July, 1897.

Younger, for the plaintiff.—There is no decision which is quite in point as to the authority of the receiver, but the observations of Rolt, L.J., in Law v. Glenn, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 634, and of Rigby, L.J., in D. Owen & Co. v. Cronk, [1895] 1 Q. B. 265, at p. 275, 43 W. R. Dig. 147, show that a receiver appointed under a deed of mortgage by the mortgagee is a receiver for all purposes, and that his acts may affect the rights of others beside the mortgagor and the mortgagee. Here Johnson, being expressly empowered to manage and carry on the business, was authorized to pay this debt which was incurred in respect of the business, and being the agent of the mortgagor under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 24, his payment on the 6th of August was equivalent to a payment by the executrix of the mortgagor, and prevented the debts being barred under the statute. Secondly, I say that in any case the time could not begin to run until November, 1891, as until then there had been no default in payment: Reeves v. Butcher, 39 W. R. 626, [1891] 2 Q. B. 509.

Astbury, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the defendant.—The receiver appointed by the mortgagee, although the agent of the mortgagor, was not the agent of the executrix. He in any case was not her agent to give an acknowledgment of the debt so as to prevent it being barred as against a third party: Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 327, 19 Ch. D. 539; Chinnery v. Evans, 13 W. R. 20, 11 H. L. Cas. 115; Newbould v. Smith, 34 W. R. 690. It was not intended by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to enable a receiver appointed under section 24 to alter the legal rights of third persons. He is only to act as between mortgagor and mortgagee. The only object of the appointment of the receiver is to protect the property: see observations of Cranworth, L.C., in Jefferys v. Dickson, 14 W. R. 322, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 183; Bayly v. Went, 51 L. T. Rep. 764, 33 W. R. Dig. 106. To prevent the time running the payment must be made by someone liable to pay: Morgan v. Rowlands, 20 W. R. 726, L. R. 7 Q. B. 493. The receiver was not liable to pay this debt. It was not an outgoing from the mortgaged property: Gosling v. Gaskell, 46 W. R. 208, [1897] A. C. 575. If he was liable to pay this debt, he would have been liable to pay all the debts of the mortgagor. To prevent the operation of the statute the acknowledgment must amount to a new promise to pay the whole debt: Wainman v. Kynman, 1 Exch. 118; Stamford Banking Co. v. Smith, 40 W. R. 355, [1892] 1 Q. B. 765; Hollis v. Palmer, 2 Bing. N. C. 713. Can it be said that Johnson had any such authority from the executrix? Suppose the debt had been wholly barred at the time, could it be said the receiver was authorized to make a new promise to pay the debt, or give an acknowledgment of its existence?

BYRNE, J.—It is common ground that if any of these four payments can be properly considered as one raising the implication of a promise to pay the balance of the debt, the plaintiff has not the stumbling-block of the Statute of Limitations in his way. I will take the one made by Johnson on the 6th of August, after he was appointed receiver, and while he was, under the power conferred upon him by the document appointing him, carrying on the business, with the duty imposed upon him of managing and preserving it and the assets and goodwill which constituted the security for the annuity. Now, if this payment had been made by the executrix no question could have arisen. And if it was made by her agent authorized to make such a payment unconditionally and without circumstances negativing the implication of a new promise to pay which ordinarily arises from such a payment, then it is sufficient to prevent the operation of the statute. It was clearly a proper payment to be made. But it is said that it was a payment made by the receiver without authority from the person liable to pay. What, then, is the true result of the contract between the parties and the appointment of the receiver under it? In my opinion the reference in the agreement to the Conveyancing Act shows clearly that the intention of all the parties was that, although Mrs. Swartwout was to have the power of appointing the receiver, that receiver when so appointed was to be the agent of the mortgagor, and not of the mortgagee, for the purpose of managing and carrying on the business, and for the other purposes either expressly enumerated or incorporated by reference to the statute. That was hardly disputed, and it is further conceded, as indeed it must be, that the receiver was responsible to the mortgagor, and accountable to him for his receipts and for his doings as receiver. But it was said that even if Hale was to be regarded as the mortgagor within the meaning of the agreement (as undoubtedly he was, although there was another person having an interest in the business after his death), still his executrix was not necessarily regarded in the same position. It was urged that, although this was a debt arising out of business transactions, yet, as Hale alone was carrying on the business, he alone was the person to be sued, and that it was his private debt as much as any other debt which he might owe independently of the business. I cannot accept this view. In my opinion the executrix of Hale occupied under the agreement the same position as Hale did as between herself and the mortgagee—that is to say, the position of mortgagor to mortgagee within the meaning of the phrase as used in the document. Hale was liable to the whole extent of his assets, while his executrix was liable to the extent of the same assets so far as they came to her as executrix. To that extent her liability was the same as his, and she was the person to be sued in respect of the debt. Now, this particular payment of £25 on the 6th of August, 1891, was a payment which, if Hale had been alive and carrying on the business, would have been justly due from him, and for which his executrix was to the extent of assets liable and bound. The payment having been made was clearly a payment made on behalf of the mortgagor, and by the agent of the mortgagor, such agent being the mortgagor's agent for the purpose of managing and carrying on the business, and making all proper payments necessary for its good conduct and preservation. But it was ingeniously urged that the real principle of all these cases of part payment depriving the Statute of Limitations of its operation is that an unconditional payment, if made by the person liable to pay to the person entitled to receive it, is, standing alone, such evidence of a new promise to pay the balance of the debt as that it may be acted upon, and so destroy the operation of the statute. The true principle is, however, that part payment takes the debt out of the statute, because payment of part is an acknowledgment of the existence of the whole debt, and from it the law raises the implication of a promise to pay the remainder. There might be circumstances which would prevent that implication arising, but in the present case I find none such existing. It, then, remains for me to consider whether there is anything in the argument that a distinction must be drawn between an authority to make a new promise to pay, and an authority to do that which in law, and in the absence of express agreement, would raise the implied promise to pay. I think not. I do not think that it matters whether the receiver is appointed with the direct authority in so many terms to make new promises to pay old debts, or whether the authority given to him is an authority to do such acts as will raise the inference of a new promise to pay them. It appears to me that in the present case the receiver, so long as he acted providently and rightfully, was entitled to manage this business by doing that which a prudent man owning the business would have done in his place had he been carrying it on on his own account. I think therefore that he was justified in making the payment he did. I think that he made such payment unconditionally, and as agent of the mortgagor, who at that time was the executrix, and that the payment having been made by the agent of the person liable to pay to the person entitled to receive it, the implication of a new promise to pay the balance of the debt arises, and that therefore this one payment being sufficient the statute does not apply.

I have not gone through the various cases which were cited before me. There is very little difference as to the principle to be applied. Most of them have arisen as between mortgagor and mortgagee. I will refer to the observations of Rolt, L.J., in Law v. Glenn, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 634, at p. 641, and the dictum of so great a judge is entitled to the very greatest attention: "It was contended on behalf of the defendants, the Messrs. Martin, that the appointment of the receiver by the deed of even date with the plaintiffs' first mortgage (which was in the usual form of such deeds) did not constitute the receiver for all purposes the agent of the mortgagor, and that in fact the receiver must be deemed when in possession to have received the rents as agent of the plaintiffs, and that the only object and effect of the receivership deed was to prevent the plaintiffs from being charged in the accounts for wilful neglect or default. No direct authority was cited for this proposition, and if it were necessary now to decide it, I should hold that it could not be maintained, and that the receiver must be treated as being for all purposes the agent of the mortgagor, and that the payments made by him to the mortgagee were payments by the mortgagor continuing in possession of the mortgaged estate." That was a case as between mortgagor and mortgagee, but I think the same principle must apply so long as payments are made by the receiver within the authority conferred upon him. They are to be referred to his agency of the mortgagor, and not to his agency of the mortgagee. I will also refer to a passage in the judgment of Rigby, L.J., in Owen v. Cronk, [1895] 1 Q. B. 265, at p. 274: "It has been said that as the defendant is called a receiver, we must be guided by cases which have established the personal liability of executors or trustees who carry on a business. In my opinion those cases are in no way analogous to the present." After giving his reasons why he does not think that applies to the particular case which was before him, which was the case of a business being carried on by a receiver appointed by trustees for debenture-holders under a deed, he says: "The court cannot carry on the business itself, nor can it be responsible to the creditors. In order that cases of this kind may apply to the present case, it must be shown that the defendant carried on the business of the company upon similar terms. But when we look at the trust deed we find that it contains no such provision. The deed provides that the receiver, though appointed by the mortgagees, shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagors. It is said that this applies only as between the mortgagors and the mortgagees; but I do not think it can be so limited."

As I have said, I do not think it necessary to go through all the cases that have been cited. It comes in each case to be a question whether the payment was made by a person authorized as agent of the person liable or bound to pay to the person entitled to receive, and in the present case I consider that the payment to which I have referred was such a payment. Having regard to my decision upon the first point, I need not decide the second point made for the plaintiff; but I desire to say that I do not express upon it any hostile opinion.

A reservoir of a water company held to be "land covered with water" within the meaning of section 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act, 1875, and therefore assessable to general district rates at one-fourth of its annual value.

Reg. v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 1 B. & S. 84, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 76, approved.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

Upon the hearing of a complaint preferred by the Hampton Urban District Council against the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. for the recovery of general district rates, the justices ordered the company to pay the amount thereof, subject to a case.

At the hearing of the complaint it was proved that the company were rated in respect of part of a reservoir, the net annual value of which part was £1,940, and that the rates were calculated on the full net annual value of £1,940. The company tendered a sum calculated on one-fourth part only of the net annual value, which was refused.

The reservoir was partly in the Hampton urban district, and the total water area was 10½ acres. The bed of the reservoir consisted of a lining of concrete 9 inches thick laid on the earth which had been excavated so that the bed of the reservoir was several feet below the surface of the surrounding land, and the reservoir was surrounded on all sides by an earthen embankment lined with concrete 9 inches thick, and faced as to the upper 12 feet thereof with bricks 4½ inches in thickness, the whole being surrounded with a brick coping 14 inches in width. The embankment was used solely for the purpose of keeping the water in the reservoir, and varied from 10 feet to 18 feet high above the natural surface of the ground, and had a depth of about 35 feet. The reservoir was used simply for storing water taken from the River Thames, and was covered permanently with water, except when the reservoir was emptied for the purpose of cleaning it, which would take about a week. The reservoir had been constructed about three years, and had been cleaned only once in that time, and in future it would probably be emptied on the average about once in two years. The total cost of constructing the reservoir was £63,000.

The company contended that the reservoir was "land covered with water" within the meaning of section 211, sub-section 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that they ought to be assessed in respect thereof in the proportion of one-fourth only of the net annual value. The question for the court was whether this contention was correct.

By section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it is enacted as follows: "With respect to the assessment and levying of general district rates under this Act the following provisions shall have effect: . . . (1) (b) The owner of any tithes, or of any tithe commutation rent-charge, or the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market-gardens, or nursery-grounds, and the occupier of any land covered with water, or used only as a canal or towing-path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof."

The Divisional Court (Wright and Darling, JJ.) held that they were bound by the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in East London Waterworks Co. v. Leyton Sewer Authority, 20 W. R. 95, L. R. 6 Q. B. 669, and allowed the appeal.

The Hampton District Council appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and Courthope-Munroe, for the Hampton District Council.—There is a preliminary objection to this appeal being heard which ought to be mentioned, though neither side wishes to take it. In Seaman v. Burley, 45 W. R. 1 [1896] 2 Q. B. 344, this court held that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on a case stated by justices upon an application to enforce payment of a poor rate by a warrant of distress was a judgment in a "criminal cause or matter" within section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that no appeal lay to the Court of Appeal. But that was the case of a poor rate, where it has been held that justices act merely ministerially, Reg. v. Price, 28 W. R. 615, 5 Q. B. D. 300; and does not touch the case of a general district rate, which is recoverable upon complaint to a court of summary jurisdiction under section 256 of the Public Health Act, 1875. By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 22, justices were empowered, in cases of orders for payment of money, in default of distress, to commit the defendant to prison. But now by section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, a sum recoverable on complaint to a court of summary jurisdiction is made a civil debt; and by section 35, in the case of a civil debt recoverable summarily, any sum declared by the Act to be a civil debt recoverable summarily shall be deemed to be a sum for payment of which a court of summary jurisdiction has authority to make an order on complaint; and an order made by the court shall not in default of distress be enforced by imprisonment unless the person making default has or has had since the date of the order the means to pay and has refused or neglected to do so, and the court shall have the same power of imprisonment as a county court judge would have if the debt had been recovered in the county court. A general district rate is therefore now a civil debt, and the proceeding is not in a "criminal cause or matter" within section 47, and an appeal lies. Moreover Seaman v. Burley was decided upon a local Act to which perhaps the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, does not apply.

Cripps, Q.C., and Ryde, for the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal. The last case upon the subject is Seaman v. Burley, which related to the enforcement of a poor rate by a warrant of distress, and this court held that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in such a case was a judgment in a criminal cause or matter within section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was not called to the attention of the court in that case, probably for the reason that it had been held in Reg. v. Price that the Act of 1879 did not apply to proceedings for the recovery of poor rates. It is quite clear, however, that the Act of 1879 does apply to the recovery of general district rates. By section 256 of the Public Health Act, 1875, if any person assessed to any rate made under the Act (which includes general district rates) fails to pay the same when due and for fourteen days after demand in writing made upon him, any justice may summon the defaulter to appear before the court of summary jurisdiction to show cause why the rate in arrear should not be paid; and if no sufficient cause for non-payment is shown, the court may make an order for payment of the same, and, in default of compliance with such order, may by warrant cause the same to be levied by distress. By section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, where a sum of money is recoverable on complaint to a court of summary jurisdiction, it shall be deemed to be a civil debt, and shall be recoverable as a civil debt, and not otherwise; and by section 35, any sum declared to be a civil debt, which is recoverable summarily, shall be deemed to be a sum for the payment of which a court of summary jurisdiction has authority by law to make an order on complaint, and an order made by a court of summary jurisdiction for payment of a civil debt shall not in default of distress be enforced by imprisonment unless the defendant has or has had since the date of the order the means to pay the sum and has refused or neglected to do so, as in the case of a county court judgment. Put shortly, a sum recoverable summarily before a court of summary jurisdiction as a civil debt is now recoverable, in default of distress, in the same way as a judgment debt in a county court action. That is not a criminal cause or matter. This class of debt—namely, general district rates—is by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, taken out of the class of criminal matters, and made a civil debt. Therefore the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division is not a judgment in a criminal cause or matter, and an appeal lies.

RIGBY and COLLINS, L JJ., concurred.

Objection overruled.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and Courthope-Munroe, for the Hampton District Council.—The reservoir is not "land covered with water" within the meaning of section 211, sub-section 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875. Those words mean land covered naturally with water. They cannot include a reservoir, which is an artificial construction, like a large tank placed on the land. In Peto v. Overseers of West Ham, 7 W. R. 586, 2 E. & E. 144, it was held that a wet dock was "property other than land" within section 33 of the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833. In Reg. v. Overseers of Neath, L. R. 6 Q. B. 707, 20 W. R. C. L. Dig. 74, a canal and towing-path, and in Reg. v. Midland Railway Co., 23 W. R. 921, L. R. 10 Q. B. 389, a line of railway, were held to be "land" within that section. In Reg. v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 1 B. & S. 84, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 76, a reservoir was held to be "land covered with water" within the meaning of a local Act; and in Newport Dock Co. v. Newport Local Board, 2 B. & S. 708, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 136, a dock was held to be "land covered with water" within section 55 of the Local Government Act, 1858. These cases were followed by East London Waterworks Co. v. Leyton Sewer Authority, 20 W. R. 95, L. R. 6 Q. B. 669, where it was held that a canal and filter beds were "land covered with water" within section 17 of the Sewage Utilization Act, 1867. These last three cases were wrongly decided, and, as they are not binding upon this court, they ought to be overruled. The considerations applicable to the case of Peto v. Overseers of West Ham are applicable here.

They also cited Thursby v. Churchwardens, &c., of Briercliffe-with-Extwistle, [1895] A. C. 32, 43 W. R. Dig. 130.

Cripps, Q.C., and Ryde, for the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co.—The reservoir is "land covered with water" within the meaning of the Public Health Act. Reg. v. Birmingham Waterworks Co. is an express authority for this, and it was affirmed in the Newport case and the Leyton case. On the other hand, Peto v. Overseers of West Ham, Reg. v. Overseers of Neath, Reg. v. Midland Railway Co., and Thursby v. Churchwardens, &c., of Briercliffe-with-Extwistle are all decisions on the meaning of "property other than land" in the Lighting and Watching Act, and do not in any way govern this case.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed. An attempt has been made to apply a decision on a set of words in one Act of Parliament to a different set of words in another Act of Parliament. A water company claims to be entitled to be assessed to a general district rate in respect of a reservoir at one-fourth of its annual value. The rating authority assessed the company at the full annual value of the reservoir, but the Queen's Bench Division on the hearing of a special case held that the company was entitled to be assessed at one-fourth of the value. The question turns on section 211, sub-section 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875, which enacts that in the making of general district rates certain classes of hereditaments, among them being "land covered with water," are to be assessed at one-fourth of their net annual value. There are three decided cases on the words used in this section, but even without their help the section itself seems to me quite clear, and, when they are taken into consideration, the case for the appellants seems to me to be unarguable. We have to consider what is the primâ facie meaning of "land covered with water"; and when the question is asked whether a reservoir is "land covered with water," the only answer that I can give to that question is, yes. It is argued that because this reservoir has a bed of concrete and was constructed at enormous expense, therefore it cannot be "land covered with water" within the meaning of the section. But almost the next exception mentioned in the section is a railway, and everyone knows that it costs a great deal of money to make a railway. It seems to me that on the plain construction of the Act a reservoir is "land covered with water" within the meaning of section 211.

I now come to the cases, which are decisions on words identical with the words used in this section. In 1861 it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Birmingham Waterworks Co. that a reservoir was "land covered with water" within the meaning of those words occurring in a local Act. I quite agree with the judgments there delivered. It is pointed out that Peto v. Overseers of West Ham was not referred to in argument. I am not surprised, for that case is not an authority on the meaning of the words "land covered with water." Then in 1862 the same court held in Newport Dock Co. v. Newport Local Board that a dock was "land covered with water" within the meaning of those words occurring in section 55 of the Local Government Act, 1858. In that case Peto v. Overseers of West Ham was cited. The next thing that happened in order of date was that in 1867 the Sewage Utilization Act was passed, and in that Act the Legislature, having before them those two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, again used the same words "land covered with water." Then in 1871 came the case of East London Waterworks Co. v. Leyton Sewer Authority, in which the Court of Queen's Bench again put the same construction on the same words, and held that a canal and filter beds were "land covered with water" within the meaning of those words occurring in the Sewage Utilization Act, 1867. Then lastly in order of time came the Public Health Act, 1875, in which the Legislature again used the same words in the section now under consideration.

The rating authority relied on the case of Peto v. Overseers of West Ham, where the question was whether docks were "land" or "property other than land" within the meaning of section 33 of the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that they were "property other than land," and therefore rateable at the higher rate under that Act. They also referred to the cases of Reg. v. Overseers of Neath and Reg. v. Midland Railway Co., in which it was held that a canal and a railway were "land" within that section. It seems to me that these three cases on the Lighting and Watching Act are not applicable to the consideration of what is "land covered with water" in the Public Health Act, 1875. The rating authority also cited Thursby v. Churchwardens, &c., of Briercliffe-with-Extwistle. But it is clear that there Lord Herschell did not intend to overrule any of the previous authorities, and in my judgment that case does not affect our present decision.

BAXTER v. HOLDSWORTH. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Notice of trial—Length of notice—Ten days before trial—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, rr. 14, 18; ord. 30, r. 2.

The court has jurisdiction to order a defendant, in any case in which it seems just, to take ten days' notice of trial, to expire on the day when the trial comes on.

Appeal from an order of Channell, J., at chambers.

The writ of summons in the action was issued on the 26th of October, 1898, and was indorsed with a claim for the recovery of possession of land.

In June, 1898, negotiations had been going on between the parties for the sale of the land in question by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the defendant had gone into possession. Five days before the issue of the writ in this action the defendant had commenced an action against the plaintiff in the Chancery Division for specific performance of a contract for the sale of the land.

On the 10th of November, the defendant took out a summons for the transfer of the present action from the Queen's Bench Division to the Chancery Division. That summons was ordered to stand over till after the hearing of a summons for directions in the present action.

On the hearing of the summons for directions the master made an order that pleadings should be delivered—viz., a statement of claim forthwith, the defence within ten days after the statement of claim, and a reply, if any, within one day after the defence. He refused to make any order as to notice of trial.

On the 16th of November, an appeal from the master's order came before Channell, J., when the learned judge varied the order by ordering that the defendant should take such notice of trial as might be necessary for the then ensuing Liverpool Assizes, if such notice were given within one day after the delivery of the defence, the case not to be tried before the 7th of December.

In pursuance of this order the plaintiff gave notice of trial to the defendant on the 26th of November. The Liverpool Assizes commenced on the 28th of November.

The defendant appealed from the order of the judge.

T. W. Chitty, for the defendant.—By ord. 36, r. 14, "Ten days' notice of trial shall be given, unless the party to whom it is given has consented or is under terms or has been ordered to take short notice of trial; and shall be sufficient in all cases, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge." And by rule 18, "Notice of trial elsewhere than in London or Middlesex shall be deemed to be for the first day of the then next assizes at the place for which notice of trial is given." Rule 18A gives special provisions as to Manchester and Liverpool, which, however, do not avail the plaintiff in this case. The effect of rules 14 and 18 is that every defendant is entitled to ten days' notice of trial, unless he is himself asking the indulgence of the court, or is in mercy, as it is called; and in the case of actions to be tried at assizes the notice must be a notice to expire not later than the commission day: Laskier v. Tekeian, 67 L. T. Rep. 121, 41 W. R. Dig. 184. Here the defendant only had two days' notice of trial. Notice given ten days before the trial actually comes on is not sufficient.

L. Sanderson, for the plaintiff, was not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—By the order of Channell, J., the defendant had ten days' notice of trial given to him prior to the day on which it was intended that the trial should come on. The question is whether the learned judge had jurisdiction to make that order. No doubt without an order of a judge the proper notice of trial is a ten days' notice prior to the commission day, except in the cases of Manchester and Liverpool, as to which there is a special provision. But the question is whether a judge has not jurisdiction to make a special order that the defendant shall take ten days' notice prior to the day on which the trial is to come on. It is argued that a defendant, unless he is in mercy, is absolutely entitled to ten days' notice of trial, and that, unless the notice is given ten days before the commission day, the case must necessarily go over to the next assizes. I do not think so. Ord. 36, r. 14, says that ten days' notice of trial shall be given, but that rule says nothing about its being ten days before the commission day, though that has been the practice and no doubt will continue so, except in cases where the defendant has put himself in mercy by coming to the court to ask for some indulgence. We were pressed with rule 18, which says that notice of trial elsewhere than in London or Middlesex shall be deemed to be for the first day of the then next assizes at the place for which notice of trial is given. I do not see anything in that rule which says that a judge may not, in any case in which it appears to him to be right, order a defendant to take ten days' notice, to expire before the hearing of the trial. Then ord. 30, r. 2, says that upon the hearing of a summons for directions a judge shall make such order as may be just with respect to all interlocutory proceedings to be taken in the action before the trial. I cannot see why the order made in this case was not just, and I think that the learned judge had jurisdiction to make it. I am not now deciding anything contrary to what we decided in Laskier v. Tekeian. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

Patent—Pending action for infringement or proceeding for revocation — Disclaimer—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18, 19, 20.

Where an action for infringement, or proceeding for the revocation, of a patent is pending, the patentee may not, under section 19 of the Patents, &c., Act of 1883, apply for leave to amend the patent by way of correction or explanation, except so far as such correction or explanation is incidental to a disclaimer strictly so called.

The case raised a question as to the true construction of section 19 of the Patents, &c., Act of 1883.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Stirling, J.

Moulton, Q.C., and J. C. Graham, for the patentee.—Section 19 must be read as if the words "correction or explanation" were therein inserted after the word "disclaimer." The question has come before the law officers, and their practice is settled, and they read the section in the wider sense: In the Matter of Lang's Patent, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 469; In the Matter of Goulard and Gibbs' Patent, 5 Rep. Pat. Cas. 189.

Bousfield, Q.C., and Buckmaster, for the respondents, cited In the Matter of Armstrong's Patent, 1[illegible] Rep. Pat. Cas. 747.

STIRLING, J.—This is an application made under section 19 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, which provides that "in an action for infringement of a patent and in a proceeding for revocation of a patent the court or a judge may at any time order that the patentee shall, subject to such terms as to costs and otherwise as the court or judge may impose, be at liberty to apply at the Patent Office for leave to amend his specifications by way of disclaimer, and may direct that in the meantime the trial or hearing of the action shall be postponed."

There is pending before me a proceeding for the revocation of this patent, and the application to me is in form that the patentee may be at liberty to apply for leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer. In chambers before me it was stated by the respondents that the application was not for leave to amend by way of disclaimer, and thereupon I requested that it should be made clear to me exactly what the patentee proposed to apply for, and the patentee has now produced to me a copy of the specification amended as he desires to have it amended. The language of sections 18, 19, and 20 of the Act of 1883 are somewhat remarkable. Section 18 (1) is "an applicant or a patentee may from time to time, by request in writing left at the Patent Office, seek to amend his specification, including drawings forming part thereof, by way of disclaimer, correction, or explanation, stating the nature of such amendment and his reasons for the same." Sub-sections 2 to 9 inclusive, are consequential on that. Sub-section 10 ran as follows: "The foregoing provisions of this section do not apply when and so long as any action for infringement or other legal proceeding in relation to a patent is pending." By the 5th section of the amending Act of 1888 another sub-section is substituted by sub-section 10, which runs thus: "The foregoing provisions of this section do not apply when and so long as any action for infringement or proceeding for revocation of a patent is pending." Section 19 of the Act of 1883 I have already read, but it is important to observe that that section is limited to amendment by way of disclaimer. Section 20, which also deals with amendment by way of disclaimer, provides that "Where an amendment by way of disclaimer, correction, or explanation has been allowed under this Act, no damages shall be given in any action in respect of the use of the invention before the disclaimer, correction, or explanation, unless the patentee establishes to the satisfaction of this court that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge."

The contention on the part of the applicants is that there has been a slip made in section 19 of the Act, and that the word "disclaimer" ought to be read as having the same meaning as if the words "correction or explanation" were added after it. It has been admitted very candidly that the amendment proposed is not by way of disclaimer, if that word is to be construed in its narrower meaning.

It is said that this matter has been discussed before the law officers, and that the wider construction has been put upon the section by them. The practice is stated to have been settled so far as the law officers are concerned by the case of In the Matter of Lang's Patent. There the law officer was dealing with an objection founded upon the peculiar language of section 18, sub-section 10, as amended by the Act of 1888, that is to say, "the foregoing provisions of this section (section 18) do not apply when and so long as any action for infringement or proceeding for revocation of a patent is pending." Whilst section 19 merely gives the court power to direct that the trial or hearing of the action shall be postponed, therefore it is said none of the earlier clauses of section 18 apply, and there is no machinery for making applications as to the amendment of the patent. The court and the law officers have got over that by saying that sub-section 10 must be read as subject to the qualifying proviso, "Save so far as shall be necessary for enabling an amendment under section 19 to be made."

But does that enable an application to be made otherwise than for an amendment by way of disclaimer? The law officer answers "No." He says: "My jurisdiction here is under the combined operation of the 18th and 19th sections of the Patents Act, and I have no doubt that when, under the 19th section, the court or judge orders that the patentee shall be at liberty to apply to the Patent Office for leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer, the provisions of section 18 do apply as if that section stood without the three words in it 'correction or explanation.'" Consequently in that case his jurisdiction is limited to allowing amendment by way of disclaimer only. He continues: "I do not doubt that I have power to allow any amendment—whether of the letterpress of the specification, or of the drawings, or by way of adding drawings if drawings have not in the first instance been appended to the specification—necessary to define the disclaimer which it is desired to make." That is to say, that when an application is made for a real disclaimer there is a power to amend by giving all explanations necessary for the purpose of defining more clearly the disclaimer; and in that case the patent which came before the law officer was one which it was desired to amend by way of disclaimer.

I was also referred to the case of In re Goulard & Gibbs' Patent. The disclaimer there asked for was of clause 3 of the specification, and it was allowed.

These cases do not, in my opinion, help the applicant. The very point, however, seems to have been present to the mind of Chitty, L.J., in In the Matter of Armstrong's Patent, 14 Rep. Pat. Cas. 747, for at p. 754 he says: "The amendment that could be made, even if leave were granted, would merely be by way of disclaimer; that being clear under section 18 (and also section 19), which uses the three terms, and shows that the term 'disclaimer,' which alone occurs in the 19th section, is so used advisedly." Therefore it appears to have been the opinion of the Lord Justice in that case, that the word "disclaimer" could not receive the extended meaning which it is sought to give it here. There is no express decision upon the point, but the authorities appear to me to be all one way, that is to say, to read "disclaimer" strictly.

Having regard, therefore, to the nature of the amendment proposed to be made in this case, it seems to me that this application must be refused with costs.

Held, that the order, in also ordering the defendant to pay the costs, was good.

The plaintiff, M. Woolf, trading as "Woolf Bros.," sued the defendant, J. Woolf, trading, in the same line of business, under the style of "Woolf Brothers," and claimed an injunction to restrain him from carrying on his business under that style or in any manner leading the public to believe that his business was connected with that of the plaintiff. It transpired that the defendant was an infant. His lordship granted the injunction, and ordered the defendant to pay the costs of the action. The defendant objected on the point of costs, denying his liability. At the instance of the registrar, his lordship directed the point to be mentioned in court.

J. F. Waggett, for the plaintiff, asked that the order should go as made, as it was now settled practice that an infant defendant in such a case could be made liable: Chubb v. Griffiths, 35 Beav. 127; Lemprière v. Lange, 27 W. R. 879, 12 Ch. D. 675, which are cited on the point in such text-books as Morgan and Wurtsburg on Costs, Simpson on Infants, Sebastian on Trade-Marks, Chitty's Equity Index.

A. H. Dennis, for the defendant, contended that the authorities did not cover the present case, which was not one of fraud; here liability in respect of a tort might carry liability for damages, but not for costs, since, being an infant, the defendant could not engage in legal proceedings. (Counsel distinguished the cases above cited, and referred to Cory v. Gertcken, 2 Madd. 40.)

KEKEWICH, J., did not regard as satisfactory the case of Chubb v. Griffiths, where it was not clear that the defendant was an infant, while the judgment of Romilly, M.R., was so puzzling as not to throw light on the principle. His lordship did not think he could regard the distinct words of Jessel, M.R., in In re Jones, 29 W. R. 747, 18 Ch. D. 109, otherwise than as a judicial expression on the point, and he was bound to take it as settled practice that an infant defendant in such an action could be made liable; so that the order must go as made.

Will — Misnomer — Description — Construction — Latent ambiguity — Extrinsic evidence — Admissibility of former wills.

W. by his will bequeathed legacies to such of the daughters of his late friend I. S. as should survive the testator unmarried. The facts showed that I. S. survived the testator and was a Roman Catholic priest and unmarried, but having five unmarried sisters, all being the children of J. S., who predeceased the testator by many years, and was scarcely known by him. The five ladies claimed the legacies, on the ground that the testator had made an obvious nominal error, and relying on the evidence of three previous wills, which as a series showed that they were in fact the beneficiaries in the testator's mind.

Held, that the three discarded wills were admissible as evidence, but that in this particular case the remoteness of the first from the testator's final mind did not justify the alteration of the mistake in the court's construction of the will.

Originating summons.

This was a summons taken out by the two surviving executors and trustees of the will of C. H. Waller, deceased, dated the 6th of July, 1896, whereby the testator bequeathed legacies out of the residue of his estate in the following terms—viz., "to such of the daughters of my late friend Ignatius Scoles deceased as shall be living and unmarried at my decease legacies of one hundred pounds each"; the residue was then to be divided equally between the following four charities: The British Home for Incurables, the Orphan Hospital, Edinburgh, the National Lifeboat Institution, and the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution, of which the first-named was made one of the defendants, the other three consenting to be bound by any order made. The direction of the court was required because there were no legatees answering to the description given in the will; one Ignatius Scoles, a friend of the testator, survived him, and for thirty years prior to his own death was a priest in the Roman Catholic Church and was never married; but he had seven sisters, also the children of Joseph John Scoles, an architect, who died in 1863; five of these sisters were unmarried at the death of the testator, and were made defendants to the summons.

G. W. Brabant, for the plaintiffs, the trustees, narrated the facts of the case and said that the question was whether the five ladies were each entitled to a legacy of £100, or whether the legacies should fall into the residue.

P. F. S. Stokes, for the defendants, the five ladies.—The defendants are entitled to the legacies under the will; the obvious mistake of the testator ought to be rectified by the court in the light of the evidence adduced. This evidence was extrinsic, and consisted principally of a series of three earlier wills, dated respectively the 20th of March, 1893, the 13th of November, 1894, and the 1st of January, 1896. By the first of these the testator had bequeathed "for the six daughters of the late Mr. Scoles, architect, who formerly resided at Crofton Lodge, Hammersmith—namely, Mrs. Annie James and the Misses Lilian, Caroline, Emily, Catherine, and Octavia Scoles—the sum of £1,000 in equal shares"; by the second, "to such of the daughters of my late friend Ignatius Scoles, deceased, as shall survive me a legacy of £100 each"; the third will contained the same words as the second. The five female defendants can rely on these earlier wills to show that the testator had merely made a mistake in name, and had not meant "Ignatius" at all. Where there was such a latent ambiguity, this extrinsic evidence was applicable: Camoys v. Blundell, 1 H. L. Cas. 778; Reynolds v. Whelan, 16 L. J. Ch. 434; In re Feltham's Trust, 1 K. & J. 528, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 97, 130; Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 363; and Blundell v. Gladstone, 11 Sim. 467, 1 Ph. 279; Jarman (5th ed.), vol. i., p. 412.

D. Stewart Smith, on behalf of the charities claiming the residuary legacies, contended that such extraneous matter ought not to be imported, unless merely to show the testator's knowledge of surrounding circumstances; they could not be made evidence of testamentary intention where the testator had it in his mind to revoke them: In re Gregory's Settlement, 13 W. R. 828, 6 N. R. 282; Drake v. Drake, 8 H. L. Cas. 172, 9 W. R. H. L. Dig. 18.

KEKEWICH, J., said that the question was whether you are not entitled, and if so whether you are bound, to look in such a case at the immediately preceding will. It was impossible to exclude a former will on general principles; one was entitled to sit in the testator's chair, to have before one what he had before him, to see with his eyes, to hear with his ears, to see with his mind's eye; while rigidly excluding it as proof of his intention, it was impossible to approach the construction of a will which required some evidence, without looking at the will displaced thereby: Drake v. Drake; his lordship also referred to the case of Doe v. Huthwaite, 3 B. & Ald. 632. But here the difficulty arose that there were several former wills; how restrict oneself to the last? In Camoys v. Blundell, at p. 782 of 1 H. L. C., two former wills were received in evidence as exhibits on the re-hearing of the case. His lordship held that on the high authority of Cottenham, L.C., confirming the view of Wood, V.C., he must admit the evidence.

The facts of the case were sufficiently clear for him to say that it was quite possible a mistake had been made. But without reference to the former wills there was no authority on which he could say that "daughters of Ignatius" meant "sisters of Ignatius" or "daughters of Joseph," for that would be too great a departure from the language of the testator. Turning to the former wills, it was made plain that the case was distinguishable from Doe v. Huthwaite, for here was a mistake continued through several wills, and it was only far back through the series that the intention could be sought, if indeed it could there be so found. His lordship did not think that, although he had admitted the wills, he could rely with any satisfaction on a will which had been revoked again and again and for all practical purposes was out of his mind.

There must be a declaration that the legacies should fall into the residue, and that costs should come out of residue.

Estate duty payable on death of tenant for life to be borne rateably by the shares into which the estate became divisible and by the residuary devisee.

Summons.

The testator, Rev. H. B. Power, who died in 1882, by his will made in 1881 gave his widow a life interest in a moiety of his real estate, which on her death was to be distributed among his children in certain proportions, the plaintiff being the residuary legatee. The testator's widow died on the 6th of March, 1898. By a post-nuptial settlement dated the 21st of July, 1898, the legacy bequeathed to a daughter by the testator was settled upon herself, her husband, and their children, the plaintiff and the defendant being trustees of the same. The question was whether the estate duty which became payable on the decease of the life tenant in respect of the one moiety (legacy duty having already been paid on the remaining moiety) should be borne rateably by the several shares or by the residue.

A point arose concerning the intituling of the originating summons under the rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 55, r. 9 (c), as to whether it should be intituled in the matter of the estate of the deceased life tenant, or had been properly intituled in the matter of the estate of the original testator.

Lewis T. Dibdin, for the plaintiff.—The estate duty is to be borne rateably by the several shares in which the estate is divisible, and by that of the residuary legatee: Finance Act, 1894, ss. 6 (2) (4), 8 (4), 9 (1), 14 (1); In re Meyrick, 45 W. R. 120, [1897] 1 Ch. 99; Wade v. Wade, ante, p. 43, [1898] 2 Ch. 276.

D. N. Pollock, for the defendant, contended that the whole of the estate duty should be borne by the residuary legatee.

KEKEWICH, J., was of opinion that the estate duty was payable pro ratâ out of the shares of all the children and of the residuary legatee. Leave was given to amend, if necessary, by intituling the summons "in the matter of the estate of Mrs. Power" instead of "Rev. H. B. Power." There was no order as to costs, but his lordship intimated that the costs of both parties as between solicitor and client ought to be paid out of the different shares of the residue now divisible rateably according to the different interests therein.

Will—Construction—Legacy to illegitimate children—Intention of mistaken testatrix—Domicil—Roman-Dutch law applicable in Demerara (British Guiana).

Effect given to the express intention of a testatrix to benefit a specified class of children, even where she was in error in believing that as a fact they had been legitimated by the Roman-Dutch law which legitimates children born out of wedlock when the parents are subsequently married by lawful ceremony.

Summons.

This was a summons issued by the surviving trustee of the will of one Sarah Plant, deceased, who by a codicil thereto, dated the 4th of May, 1892, revoked the trusts contained therein concerning the application of a legacy of £600, and directed her trustees "from and immediately after the death of my son Thomas Edward Plant to divide the said sum of £600 and the investments thereof unto and equally between all the children of the said Thomas Edward Plant by his deceased wife and by his present wife, who shall be living at his decease share and share alike as tenants in common." This codicil was made under the following circumstances: T. E. Plant, an Englishman resident in Demerara since 1874, was first married in 1851, and by his first wife had a daughter, the defendant Lucy S. C. Hill. In 1860 the pair separated, and the wife disappeared; T. E. Plant subsequently cohabited in Demerara with an unmarried woman, by whom he had four children, the other defendants. On the 28th of March, 1892, subsequently to the birth of the four children, T. E. Plant went through the ceremony of marriage with their mother, it being believed that his first wife was dead; the effect of this, by the Roman-Dutch law obtaining in British Guiana, was to legitimate the said four children. The testatrix, upon hearing of her son's second marriage, and the effect of the same, had said, "Now Tom is married the children are legitimated, and are as much my grandchildren as Lucy is," and she made the codicil accordingly. The testatrix died on the 2nd of December, 1892, and in January, 1894, it was for the first time found that the first wife was still alive, being seen in the United States.

(a.) Reported by W. H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I. Badcock, for the plaintiff trustee, desired the direction of the court.

J. Rolt, for the defendant Lucy Hill, the child of the first wife, contended that the other defendants were in fact the children of an irregular concubinage; there was no intention shown in the will or by the evidence to benefit any but legitimate children, and the testator is in such case "his own dictionary": In re Harrison, Harrison v. Higson, [1894] 1 Ch. 561, where Kekewich, J., cited with approval In re Horner, 36 W. R. 348, 37 Ch. D. 695.

F. Thompson, for the four children, contended that, since the testatrix thought it was a valid marriage, she believed that all the children who were born at date of codicil, and whom she knew to have been born out of wedlock, were thereby legitimated; her reference was not to names, but to the marriage; she did intend to benefit these four children, all born, as she knew, out of wedlock; there was sufficient reference to them by the will to entitle them to take, and her express intention should be carried out; the Roman-Dutch law applied to the marriage, except for the reappearance of the first wife, for T. E. Plant had become domiciled in Demerara.

KEKEWICH, J., who remarked in the course of the case that it was very near the line, found on the evidence that the testatrix had meant to benefit some others than the child of her son's first wife, and that she knew that he had been living with the mother of the four children, to whom she referred in the codicil as "his present wife." His lordship continued: The difficulty is that she really thought that the first wife was dead, which she was not; that the second marriage was valid, which it was not; and that the law of Demerara, which was, I assume, applicable, was good to the extent of making the four children legitimate, for whom she then provided. I am asked to hold that because as a matter of fact she was wrong, the words of the will do not take effect. The later cases all go to say that, once you can find an express intention to give to illegitimate children, that intention must be fulfilled so far as the objects have been described. The testatrix has here expressed her intention to benefit these children. She had a misconception of facts, which were, however, present to her mind, so that she acted upon them. The question of domicil is, under the circumstances, not relevant. The legacy will go to the child of the first wife and the other four children as tenants in common.

Solicitor—Scale fee—Negotiating loan—Mortgage of personalty—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—Schedule I. of General Order.

The scale fee chargeable by a "mortgagee's solicitor for negotiating loan" under Schedule I. to the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, is not limited to loans on mortgages of "freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property" exclusively, but extends also to loans on mortgages of any kind of personal property.

Summons.

This was a summons by a solicitor who had acted both for the mortgagor and the mortgagees, in a mortgage transaction, to review the taxing-master's certificate, whereby the solicitor had been disallowed certain costs relating to the negotiation of several mortgages and charged according to the scale in Schedule I., Part. I., of the General Order to the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

The mortgage security consisted of a reversionary interest under certain wills (being, in part at any rate, an interest in personalty) and of a fund in court, and the solicitor, having procured the required advances from some of his own clients, charged the mortgagor with costs for negotiating the loans according to the scale in Schedule I. The taxing-master had disallowed these costs on the ground that as the mortgage security did not consist exclusively of "freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property," the scale for negotiating was not chargeable.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the applicant.—The words in the schedule, "mortgagee's solicitor for negotiating loan," are general words, and are not confined merely to loans on freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property. No doubt the word "loan" must be limited to loans on mortgage: D'Arcy to White, 31 L. R. Ir. 142, 41 W. R. Dig. 234. The fact that this item is placed between two items dealing with mortgages of realty does not give rise to any implication that the negotiating fee is similarly restricted; on the contrary, it rather militates against that view. The schedule was prepared by competent persons, as was pointed out by the present Master of the Rolls in In re McGarel, 45 W. R. 321, [1897] 1 Ch. 400, and it ought not to be assumed that the scope of this item was not intended to be more comprehensive than that of the adjacent items.

Warrington, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the respondent.—The taxing-master came to his conclusion not only because of the juxtaposition of the negotiating item, but also because of the wording of rule 10 in Schedule I., which seems to confine the loans contemplated in the schedule to loans on freehold, copyhold, and leasehold property exclusively; and we submit that he was right in his conclusion.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question raised on this summons is whether a solicitor can charge a scale fee for negotiating a loan, though the security for the loan is not to consist of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property exclusively. The taxing-master's view is that the scale fee is to be confined to loans of that character, but the solicitor contends that that view is wrong, and that the scale fee ought not to be so restricted. I think it is clear that the word "loan" means a loan on mortgage. The mortgagee's solicitor is the only person entitled to the scale fee for negotiating the loan, and therefore, if there is no mortgage, the fee is not payable. The Irish case of D'Arcy to White has been referred to as showing that "loan" means "loan on mortgage"; I do not think there can be any doubt about it, because the schedule is headed "Scale of charges on sales, purchases, and mortgages, and rules applicable thereto." Why the word "loan" was introduced I do not know; but I must assume that it was advisedly introduced by those who drew the rules. They were practical men conversant with these matters, and if they had intended that the scale fee should be confined to a loan on mortgage of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property exclusively, they would have said so. But it is argued that they have said so plainly by inserting this particular fee between two other scale fees both dealing with mortgages of freehold, copyhold, and leasehold property exclusively, and thereby indicating that this particular fee must also refer to the same thing. Now, it seems to me that that argument points directly the other way. It is because the scale fee for negotiating stands alone, and in that direct contrast, that it seems to me that the word "loan" ought not to be construed as relating only to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property. It is said, however, that rule 10 is contrary to that view, and that the words at the end of the rule—namely, "but the scale fee for negotiating the loan shall be chargeable on such transfers and further charges where it is applicable," show that that fee is to be limited to transfers and further charges of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property. But it seems that these words refer to the scale fee for negotiating, as something independent of, and standing apart from, the property which is the subject of the transfers and further charges referred to. In my opinion "negotiating loan" means negotiating loan of any kind so long as the loan is on mortgage, and I think it is erroneous to suppose that, because some property comprised in a mortgage is not of the particular kind to which title is deduced, or of which the title is investigated in the manner indicated in the schedule, therefore the scale fee for negotiating ought not to be charged. With that intimation I must remit the matter to the taxing-master.

STATHAM v. BRIGHTON MARINE PALACE AND PIER CO. (a.)

Company—Issue of shares at a discount—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16)—Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118)—Companies Clauses Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 48).

A company governed by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending it may issue fully paid-up original shares at a sum less than their nominal value in the same manner as new shares can, under the authority of those Acts, be issued.

The main object for which the defendant company was formed was to construct a new pier in the place of the old Chain Pier at Brighton, and was incorporated under a private Act of 1888, which embodied the Companies Clauses Acts of 1845 and 1863. The nominal capital consisted of £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each.

The company also had certain borrowing powers subject to a certificate under the Act of 1845 that £2 had been paid on each separate share.

In June, 1890, another company, which may be referred to as the limited company, was formed under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, with a capital of £75,000, in 15,000 shares of £5 each, with (inter alia) the following objects: (1) to adopt and carry into effect an agreement made between the defendant company of the first part, the limited company of the second part, and a company, which may be referred to as the works company, of the third part; (2) to acquire all or any of the shares of the defendant company and all or any part of the assets of that company, and to carry on and develop the business of that company; (3) to construct and maintain at Brighton a pier and other works; (4) to borrow money and issue debentures.

By certain agreements, all dated prior to July, 1891, made between the Chain Pier Co. of the one part and the defendant company of the other part, the Chain Pier Co. agreed to sell to the defendant company the pier and property comprised in the undertaking of the Chain Pier Co. for £15,000.

In July, 1891, it had been agreed that the works company should take over these last-mentioned agreements and do the works on behalf of the defendant company, and that the defendant company should from time to time issue to the works company the whole of the authorized share capital of the defendant company—namely, 15,000 shares of £10 each, such shares to be deemed for all purposes as fully paid up; and by an agreement dated the 16th of July, 1891, between the defendant company of the first part, the limited company of the second part, and the works company of the third part, it was agreed that the works company should assign to the limited company all benefit and interest under the above-mentioned agreements between the defendant company and the works company.

By another agreement dated the 16th of July, 1891, between the limited company of the one part and Alfred Woodhouse of the other part, Woodhouse agreed to erect the new pier and buildings fit for use within the time therein mentioned, and in November, 1891, the works were begun and continued until October, 1892.

On the 15th of December, 1891, the defendant company passed a resolution to the effect that 2,500 shares should be allotted as fully paid to the limited company for the sum of £5,000, and on the same day such sum of £5,000 was paid by the limited company to the defendant company, and in due course a certificate for 2,500 shares in the defendant company was handed to the secretary of the limited company.

On the 3rd of May, 1892, the defendant company passed a similar resolution as to a further 2,800 shares in consideration of £5,600, for which a due certificate was subsequently given.

Woodhouse having made default in the proper performance of his contract, the same was determined by the limited company, and in November, 1892, they took possession of the works and continued them until they exhausted all their available funds.

By an order of the 10th of May, 1895, made in a debenture-holders' action against the limited company, a receiver was appointed of the undertaking and property of the limited company, including the shares so issued as above by the defendant company to the limited company, and it was ordered that the property should be sold. In pursuance of such order the receiver agreed to sell to one Howard, amongst other assets of the limited company, 5,299 shares in the defendant company standing in the name of the limited company, and the sanction of the court having been obtained to such agreement, the receiver, at the request of Howard, executed to the plaintiff a proper transfer of the 5,299 shares in the defendant company and the transfer was duly registered in the books of that company. The remaining one share out of the 5,300 shares had previously been transferred by the limited company to one Renald.

The nominal value of the shares transferred to the plaintiff was £52,990, but the defendant company contended that the amount paid on such shares was £37,228 only, being equivalent to about £7 on each £10 share, and this action was commenced for the purpose of having it declared that all the shares issued by the limited company were issued as fully paid up, the important question raised being as to the power of companies incorporated under Acts other than the Companies Acts of 1862 to 1898 to issue shares at a discount.

Farwell, Q.C., and Methold, for the plaintiff.—The question is whether a company formed under private Act into which is incorporated the Companies Clauses Acts can issue fully paid-up shares at a discount. Webb v. Shropshire Railways Co., [1893] 3 Ch. 307, shows that a railway company governed by the Companies Clauses Acts can issue fully paid-up original stock at a discount. There is no authority as to shares. The reasons for the decision in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper, 41 W. R. 99, [1892] A. C. 125, against ordinary joint-stock companies issuing shares at a discount, do not apply to companies governed by the Companies Clauses Acts.

Ingpen, for the defendant company.—There is nothing in any of the Companies Clauses Acts authorizing the issue of shares at less than their nominal amount, and the implication is that they have not this power.

ROMER, J.—The point before me is a short one; it is whether the shares of the defendant company, which were issued at a discount, were lawfully issued.

The point is whether or not any company, with which is incorporated the Companies Clauses Acts, 1845 to 1863, and the amending Acts, issuing its shares, which are governed by those Acts, has power to issue them except on the terms that the full nominal amount of the shares should be paid in full.

Now, there is nothing said in the Companies Clauses Acts directly affecting this point with regard to what I may call the original shares of the company; but there are provisions with regard to new shares, and those provisions with regard to new shares show conclusively that the Legislature contemplated and authorized new shares being issued at a discount. One cannot see any reason for a distinction being drawn between new shares of a company of this class and the original shares. When I look at the provisions of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, with regard to original shares, I find a distinction drawn between shares subscribed for and shares otherwise acquired by shareholders, and it does appear to me that with regard to shares subscribed for the inference from the wording of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, is that these shares must be paid for in full—at least, that is my present opinion, although I have not expressly to decide the point. But the Act does contemplate shares being acquired otherwise than by subscription, and the shares now in question before me were so otherwise acquired. They were not subscribed for, and with regard to shares which are not subscribed for within the meaning of those words as used in the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, I can find no sufficient reason appearing in the Act, and certainly I can find no reason appearing in the special Act before me why I should hold that those shares should not have been allotted in consideration of a less sum than the nominal amount. I can find no provision in the Act, nor do I see why, on principle, I should hold that shares not subscribed for should not be allotted in consideration of a sum less than the nominal amount just as new shares can be, and I so hold.

An arrangement was made between J. and others that a company should be formed to take over and work J.'s business of a maltster, and that J. should sell the business and premises to the company for 6,500 fully paid-up £1 shares. On the formation of the company J. signed the memorandum of association for 6,500 shares. Subsequently a contract was drawn up setting out the terms of his sale to the company, and this was duly filed in accordance with section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. *It was considered and intended that the 6,500 shares for which J. signed the memorandum were those issuable to him under the contract. Motion.

This was an application under section 1 of the Companies Act, 1898, sub-sections 1 and 4.

F. W. Jarvis arranged to sell his business of maltster and corn merchant to a company to be registered under the above name. The consideration for the sale was to be the allotment to him of 6,500 fully paid-up £1 shares.

The company was formed in September, 1897, and F. W. Jarvis signed the memorandum of association for 6,500 shares.

By an agreement dated the 8th day of October, 1897, made between F. W. Jarvis of the one part, and the company of the other part, the said F. W. Jarvis agreed to sell his said business and the freehold buildings on which the same was carried on, and his trade-marks, plant, &c., to the company for £6,500, payable by the allotment to the vendor of 6,500 fully paid-up £1 shares in the company.

This agreement was filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies on the 4th of November, 1897, and the said 6,500 shares were allotted to F. W. Jarvis on the 11th of November, 1897. No other shares were ever applied for by or issued or allotted to him, and it was the intention of all parties, and the evidence showed that all parties interested considered that the 6,500 shares for which Jarvis signed the memorandum were the same as those to be issued to him under the contract, the terms of which had been arranged prior to the formation of the company, and that he never intended to make himself liable for any save those to be issued under the contract. A question having arisen as to whether F. W. Jarvis was not liable in respect of those shares for which he had signed the memorandum, the present application was made on his behalf for an order that a fresh contract might be filed, or, in the alternative, a memorandum specifying that the 6,500 shares for which he signed the memorandum of association were the 6,500 shares issuable to him under the filed contract.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Howard Wright, for F. W. Jarvis, in support of the motion.—There was no contract registered before the issue of the 6,500 shares for which F. W. Jarvis signed the memorandum, as they must be taken to have been issued immediately on the registration of the company (Dalton Time Lock Co. v. Dalton, 66 L. T. Rep. 704, 40 W. R. Dig. 40), therefore one condition of section 1 of the Companies Act has been fulfilled. The word "credited" in that section imports intention, and the evidence shows that the parties clearly intended to treat these shares as paid up. A contract might have been filed at the issue of the shares that they should be paid for otherwise than in cash (Fothergill's case, 21 W. R. 301, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 270), and this is a case where under section 1 of the Act of 1898 this defect should be cured.

Cassel, for the company.

ROMER, J.—I agree this is a case of great hardship, as far as I can see, upon the gentleman who has subscribed to the memorandum of association for this large number of shares, and I only wish I could see my way to help him, but personally it appears to me that the Acts of Parliament bearing on the question before me are too strong to enable me to do what is asked.

In the first place, there was undoubtedly a contract between Mr. Jarvis and the company, under which Mr. Jarvis, as vendor to the company, was to receive 6,500 fully paid-up shares, the consideration being the property he contracted to sell to the company. That contract was duly filed before the issue of the shares. It is a contract which satisfied the provisions of the 25th section of the Act of 1867, and on the face of it there was a proper contract and a sufficient contract filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies before the issue of these shares, and undoubtedly these shares were intended to be the shares referred to in that contract. So far, then, there appears to be no difficulty. There is no liability on those shares, and the object of the present application is not to get rid of liability on those shares. The object of this application is to obtain indirectly a decision of the court on another and entirely different question—namely, whether or not Mr. Jarvis is or is not under some liability in respect of shares by reason of his having signed the memorandum of association for the same number (6,500) of shares.

In my opinion, it was never contemplated by the Legislature that the Act of 1898 should be used for the purpose of indirectly trying to obtain from the court a decision on such a question as that I have indicated. As to the shares in respect of which this application arises there is no liability. There is a sufficient contract filed, and the procedure of the Act is not necessary to protect the allottee of those shares, and I do not think I am bound to say that such a question as I am now asked to decide properly arises on an application of this kind under the Companies Act of 1898.

But I should be sorry to leave the case there, and I will add a few observations with a view of pointing out the difficulty there is in my saying anything which would relieve any liability Mr. Jarvis may be under by having signed the memorandum of association. Supposing I can hold that I could consider this application on the ground that the contract that was filed was not a sufficient contract within section 25 of the Act of 1867, so that I should be able to consider what I may call the merits of the case then comes the question, Can these shares that were issued in pursuance of that written contract that was filed be taken to be the shares for which Mr. Jarvis subscribed the memorandum of association? Directly the memorandum and articles of association were filed, there was at once a binding contract, between Mr. Jarvis and the company, that he should take these 6,500 shares directly from the company, and the shares are, in one sense of the term, to be deemed issued immediately. How did matters stand at that time? There was no other contract in existence between Mr. Jarvis and the company. In the nature of things there could not have been, and there was not. It was contemplated that a contract would be made between him and the company by which he was to sell property to the company, and take fully paid-up shares for the property; but that was a proposed contract which never could become a contract unless it was rectified and approved of by the company and finally entered into. That contract might never be made. There might be no such contract. But the contract created by the signature of the memorandum and the filing of the memorandum arose at once, and had nothing to do, so far as its validity was concerned, with regard to any other contract that might subsequently be entered into between Mr. Jarvis and the company. There was then, of necessity, immediately the memorandum was filed, a contract by Mr. Jarvis to take shares from the company. What was the contract as to payment of those shares? That is settled by section 25 of the Act of 1867. It is to be deemed a contract to pay for the shares in cash, because, as I have pointed out, in this case there could be no compliance with what I may call the saving clause in section 25 for two reasons. There could be, in the first place, no other contract, no prior contract, no co-existing contract, and still less could there have been any such contract filed. It follows, then, that before anything further was done there was a binding contract between Mr. Jarvis and the company to take these 6,500 shares and pay for them in cash.

Now let me see what effect upon that contract the subsequent contract entered into between Mr. Jarvis and the company could have had. They could not have contracted so as to take the case, so to speak, out of section 25. They could not have contracted so as to free Mr. Jarvis from his liability to pay for the memorandum shares in cash, and therefore any attempted contract entered into between Mr. Jarvis and the directors of the company subsequently to the filing of the memorandum could have had no effect upon the binding contract by which Mr. Jarvis had contracted to pay for these 6,500 shares mentioned in the memorandum in cash. Nor, as I have pointed out already, can you, by looking at the memorandum and articles of association, say that the shares for which he subscribed the memorandum are identified with the shares which had been subsequently the subject of a contract between him and the company. It could not be so. He could not have signed the memorandum of association for shares conditional upon a contract being entered into between him and the company for the company to take his property under certain conditions. At least I know of no such case where that has been done, and certainly it was not done in this case, and there is nothing which would enable me to say that the shares for which he subscribed the memorandum must be, or could be taken to be, the shares which were to be the subject of the agreement which it was hoped would be entered into between him and the company.

The result is that I cannot hold that the memorandum of association was one of the contracts under which these shares were issued. If the directors purported to issue the shares under the memorandum, it appears to me they had no power to do it. If a shareholder has once contracted to take shares and pay for them in cash, he can only pay for them in cash or cash equivalent in the strict sense of the term, that is to say, by cash or by set-off—something which would amount to payment on the one hand in cash, and repayment on the other. You cannot satisfy the liability of a shareholder to pay for shares he has taken in cash by an arrangement to pay for them in land or property.

For these reasons it appears to me that if on this application I go into, as I have done, the merits of the case, I do not see my way to comply with the request, and I must therefore refuse the application.

Of course, nothing I have said here, I trust, can be taken to prejudice any question that may hereafter arise as between Mr. Jarvis and the company as to whether under the circumstances he is or is not bound to take other shares under the memorandum of association. That is a question which is not finally before me, and which I cannot pretend to dispose of on this application. There may be some grounds not apparent to me now on which he may escape any such liability. All I do is to refuse to comply with this application under the Act of 1898.

SMITH v. SHOREY. (a.)

Administration—Practice—Creditor of the executors—Executors continuing the business.

Administration of testator's estate ordered in an action by a creditor of the executors who had continued to carry on the testator's business.

John Shorey carried on the business of a timber merchant in London. By his will and codicil he appointed his widow, the defendant Adelaide Shorey, and his son, the defendant J. C. Shorey, his executors, and thereby declared that should his executors deem it advisable to continue to carry on his business it was his wish that his said son should have the management thereof. The testator died in August, 1894.

The executors carried on the business as "J. & A. Shorey" until May, 1895, and in so doing incurred liabilities. On the 29th of May, finding themselves in financial difficulties, they called a meeting of their creditors, and submitted to them a statement of their affairs. A resolution was passed by the creditors that the estate should be realized under the supervision of three persons (one of whom was the defendant Cooke), and that the amount realized should be paid into the bank in the joint names of the defendants Cooke and Hurt. This was done, and about £170 was realized, which was paid into the bank.

The plaintiff was a solicitor who had acted in the above transactions on behalf of the executors, and his unpaid bills of costs, after taxation and allowing for sums received, amounted to about £30.

The plaintiff claimed payment of his said costs, and in default administration of the estate of the testator by the court.

There did not appear to be any creditors of the estate other than those for debts incurred subsequently to the testator's death.

Eve, Q.C., and Eustace Smith, for the plaintiff.—The creditors of the business of J. & A. Shorey have a right to be indemnified out of the whole estate of the testator, Dowse v. Gorton, [1891] A. C. 190, 40 W. R. 17; and they have a right to bring an action for the administration of the estate. It is true that there does not appear to be any reported case of such an order being made, but Kekewich, J., in In re Bach, [1892] W. N. 108, expressed his opinion that the subsequent creditors had a right to such an order. In Owen v. Delamere, 21 W. R. 218, L. R. 15 Eq. 134, there was no insolvency of the executors. The creditors cannot resort directly to the fund as there has been no declaration of trusts, as in the cases of In re Johnson, 29 W. R. 168, 15 Ch. D. 548, and Strickland v. Symons, 32 W. THE QUEEN v. ELLIS. (a.) Criminal law—Obtaining property by false representations—Property obtained in England on false representations made in foreign country—Jurisdiction.

A person made false representations in Glasgow as to his credit and financial position. On the faith of these representations goods were supplied to him on credit at Gateshead, in the county of Durham. He was shortly afterwards made bankrupt. Upon these facts he was tried at Durham for the offences—under the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), ss. 11 (13) and 13 (1)—of having obtained the goods on credit by false representations within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, and of having obtained credit for the goods under false pretences.

Held, that the offences were committed at Gateshead, and that the court had jurisdiction to try the prisoner.

Case stated by Day, J., as follows:

Frederick George William Ellis was charged before me at the Durham Summer Assizes under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 13 (1), that he having been adjudged a bankrupt and within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him did in the county of Durham unlawfully by false representations obtain certain property from Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), of Glasgow, amounting in the whole to £1,726 15s. 10d. on credit and has not paid for the same.

The said Frederick George William Ellis was also charged under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11 (13), that he between the 31st of August, 1897, and the 18th of November, 1897, in the county of Durham, in incurring certain debts or liabilities of various sums amounting in all to the sum of £1,726 15s. 10d. to Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), of Glasgow, did unlawfully obtain credit under certain false pretences—to wit, for that he falsely represented to Mr. John Robert Kay, one of the directors of Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), that he took stock at the end of December, 1896, that such stock amounted to very near £3,500 in value, that his liabilities were £1,400, that he gave no credit, that he had £100 of his own, that he had a large shop which cost him £400 bought through a building society, to be repaid in thirteen years by monthly instalments at, say, £3 14s. per month, that his rent and taxes would come out about £100 per annum including the building society.

Both charges referred to the same goods, and the evidence in respect of both charges was the same.

Thomas Gibson Noble, the representative at Newcastle and Gateshead of Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), of Glasgow, proved that he opened an account with the prisoner, who then carried on business as a draper at Gateshead, in the county of Durham, in July, 1896, and from that date until July, 1897, various orders were booked for the prisoner and executed; that in July, 1897, he began to be afraid to give the prisoner further credit without the instructions of his principals in Glasgow; that he arranged that the prisoner should have an interview with his principals for the purpose of informing them as to his financial position, which interview took place on the 1st of September, 1897, at Glasgow; that no representations of any kind were made to him or in his presence; that after the interview of the 1st of September, 1897, he received instructions from his principals to continue to supply the prisoner, and the prisoner also informed him that the interview had been satisfactory both to his principals and to the prisoner, that in consequence of these instructions and the prisoner's statement he took samples to the prisoner in Gateshead, booked orders there and transmitted most of the orders to Glasgow to be executed, but that some of the orders were executed at Gateshead and the goods delivered there by his porters; that the goods supplied in pursuance of such orders are the subject of the charges against the prisoner.

John Robert Kay, the managing director of Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), of Glasgow, proved that he had an interview with the prisoner in Glasgow on the 1st of September, 1897, that at that interview the prisoner made to him the representations alleged in the charge; that the said interview was the only interview he had with the prisoner, and the only representations made to him were made verbally and at that interview; that in consequence of the representations then made he gave instructions to Mr. Noble to continue to take orders from the prisoner.

Evidence was also given to prove that the said representations were false, and that the prisoner knew that they were false, and that he presented a bankruptcy petition against himself within four months after obtaining the goods, and was adjudged a bankrupt.

There was no evidence to show whether the carriage of the goods sent from Glasgow was paid by Arthur & Co. or by the prisoner.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

At the close of the case for the prosecution, counsel for the defence took the objection that the offence was completed in Glasgow and no part of the offence was committed in the county of Durham and there was no jurisdiction.

The only question for the consideration of the court is whether the prisoner could be indicted and tried for the offences aforesaid or for either of them in the county of Durham.

If he could, the conviction is to stand; if not, the conviction is to be quashed.

Shortt, for the prisoner.—There was no jurisdiction to indict or try this prisoner in Durham; the false representations were made in Glasgow, and the credit was given by the order in Glasgow of the director of Arthur & Co. If the credit was given in Gateshead it was given not in consequence of any representation by the prisoner, but in consequence of the instructions received from the principals on Glasgow; if the credit was obtained on the false representations of the prisoner, it was obtained in Glasgow.

He cited Reg. v. Martin, 15 W. R. 358, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 56; Reg. v. Dawson, 16 Cox C. C. 556, 37 W. R. Dig. 61.

Henry Sutton, for the Crown.—When an offence is begun in one county and completed in another, the venue may be laid in either county: 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12; Reg. v. Leech, 4 W. R. 482, 7 Cox C. C. 100; but it is doubtful whether that Act applies as between Scotch and English counties. [WRIGHT, J.—Even before that Act the same rule, as between two English counties, seems to have been acted on: Rex v. Buttery, cited by Abbott, C.J., in Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, at p. 179.] In Reg. v. Holmes, 32 W. R. 372, 12 Q. B. D. 23, a prisoner had posted in Nottingham to the prosecutor in France a letter containing a false pretence, and he was held triable at Nottingham, where he received the goods. But the actual offence lies in obtaining the property: Reg. v. Jones, 1 Den. C. C. 551; and it is immaterial where the false pretence was made if it was continuing when the property was obtained and was acted on: Reg. v. Martin. Here the property was obtained in Gateshead, and the offence was committed there.

Shortt replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 24.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., concurred in the following judgment of WILLS, J.—The prisoner was indicted at the Durham Summer Assizes, 1898, under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11, sub-section 13, for that he, having been adjudged a bankrupt, and within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, did in the county of Durham unlawfully, by false representations, obtain certain property from Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), of Glasgow, amounting in the whole to £1,726 15s. 10d., on credit, and has not paid for the same, and under section 13, sub-section 1, of the same Act, for that he, between the 31st of August, 1897, and the 18th of November, 1897, in the county of Durham, in incurring certain debts or liabilities of various sums amounting in all to £1,726 15s. 10d., to Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), of Glasgow, did unlawfully obtain credit by certain false pretences, which are set out in the indictment. The evidence touching each charge was the same, and the facts were as follows: The prisoner carried on business at Gateshead, in the county of Durham, as a draper. Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), wholesale drapers, at Glasgow, had a traveller named Noble, who in 1896, at Gateshead, opened an account with the prisoner. In July, 1897, Noble declined to let the prisoner have further goods on credit unless he satisfied the principals at Glasgow as to his financial position. Thereupon on the 1st of September, 1897, the prisoner saw Kay, the managing director of Messrs. Arthur & Co. (Limited), and made to him a number of representations set out in the indictment as to his financial position which were false to the prisoner's knowledge. This interview took place at Glasgow, and there, as both the learned counsel agree, Kay gave instructions to Noble to continue to supply goods on credit to the prisoner. In consequence of these instructions Noble continued to call upon the prisoner at Gateshead, and there booked orders. Some of the goods so ordered were sent from Glasgow, and in respect of these there was no evidence whether the Glasgow house or the prisoner paid the carriage. Some of the orders, however, were executed by Noble himself at Gateshead, and were delivered by his porters to the prisoner there. The proof of bankruptcy and of the necessary dates was complete, and the only question is whether any offence was proved which the assize court sitting in and for the county of Durham had jurisdiction to try. There is no real difference material to the present case between the two counts. One speaks of obtaining property by false representations, and the other of obtaining credit under false representations. In each case the indictment follows the language of the Act of Parliament, but there does not seem to me to be any difference of substance created by the use of the different prepositions. There is no doubt, then, that the false representations were made in Glasgow out of the jurisdiction of the English courts, and that by or under these false representations goods were obtained in the one case and credit was obtained in the other in the county of Durham; and the question is neatly raised whether, when the false representations are made beyond the jurisdiction of the English courts, and the goods are obtained within the jurisdiction of an English court dealing with the charge, that court has jurisdiction to try the case.

There can be no doubt that the making of the false representations is an element in the crime. Without it there would be no crime. And if it is essential that all the elements of the offence should take place within the jurisdiction of the English courts, the conviction could not be sustained.

The question now raised is new. It has not in fact occurred with respect to false representations made outside England, whether abroad or in any parts of the British Islands. In England itself the question of jurisdiction as between two counties, when the false representations were made in one county and the goods obtained in another, has not been capable of being raised since 1827, for by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12, it was provided that where any felony or misdemeanour shall be begun in one county and completed in another, it may be dealt with and tried in any of the said counties in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly committed therein.

Three observations here arise. First, that the particular state of circumstances which gives rise to the present question is not of so frequent occurrence as to make it surprising that the question has not been raised for decision. Secondly, that any authority bearing upon the analogous case of the offence in question being committed by false representations being made in one county, and goods being obtained by and supplied under them in another county, must be looked for before 1827. And thirdly, that it is within the undoubted competency of the British Legislature to enact that the obtaining of goods in England by means of false pretences made whether in or out of England shall be an offence against British law.

In this, as in most other cases, there is room for a good deal of argument on either side of the question, and it would not be uninteresting, certainly, to embark afresh upon some of the investigations which formed the subject of much of the discussion in Rex v. Burdett, 3 B. & Ald. 717, 4 B. & Ald. 95. But if there is distinct authority sufficiently germane to render such a task superfluous, it is, as it seems to me, equally unnecessary and unadvisable to resort to it. In my opinion there is such authority, and I will proceed to state what it is. Some time before the year 1820 one Buttery was indicted and tried in Herefordshire for obtaining goods by false pretences. The false pretences were made in Herefordshire, and the goods supplied in Monmouthshire. The prisoner was convicted and a case reserved, according to the practice of those days, for the consideration of the judges at Serjeants' Inn. The case is not reported, but in Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald., at p. 179, Abbott, C.J., after stating the facts, comments upon it in these terms: "The language of the statute" (30 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 1) "makes the offence to consist in obtaining the money and not in using any false pretence whereby money shall be obtained. The judges thought the indictment was laid in the wrong county. They did not think the party not indictable at all, which they ought to have done if the proposition addressed to us be true." I will state a little later what that proposition was. The Lord Chief Justice continues: "They did not think the party not indictable at all because the pretence which was necessary to constitute the crime was in one county and the receipt in another and there was no entire crime in either."

The argument in Rex v. Burdett to which these observations were addressed by the Lord Chief Justice was that a libel written in one county for publication but published in another county constitutes no offence triable in either because there is in neither any one entire crime.

The majority of the court, consisting of Abbott, C.J., and Holroyd and Best, JJ., held, dissentiente Bayley, J., that the offence was triable in either county.

The case of Rex v. Buttery is cited only in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. It was not exactly in point and all that can be said of it in connection with Rex v. Burdett is that it is cited by Abbott, C.J., without any expression of disapproval.

But in 1825 the case of Pearson v. McGowran was before the same Court of King's Bench. It is reported in 3 B. & C., at p. 700, and it seems not only to adopt and confirm the decison in Rex v. Buttery, but to base it upon a ground which entirely covers the present case.

Pearson v. McGowran was an action for penalties under a statute which enacted that "every person who shall upon any contract take, accept, or receive by way or means of any corrupt bargain above 5 per cent. shall forfeit" a given sum, half of which was to go to the person who should sue for the penalty. The contract was made in Middlesex. The money paid in pursuance of the contract was paid in London. Upon a rule to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff and enter a nonsuit, pursuant to leave reserved, it was agreed for the plaintiff that the offence was a misdemeanour and was committed partly in one county and partly in another, and therefore triable, according to the decision in Rex v. Burdett, in either; the court held the contrary and ordered a nonsuit to be entered. The considered judgment of the court, which at that time consisted of Abbott, C.J., Bayley (the dissenting judge in Rex v. Burdett) and Littledale, JJ., was delivered by Abbott, C.J., who said: "We think the offence consists in the taking and receipt of usurious interest. The corrupt contract is antecedent to and not a part of the taking. The offence therefore was not committed partly in one county and partly in another, although the contract is undoubtedly a material circumstance in the case because it stamps the illegality of the receipt. This resembles Rex v. Buttery, which was an indictment on the statute 30 Geo. 2, c. 24, for obtaining money by false pretences. That statute enacts that all persons who knowingly by false pretence shall obtain from any person money, goods, &c., with intent to cheat and defraud any persons shall be deemed offending against law. The language of the statute makes the offence to consist in obtaining the money, not in using any false pretences whereby money shall be obtained. The indictment was in Herefordshire, the false pretences were in Herefordshire, but the money was obtained in Monmouthshire. The judges thought the indictment was laid in the wrong county. That comes nearer to the present case than any of those cited at the bar and found by us. Upon that authority, therefore, and upon the language of the statute, we are of opinion that the rule for entering a nonsuit must be made absolute."

Mutatis mutandis, every part of the passages cited from each of the judgments is applicable to the present case. The making of the false pretences is antecedent to and not a part of the obtaining the goods. It is a material circumstance, because it stamps the illegality of the obtaining the goods. The gist and kernel of the offence is the obtaining the goods by improper means, not in using the improper means whereby goods were obtained, and there was, therefore, an entire offence within the one county, though the circumstances which stamped it with illegality took place beyond the jurisdiction.

If the principle of the decision in Rex v. Buttery and in Pearson v. McGowran be correct it can make no difference that the material circumstances which stamped an otherwise innocent transaction with the character of a crime took place outside the jurisdiction of the English courts. It was just as much outside the jurisdiction of the court which tried the offence in Rex v. Buttery and Pearson v. McGowran as if it took place in Scotland or abroad. It is, in fact, by these decisions reduced to a mere piece of the evidence necessary to constitute the offence.

There is nothing unreasonable in this view. There is no moral difference between an offence where the representations are made in England and one where they are made in Scotland. There has been no expression of judicial opinion anywhere finding fault with Rex v. Buttery or Pearson v. McGowran. The views expressed are those of a perhaps exceptionally strong court, some members of which certainly were exceptionally familiar with questions of pleading, and it seems to me altogether too late to question the authority. The present legislation is subsequent to it—and it is a sound principle that unless there be some strong countervailing reason fresh legislation is pari materie and using language identical with or undistinguishable from former Acts which have received judicial construction should be construed upon the lines of the former decisions.

It has been urged upon us that the fact that the Act of 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12, contained the provisions which have been set forth by which misdemeanours committed partly in one county and partly in another are triable in either indicates a doubt as to the soundness of the decisions, then recent, of Rex v. Buttery and Pearson v. McGowran. I do not think there is anything in this argument. The provision in question covers a vastly greater area than those two cases. It is contained in a section which deals with both felonies and misdemeanours. The provisions were undoubtedly new as to most felonies, at all events. It was most natural that when such provisions were enacted as to felonies they should be so extended as to place misdemeanours upon the same statutory footing in this respect as felonies. It was further urged for the prisoner that it required a statute (59 & 60 Vict. c. 52) to make the receipt of stolen property with the guilty knowledge that it had been stolen an offence triable in England where the property had been stolen abroad and the receiving had taken place in England. But the cases have no real analogy. The receiver, although guilty by statute of a substantive felony, is in all essential respects an accessory. There can be no receiver unless there has been a thief, and if the larceny which is the starting-point of the crime be not established there is no offence in the receiver. It is therefore essential to show a crime in someone else before you can make any case against the receiver. A crime in English jurisprudence means a crime by English law, under English law, and cognizable by an English court, and if there was no such crime established the receiver could not be convicted. This seems to me to be the true ground upon which it was rightly decided in Reg. v. Debruie, 11 Cox, 207, that a receiver in England could not be convicted where property had been stolen in Guernsey. Byles, J., points out there that transactions which may be larceny by English law may not be so by the law of Guernsey, and it would be strange if (without express legislation) that which might be no offence in the country where it took place should be made a foundation of a crime in England which consists essentially in being an accessory to the principal transaction. This is a good illustration of the inconvenience of holding a receiving to be a crime in England where the principal offence has been committed abroad. In the case now under consideration no question arises as to the commission of any crime in Scotland, nor as to the application of Scotch law to any part of the case. For these reasons I am of opinion that the conviction was good and ought to be affirmed.

HAWKINS, J.—I agree in thinking that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The crime consists in the obtaining of goods by means of a false representation previously made. The goods must no doubt be so obtained within the jurisdiction of the court before which the offender is tried, but I find no warrant for saying that it is essential that the false representation should be also made within that jurisdiction. To simply make a false representation with intent thereafter to defraud is not a legal crime, but if goods are obtained by means of it the so obtaining the goods amounts to an indictable offence wheresoever the false representation itself may have been made.

A false representation made to a London tradesman out of the jurisdiction—say, in Paris, with the object fraudulently to obtain goods from that tradesman in London must, according to every dictate of good sense, be intended by the maker of it to operate on and continue present in the mind of the tradesman until the goods are actually obtained from him, and by his conduct in obtaining the goods he ought in my opinion to be treated as having repeated his representations quite as effectually as if he had again put them in words.

Let me suppose that at the interview in Glasgow the managing director, believing the false representations of the defendant to be true, had said to the defendant, "I am satisfied. I shall be in Gateshead in a day or two, and as you have satisfied me I will let you have the goods you require," and in a day or two both had again met in Gateshead, and then, without another word being spoken, the managing director, acting on the Glasgow conversation, had handed to the defendant, on credit, the goods he required, would it not be revolting to good sense if it could be truly said that the law in this commercial country was such that the defendant could avert the consequences of his crime by alleging that, though he had beyond all question obtained the goods by fraudulently false pretences, he could not be punished because his false pretences were made in Glasgow.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree that this conviction ought to be affirmed. Looking at the two counts of the indictment and the provisions of the Act upon which they are founded, it seems to me that they are at any rate good counts after verdict, even if the false pretences are to be treated as made in Glasgow only; for the particular false pretence upon which the goods or credit were obtained need not be stated, it being sufficient under the statute to aver generally that they were obtained by false pretences. But the evidence here is that the goods were delivered to and obtained by the defendant in Gateshead under a representation made in Glasgow, but continuing in Gateshead at the time when possession of the goods was taken.

I think it better not to determine the larger question of the application of the principle of Rex v. Buttery to the present case. There all the elements were present which were necessary within the principle laid down by Lord Coke to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the common law, and whether the case was to be tried in one county or another, all questions of law which might arise would have to be determined according to the laws of England. Even so, Bayley, J., was not clear upon this point, and it was thought necessary to pass a statute (7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12) to set the question at rest. It is not quite clear to me that the same principle applies if the false pretence is made in a foreign country, and Scotland must be treated as a foreign country for the purposes of this case. In Rex v. Buttery the question was one of "defectus triationis," and the objection was that the jury could not take cognizance of the case if the goods were obtained in another county. Here the question is one of substance. The offence of obtaining goods by false pretences depends upon whether the person charged has obtained by fraud the consent of the owner to a change in the property in the goods; if consent has not been obtained the offence is larceny, if it has been obtained it is a misdemeanour. But where the false pretence has been made in a foreign country the law as to false pretences may not be the same as it is here; it may differ as to what would amount to a consent to the change in the property, as to the persons who may give such consent, as to what would vitiate that consent, and as to what makes the transaction voidable only as altogether void; and such questions might affect the nature of the crime, for it would be a misdemeanour or a felony according to whether there was or was not a consent to the charge in the property in the goods. I am therefore not prepared to deal with the larger question dealt with by my brother Wills, but for the reasons I have given I agree that the conviction was right.

BRUCE, J.—I agree that the conviction should be affirmed. I have only one word to add. The rule of common law restraining jurors from inquiring into facts arising beyond the limits of the county was not at any time so strictly observed in misdemeanours as in felonies. It seems to me that in the case of a misdemeanour the offence can be properly dealt with in the county where the offence is completed, notwithstanding that some act constituting a material circumstance may have happened altogether beyond the jurisdiction.

Motion by the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy to set aside an agreement whereby the bankrupt purported to convey his business and stock-in-trade to a limited company.

The bankrupt Hirth began to trade on his own account in 1896, and an action was speedily brought against him by his former employers to restrain him from making use in his business of information obtained by him while in their service. Judgment was given on the 21st of December, 1897, for an injunction and costs against Hirth.

On the 9th of December, shortly before judgment in the action, Hirth, who was then in debt to the extent of £2,000, registered a company under the name of Hirth & Co. (Limited) with a capital of £3,000 in 3,000 £1 shares. Early in March, 1898, the taxation of the costs of the action was begun, and upon the 7th of March, Hirth executed the agreement now sought to be set aside, whereby he conveyed his business and stock-in-trade to Hirth & Co. (Limited) for the consideration of 2,000 fully paid up £1 shares to be allotted to his nominee. At first meeting of the company, attended by the seven shareholders, who made up the whole of the members, was soon held, and the 2,000 shares were allotted to an uncle of Hirth, who resided abroad. Upon the 29th of April the taxation of the costs in the action against Hirth was completed, and execution was levied for the amount, but no goods were forthcoming which could be seized.

Upon the 27th of May a receiving order was made against Hirth, his liabilities amounting to £2,200 and his assets being nil. On the same day Hirth & Co. (Limited) passed a resolution for a voluntary winding up, and Mr. Percy Mason was appointed liquidator. The books of the company showed that the business was carried on in exactly the same way as it had been before the transfer to the company. Some of the debts incurred before the transfer had been discharged, but fresh liabilities had also been contracted.

The official receiver having been appointed trustee in the bankruptcy of Hirth, now moved to set aside the transfer of Hirth's business and stock-in-trade to the company as fraudulent.

Muir Mackenzie and Eldridge, for the official receiver.—This transfer was void under the statute of Elizabeth (13 Eliz. c. 5) or under section 4, sub-section 1 (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as a fraudulent transfer of the whole of the debtor's property: Ex parte Chaplin, In re Sinclair, 26 Ch. D. 319, 32 W. R. Dig. 10. A similar transfer to a company was set aside by Vaughan Williams, J., in the case of In re Carey, Ex parte Jeffreys, 43 W. R. 605, 44 Ib. 59, [1895] 2 Q. B. 624, but in that case he gave the creditors of the company a prior charge to the creditors in the bankruptcy on the assets of the company, which we contend was wrong.

Reed, Q.C., and Clayton, for the liquidator of the company.—The company is now in liquidation, and it is too late to set aside the agreement under which it took its property. The transaction was not void but only voidable, and it cannot be avoided now that the company is in liquidation. The case of In re Carey, Ex parte Jeffreys is no longer law since the decision of the House of Lords in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (Limited), 45 W. R. 193, [1897] A. C. 22.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

WRIGHT, J.—I am sorry that I have to decide this question without having the real facts as between the company and its creditors fully in evidence, for their position is by no means clear. I am told that there never was an instance of an order of this kind having been granted, except the case of In re Carey, Ex parte Jeffreys. It seems to me that the order in that case was granted on a doctrine which was acted on as law at that time, but which, since the decision of the House of Lords in Salomon's case, is not now law to its full extent. I think, moreover, that the decision in Carey's case does not cover the present case. I am satisfied that there was a real resolution to wind up the company, and I must take it that the company is in liquidation, and, if so, I cannot see how, sitting as the judge in bankruptcy and in virtue of my bankruptcy jurisdiction, I can, after the commencement of the liquidation, by any order avoid the transfer of the property to the company. It seems to me that Mr. Reed's contention that the transfer to the company was voidable and not void is correct, and that the trustee not having elected to avoid the transfer till after the company had gone into liquidation, it is too late then for him to do so, as it would be impossible to put the creditors of the company in the position they were in before the liquidation commenced. What the effect of an order to set aside the transfer to the company such as is now asked for would be I do not exactly know, but Mr. Muir Mackenzie agreed that any order I might make must be made without prejudice to the rights of the creditors of the company, who have become creditors since the 7th of March, 1898, the date of the agreement of transfer. I do not see my way to making the order here asked for, but I expressly guard myself against saying that in no case can such relief be given. In this case it is sufficient for me to say that on the facts before me the difficulties are so great that I cannot find my way out of them.

LOWE v. PEARSON. (a.)

Master and Servant—Employment—"Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

A workman was employed in pottery works to make the clay into balls, and to hand them to a woman who was at work at a machine moulding the clay. The workman had nothing to do with the machine, and was expressly told not to interfere with it. The workman, while the woman was temporarily absent from the machine, attempted to clean it, and his hand was caught in the machinery and injured.

Held, that the accident did not arise "out of and in the course of the employment" within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that, therefore, the employer was not liable to pay compensation.

Appeal by the defendant from the decision of the judge of the Chesterfield County Court upon proceedings taken by the plaintiff the respondent to recover compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant, Pearson, was the owner and occupier of certain pottery works, being a factory within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and the respondent, Lowe, was a boy of the age of fourteen years in the appellant's employment. The respondent was employed in the pottery works to make clay into balls, to put the balls into a mould, and hand the mould to a woman who was at work at a machine moulding the clay into jars and other articles. On the machine were two cones revolving in opposite directions. Express orders were given to the boy not to interfere with the machine; and the evidence showed that if the machine wanted cleaning it was the duty of a particular workman to clean it. Upon the day in question the woman who was working at the machine, being in want of clay, went away to get some, and the respondent, in her absence, attempted to clean the cones, when the fingers of his right hand were caught in the machine, and two of his fingers were injured. Upon a claim by the respondent for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge found as follows: "(1) Course of his employment. I decide, though I find as a fact it was against rules that the plaintiff"—the present respondent—"should clean the cones, and that he attempted to clean them knowing that it was not his duty, yet that the injury was received by an accident arising out of his employment." "(2) Though I find as a fact that he knew it was against orders for him to clean the cones, and that he went about the cleaning in a careless and reckless manner, yet that the plaintiff was attempting to clean the cones with the view of furthering the work, and that his conduct did not, in my opinion, amount to serious and wilful misconduct." He assessed the compensation at 2s. a week from fourteen days after the accident.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Etherington Smith, for the appellant.—The accident did not arise "out of and in the course of the employment" within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent was expressly forbidden to interfere with the machine, and therefore he was acting outside the scope of his employment when he attempted to clean it. To bring a case within the above words, the workman must be engaged in doing that which he was employed to do or something incidental to it. A servant cannot make that a part of his employment which his master has not employed him to do. The question whether the respondent thought that he was furthering his master's work by cleaning the cones is not material upon the point whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. As between master and servant the latter cannot extend the scope of his employment by doing what he thinks will further his master's work. This act of the respondent was as much outside his employment as the act of the respondent in Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., ante p. 146, [1899] 1 Q. B. 141.

They also referred to Engelhart v. Farrant, 45 W. R. 179, [1897] 1 Q. B. 240.

The respondent did not appear.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion this decision cannot be upheld. This boy's hand was injured while he was employed at a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the question we have to determine is whether the injury was caused "by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act. I wish to state at the outset that the present is not a case of a workman doing something in an emergency altogether outside what he is employed to do, and I desire to reserve my opinion upon that case until it arises. The boy here was engaged on manual labour, his duty being to make clay balls and to hand them to the woman at work at the machine. He had nothing to do with the machine. He had been expressly told not to touch it. In spite of those express orders he meddled with the machine. He attempted to clean it, and was injured. It was no part of his duty to clean it. The learned county court judge has found that the boy was not guilty of serious and wilful misconduct, because what he did was with the view of furthering the work. That, however, cannot affect the question whether or not the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. A master may well employ a boy of this age to make balls of clay and hand them to the woman at the machine, whereas it is a very different thing to employ him on that which will bring him into contact with the machine. I base my judgment upon the facts that the boy was only employed to make the clay balls, that he had nothing whatever to do with the machine, that he was expressly ordered not to interfere with it, and that he, knowing of those orders, disobeyed them, and in consequence was injured. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—This is a proceeding by an infant to recover compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the infant is not represented on this appeal. Therefore, in accordance with the traditions of the Court of Chancery that the judge should take care that the interests of the infant are not thereby prejudiced, I have tested as closely as I could the argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant. With all possible care on behalf of the infant, I cannot find that the employer is liable in this case. We know what the infant's duty at the factory was. His duty was simply to make the clay balls and to hand them to the woman who was working the machine, and he was expressly warned not to meddle with the machine—that is to say, he was not to clean the machine. The operation of cleaning the machine was not entrusted to the woman who was working at it, that duty being entrusted to another servant, who from his experience would be more likely to do it safely. For that purpose some knowledge of the machine and of the way in which it should be cleaned was necessary, whereas this lad knew nothing about it, and directly he attempted to clean it he was involved in difficulties. In my opinion the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If we were to hold the employer liable on the facts of this case, we should have to cut out of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act the words "arising out of and in the course of the employment." It is not the meaning of those words that the employer is to be liable upon mere proof of employment and injury to the workman, but the accident which causes the injury must arise out of and in the course of the employment. We must ascertain what the employment was. When that has been ascertained, it clearly excludes the act of the boy in attempting to clean the machine. His employment was to perform a purely unskilled piece of manual labour, and had nothing to do with the machine, and if he chose to meddle with it, and was injured in consequence, the accident could not be said to arise out of and in the course of the employment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment: The object of this appeal is to obtain a declaration that the Halifax Commercial Banking Co. (Limited) have shown a good title to some property sold by them to Mr. Wood, in accordance with particulars and conditions of sale. The contract for sale is dated the 18th of October, 1897, and the time fixed for completion was the 15th of November, 1897. The purchaser was willing to complete, but the vendors could not produce the deeds, they having been unfortunately lost by their solicitors after the contract had been signed. There is no condition providing for the non-production of lost deeds. But the mere fact of their loss does not release the purchaser from the performance of his contract. He can be compelled to complete if he is furnished in proper time with satisfactory secondary evidence of the lost documents. This was decided in Bryant v. Busk and Moulton v. Edmonds. The fourth condition of sale does not place Mr. Wood in a better position in this respect than any other purchaser if the contents of the lost deeds, including their recitals, can be satisfactorily proved. For a long time the purchaser insisted that nothing short of the production of the original deeds would satisfy him, and on the 1st of December, 1897, his solicitors wrote to say that if the deeds were not produced and the title found to be satisfactory, and the matter completed before the end of the year (1897), the contract must be considered at an end. The purchaser, however, did not at the end of the year insist upon having his deposit back. The vendors' solicitors still hoped to find the deeds, and, if they could not, they proposed to supply the purchaser with satisfactory secondary evidence of them. Considerable correspondence took place on this subject. The effect of this correspondence was, in my opinion, to enlarge the time for completion, and to give the vendors still further time from the end of the year 1897 for showing a proper title by producing the deeds. On the 20th of December, 1897, the vendors' solicitors sent some statutory declarations by Fox, Woodhead, and Binns. These declarations referred to and verified a printed abstract of the missing deeds, and the abstract is so full as to show all the recitals. I am satisfied that the abstract is a full and correct copy, except that "whereas" is turned into "reciting," and "duly executed and attested" is all that appears as regards execution by the persons named as parties to the principal deed. These declarations and the abstract did not prove the execution of the deed, and fell short of what the purchaser was entitled to have. On the 5th of February, 1898, the vendors offered an indemnity, which was refused. On the 12th of February, 1898, the vendors offered some further statutory declarations "by the conveying parties to the various deeds to the effect that they signed, sealed, and delivered the documents, and exhibiting true copies which they identify as such." No such declarations, however, were sent to the purchaser, probably because his solicitors wrote on the 22nd of February, 1898, that he would "strenuously resist completion in the absence of the title-deeds, or practically no title at all, and we again assert that secondary evidence, such as you propose to furnish, would not, we are sure, be accepted by a purchaser from our client." There the matter rested until the 18th of March, 1898, when the vendors took out a summons, asking for a declaration "that a good title has been shown in accordance with the particulars and conditions of sale." In support of that summons an affidavit was filed on the 1st of April, 1898, sworn by R. D. Fox. On the 16th of April, 1898, the purchaser issued a summons, asking for a declaration "that the vendors have not made out a title in accordance with the contract," and asking for an order for the return of the deposit. After this many further affidavits were filed, and on the 16th of June, 1898, Stirling, J., made an order on both summonses, declaring that the vendors "have not shown a good title" according to the contract, and ordering the vendors to return the deposit and pay the costs. The secondary evidence of title adduced before Stirling, J., was much more satisfactory than that which the vendors had produced to the purchaser before the vendors issued their summons. But Stirling, J., did not dismiss the vendors' summons on the short ground that they had not shown a good title before its date. He examined the further secondary evidence of title adduced in opposition to the purchaser's summons, and decided against the vendors, even on the additional evidence. This was, in my opinion, too favourable to the vendors. The purchaser had a right to say that, the vendors not having shown a good title within a reasonable time, he (the purchaser) was not bound to wait longer, and was entitled to be discharged from the contract and to have back his deposit. I see nothing in the correspondence or in the conduct of the purchaser to deprive him of that right. In my opinion the evidence adduced by the vendors before the purchaser issued his summons was not such as the purchaser could be compelled to treat as satisfactory. This, in my opinion, disposes of the case in his favour. He cannot be compelled to give further time, as ample time had been given before he took out his summons. The evidence adduced since is, however, still defective as regards the execution of the principal conveyance by one important party—viz., Frances Jane Jarvis. This was frankly admitted by the vendors' counsel. The memorial registered in the Yorkshire Registry, on which the vendors rely for supplying the defect, does not prove the execution of the deed enrolled by all the persons named as parties to it, nor by Frances Jane Jarvis in particular. The appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; and I agree with the Master of the Rolls as to both the grounds he has given. The two authorities cited, Bryant v. Busk and Moulton v. Edmonds, show that the court may force the purchaser to take the title upon secondary evidence proving what were the contents of those deeds, and that the deeds were duly stamped and duly executed. But in my opinion the secondary evidence produced ought to be clear and cogent. Without casting any reflection upon those two authorities, it is quite certain that to some extent the purchaser is put in a worse position than if he had the deeds delivered to him, or had proper covenants or acknowledgments for their production. He is in a worse position, because on a sale he would have to make special conditions to protect himself. Therefore I say, without disputing the authority of those cases, that the secondary evidence ought to be clear and cogent, so that the purchaser may maintain his title against all those who may attack him. In this case it is quite plain that on the 18th of March, 1898, when the vendors took out their summons for a declaration that they had shown a good title, they had not given satisfactory secondary evidence. That was admitted in this court by their counsel. There was some delay before the purchaser took out his summons in the following April, and in June, when the case came before Stirling, J., the evidence was admitted not to be complete. Stirling, J., thought it right to give the vendors some further time to complete their evidence. In that I think Stirling, J., gave a direction too favourable to the vendors, for the time had then arrived for finally closing the matter. The time for completion was the 15th of November, 1897. On the 1st of December, 1897, the purchaser gave a notice to determine the contract; but that notice was plainly waived by the correspondence which ensued. Then the vendors had to produce satisfactory secondary evidence on three points I have mentioned. The deeds were not old deeds—the oldest was dated in 1893; and there ought to have been no difficulty in procuring the required evidence. It appears to me that a case of this sort ought to have been cleared up by proper evidence before the time when the summons came on before Stirling, J.

Passing from that point—though I think that in the circumstances it is fatal to the vendors' case—I find that on the second occasion Stirling, J., held the vendors' evidence to be insufficient. Now, where the learned judge below, after carefully considering the evidence, held it to be insufficient, I should pause before I dissented from his view; the purchaser's contractual right being to have, not only the best evidence available, but cogent evidence. But I pass that by, because I think that the vendors have now failed to show by sufficient evidence the execution of the deed of 1893 by Mrs. Frances Jane Jarvis. That is a point which ought not to be left to inference.

For these reasons I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree in the result, because according to my view this is really a question of what, for shortness, I will call Chancery practice; and, as the other members of the court, who are much more competent to decide such a question than I can possibly be, tell me that in accordance with those rules of practice this is a case in which the vendors have so failed to perform their obligations at the proper time that there ought to be an order against them both on their own originating summons and on that taken out against them by the purchaser, I assent to the judgment. But I think I ought to state why it is that, apart from any question of what the practice may be, I should have hesitated to arrive at this conclusion. As to the law laid down in Bryant v. Busk there is really no doubt. The loss of the deeds does not prevent the vendors from supplying that loss; by giving, first, sufficient evidence of the loss; and then, secondly, sufficient evidence of the execution of those deeds which have been lost. The vendors delivered an abstract, and then the question arose between the vendors and the purchaser as to whether or not the purchaser was still bound to carry out the contract, those deeds having been lost. The purchaser's position was that he was not bound, while the vendors, relying on Bryant v. Busk, said that he was. From the beginning to the end of the correspondence that was the only question that was raised. Of course the duty of the vendor is not merely to deliver an abstract, but he has to verify his abstract. Now, this objection being taken, the vendors did send to the purchaser certain evidence of the loss and execution of these deeds. It now turns out that that evidence, even when supplemented by the affidavits read before Stirling, J., is defective in that the execution by one material party, Frances Jane Jarvis, is not (I agree) sufficiently proved. But that is not the matter which was in dispute between the parties. I take it that the object of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, is to simplify and cheapen procedure. Apart from that Act of Parliament I take it, from the very case of Bryant v. Busk itself, that if there had been an action for specific performance, and the purchaser had set up as a defence that, having regard to the loss of the deeds, he was not bound to complete; if that question had been tried and decided against him in ordinary course there would have been a further inquiry for the very purpose of verifying the vendor's title; and when, as here, the procedure is under the Vendor and Purchaser Act—although no doubt the summons they have taken out is in the most general terms, that it might be decided that they had a good title—it does seem to me, having regard to what I have read and been told as to the practice in vendor and purchaser summonses, that that summons ought not to be heard without any definition of the real question which the parties invite the court to decide. The matter ought not to be brought in a wholesale manner before the judge, but the parties ought somehow or other to define the question which is really to be raised. In respect of this particular abstract, I say again that, as far as I understand, the only question really at issue between these parties when they went before Stirling, J., was the question of the effect of Bryant v. Busk. In those circumstances, apart from any question of the practice, I should have thought that it would have been mere waste of money for the vendors to produce further evidence after the purchaser had in the most decided possible manner said that evidence of the loss and execution of those deeds would be of no use, because he, the purchaser, would not accept it. I think it would have been a right and convenient course, if any question was raised as to the sufficiency of the verification, as to some small part of the title, to give the vendors an opportunity to correct any deficiency which the purchaser alleged in the verification. Here he alleged none whatever. His objection was not to the details of the evidence, but was an objection in principle that he could not be compelled to carry out the purchase, having regard to the loss of the deeds. It is to be remembered here, according to my view, that the vendors cannot be charged with any laches or delay in this matter. Nothing could be done for the completion or carrying out of this contract until this objection in principle to the whole obligation of the purchaser had been determined.

I entirely agree that if at the hearing before Stirling, J., it was the vendors' duty to come prepared with verification of every detail of their title they have failed to do so. I must assume that it is not right they should have any opportunity of correcting this mistake. I concur in the decision with the greatest reluctance, because I think that upon the real question which was raised as to this title the vendors were absolutely and entirely right. In these circumstances I am sorry to have to concur in a judgment which in consequence of this petty defect throws upon the vendors not only the loss of their right to have this contract carried out, but also the costs of these proceedings.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal of the Charity Commissioners from Stirling, J. (reported 46 W. R. 360 [1898] 1 Ch. 391).

The charity was founded by an indenture dated the 1st of July, 1851, whereby Mrs. Mary Ann Jones conveyed to the rector of Winterbourne and other trustees a piece of land and ten cottages then in course of erection to hold upon trust for the benefit of the aged poor of the parish of Winterbourne "who not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause, shall have attended divine service at the church of the parish of their respective residences for the time being every Sunday for the last five years of their respective lives, and have been partakers of the Holy Communion, and lived a godly, righteous, and sober life, to the glory of God's holy Name."

Stirling, J., held that the charity was for members of the Church of England as such, and was therefore an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894.

The Charity Commissioners appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.—Section 75 (2) (e) relates only to charities ejusdem generis with (a) (b) (c) and (d). Therefore no purely eleemosynary charity is within the section at all: Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531 (Lord Macnaghten's speech at p. 583). In Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & Fin. 355, the court held that there was an express requirement that the applicants should be members of a particular sect. The conditions here do not in fact exclude members of other denominations. The Act of 1711 was passed in order to prevent dissenters making themselves eligible for offices by taking the Holy Communion, and is therefore inconsistent with the view that as dissenters they were excluded: see Lecky's History of England, vol. 1, p. 115. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Jenkins v. Cook 24 W. R. 439, 1 P. D. 80, only lays down the conditions on which a clergyman of the Church of England is entitled to reject candidates.]

They referred to Attorney-General v. Calvert, 23 Beav. 218, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 13; Escott v. Mastin, 4 Moo. P. C. 104.

Eady, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the respondents.—In Jenkins v. Cook the question did not arise. The gift is within section 75 (2) (c) by virtue of the proviso at the end of section; (b) says, "for the benefit of any spiritual person or ecclesiastical officer as such"; but in the proviso the words "as such" are omitted. The rule for the construction of charity deeds appears from Shore v. Wilson.

They referred to Taylor v. Timson 20 Q. B. D. 671, 36 W. R. Dig. 73; Selborne's Defence of the Church and Clergy, ch. 9, p. 196; Baker v. Lee, 8 H. L., Cas. 495, 9 W. R. H. L. Dig. 2.

In re ROSS'S CHARITY.

This appeal was then opened.

Mary Ross, by her will made in 1799, charged certain lands with the payment of £3 a year to be paid on the feast day of St. Thomas the Apostle in every year for ever to the churchwardens of the parish of Bishop's Hatfield to be laid out by them in the purchase of flannel petticoats, stockings, or gowns to be given as soon as might be to six old and poor widows of the said parish whom they should judge to be the properest objects to receive the same, with preference to those who, not being disabled by infirmity or sickness, were most constant in their attendance on the public services of the church.

North, J., held that this was not an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of section 75 of the Act, and that new trustees might be appointed under section 14 by the parish council in the place of the churchwardens (see 46 W. R. 27, [1897] 2 Ch. 397).

The churchwardens of the parish of Bishop's Hatfield appealed.

Lord Robert Cecil, for the appellants.—This point has never been before the Court of Appeal, and if the cases are against me they ought to be overruled. Broadly, all charities vested in churchwardens are ecclesiastical charities. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Section 14 amounts to this: you ought to substitute churchwardens for overseers.] Whichever construction is adopted, churchwardens and overseers are dealt with by a side-wind and not directly. I submit that my construction of section 14 is far more consistent with the earlier parts of the Act, and is equally consistent with the construction put upon it by North, J.

He referred to Shore v. Wilson; Attorney-General v. Calvert; and Attorney-General v. Ruper, 2 P. Wms. 125.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondents.—[LINDLEY, M.R.—You need not trouble about Ross's Charity not being an ecclesiastical charity, but we want to hear your construction of section 14.] Sections 5 and 6 deal with overseers and churchwardens in so far as they are by statute or common law corporations. Sub-section 3 has no reference to property vested in churchwardens as such, because they are not a corporation capable of holding, except in the case of church property or an ecclesiastical charity. There is no authority whatever that property, other than ecclesiastical property, can be vested in churchwardens as a corporation. Parish councils, where there are no other trustees but churchwardens, in cases of non-ecclesiastical charities, are entitled to hold. The Act of 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, makes overseers a corporation, and churchwardens are a corporation for the purpose of receiving money or goods for the purposes of the church.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply, in In re Perry Almshouses.—Every one of these qualifications can be fulfilled with perfect good faith and legally by a person not a member of the Church of England, and if there were only one candidate who fulfilled all the conditions, but was not a member of the Church of England, the churchwardens would have no power to refuse him.

Lord Robert Cecil replied as to the construction of section 14 and corporations.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 17.—The following written judgments were delivered:

LINDLEY, M.R.—The questions raised by these appeals are whether the parish councils of the parishes for the poor of which these charities are founded are entitled to appoint new trustees of the charities under section 14 of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73). The questions in both cases resolve themselves into the narrower question whether these charities are ecclesiastical charities within the meaning of section 75 of the same Act. Stirling, J., has held the Perry Almshouses to be an ecclesiastical charity and that the parish council have no power to appoint new trustees of it. North, J., has held Ross's Charity not to be an ecclesiastical charity and that the parish council has power to appoint new trustees of it. Another question arises in Ross's Charity, in which the trustees are the churchwardens. It is contended that even if the charity is not an ecclesiastical charity, section 14 does not apply to it. No such question arises in the Perry Almshouses case, and it will be convenient to deal first with the important question raised in both appeals—viz., whether these charities are charities to which section 14 is made applicable.

Section 14 is one of a group of sections relating to parish meetings and parish councils, and more particularly to their powers and duties. So far as I can discover their powers and duties extend to parochial charities which are not ecclesiastical, but they do not extend to ecclesiastical charities. They are excepted in every case in which general language is used which would include them and place them under the control of the new bodies created by the Act. Section 5, sub-section 2 (c); section 6, sub-section (a) i., (c) iii.; section 14; section 19, sub-section 4, all show that the above observation is well founded. Section 75 does not define or profess to define the meaning of ecclesiastical charity, but says that unless the context otherwise requires, the expression ecclesiastical charity shall include various things, and, inter alia, a charity the endowment of which is held "for the benefit of any particular church or denomination, or of any members thereof as such." The word "church" here clearly does not mean building; it means a religious society of some sort. But to be an ecclesiastical charity its endowment need not be for all the members of a particular church or denomination; it may be for the benefit of some of them only, but then the endowment must be for their benefit as such members. The whole controversy turns on the meaning of these words "as such." They are obviously introduced to prevent the application of the term of ecclesiastical charity to members of a particular church or denomination irrespective of their membership. The words "as such" do not mean "only." Such an interpretation might defeat the object with which the words are introduced. The words "as such" mean as members—i.e, in their character of members. But, although the words "as such" do not mean "only," and a charity only for some members of a particular church or denomination might not be an ecclesiastical charity, yet I cannot myself see how a charity for the benefit of some of the members of a particular church or charity can be said to be for their benefit as such if, upon the true construction of the instrument constituting the charity, non-members of that church or denomination are entitled to the benefit of the charity as well as members. The solution of every case must be found in the true construction of the instrument of endowment, and, although I am not prepared to accede to the broad proposition contended for by Mr. Vaughan Hawkins—viz., that no purely eleemosynary charity can be an ecclesiastical charity—I think it may be safely said that no eleemosynary charity for the benefit of the members of a particular church or denomination is made an ecclesiastical charity by section 75, unless the benefits of the charity are (upon the proper construction of the instrument founding it) confined to the members of that particular church or denomination.

If they are so confined, a further question will still remain, whether the benefit conferred upon them is conferred upon them as such members. Ross's Charity is clearly not so confined. The preference to be given to those old widows who were most constant in their attendance in church falls far short of showing that only members of the Church of England were objects of the founder's bounty. North, J., took this view, and I do not think it necessary to say more than that I entirely agree with him.

The Perry Almshouses case is more difficult. No one can doubt that the founder there intended to benefit poor members of the Church of England. But are non-members excluded? For unless they are, the charity cannot, in my opinion, be brought within the statute's definition of ecclesiastical charity. I have come to the conclusion that her intention to benefit members of the Church of England only, is plain from the terms of her gift. It is very forcibly urged by the appellants that the founder has not, in terms, made such membership a condition for participating in her charity. The appellants contend that such a condition cannot properly be inferred from the terms of her gift. It is urged that it is quite consistent with those terms that she did not intend to do more than require performance of the conditions which she expressly prescribed. The answer to this argument is that, although it may be true that some persons may conscientiously perform those conditions without being members of the Church of England, there is nothing to show that the founder ever thought of them. She specified those conditions as the most obvious means of ascertaining who were such members. She took it for granted that poor persons conducting themselves as she required would be members of the Church of England, and a construction which would let in a succession of hypocrites is, in my opinion, clearly inadmissible. Shore v. Wilson is very important on this point. If the deed is construed as contended for by the appellants, it will be impossible to exclude conforming hypocrites from the benefits of the charity, and this compels me to reject the construction. I feel the force of the observation that, if the founder had been asked whether any further inquiries were to be made to ascertain whether persons conforming with her requirements were really members of the Church of England, she might have said No, and might have been content with the test she imposed. It may be extremely difficult to determine whether a constant worshipper at church, who partakes of the Holy Communion and leads a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's holy Name, is or is not a member of the Church of England. Primâ facie he would be taken to be so, and the founder took the risk of non-members, whether conscientious or unconscientious, benefiting by her charity. But this is very different from saying that non-members are entitled so to benefit, if known to be non-members. I agree that the founder of this charity has so expressed herself as to render it unnecessary for the trustees to do more than ascertain that a person seeking the benefit of the charity has complied with the conditions laid down. But for all that, her desire to confine her charity to members of the Church of England is, in my opinion, clear from the terms of the deed. The conditions imposed by her are imposed as the most obvious tests of membership, and the charity is for the benefit of the members of the Church of England as such. It is impossible on this deed to come to any other conclusion if I am right in the foregoing observations. The argument that because she says the trustees are to be members of the Church of England, and she does not say that the poor are to be so, does not impress me. The conditions she has imposed are imposed to ensure that they shall be such members. Great reliance was placed by the appellants on The Attorney-General v. Calvert. The charity there was a pre-Reformation charity, and the court had to decide how the endowment should be applied under circumstances never contemplated by the founder, but arising out of the change in the national religion effected by the Reformation. The judgment must be read with reference to the case with which the court had to deal. We have no such problem to solve. The case of The Attorney-General v. Calvert does not assist us in construing the deed of endowment before us; nor justify us in holding that mere performance of the conditions contained in it entitles a person not a member of the Church of England to the benefit of the charity founded by that deed. I therefore agree with Stirling, J., in holding the Perry Almshouses to be an ecclesiastical charity.

It only remains to consider the question raised in the Ross Charity case as to the application of section 14, clause 2, to the case of a non-ecclesiastical charity, the endowment of which is vested in churchwardens only. The section is, I think, tolerably plain. It has to be applied to the case of a non-ecclesiastical charity the endowment of which is vested in churchwardens as trustees. The appellants' contention makes it inapplicable to such a case. This cannot be right. Practically the simplest way of dealing with section 14 (2) is to leave the first part, which applies to overseers, to stand as it is; and then to repeal it, making it applicable to churchwardens and confining it to non-ecclesiastical charities. In this way the enactment will be made applicable as well to overseers and churchwardens; and this is what the Legislature obviously intended. Section 19, clause 5, confirms this view. On this point also North J., was quite right. The appeal therefore in Ross's Charity and the appeal in Perry Almshouses will be both dismissed. The costs will be paid as arranged.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the appeal in Ross's Charity, I think that the preference to be given to the old and poor widows who, not being disabled by infirmity or sickness, were most constant in their attendance on the public service of the Church is not sufficient to make this charity an ecclesiastical charity within the Act of 1894. And as to the point raised on the same appeal, which turns principally on section 14, sub-section 2, of that Act, I think that the parish council has power to appoint trustees in the place of churchwardens, who are the only trustees of a non-ecclesiastical charity. On both these points North, J., appears to me to have come to the right conclusion, and I have nothing to add to what has fallen from the Master of the Rolls in his judgment on the subject.

As to the appeal in Perry Almshouses, the question turns upon the true construction of a deed of July, 1851, whereby the charity was founded. Is the charity then constituted an ecclesiastical charity within the Act of 1894? The 75th section does not define an ecclesiastical charity, but contains a statement of what the term includes. Sub-section 2 (2) includes as an ecclesiastical charity a charity the endowment whereof is held "for the benefit of any particular church or denomination, or of any members thereof as such." I hold that this charity is for the benefit of members of the Church of England as such—that is, in their character of members or in virtue of their membership. The language of the deed appears to me to be plain and unmistakable, and not open to any reasonable doubt; and the meaning is that the persons who take the benefit of the charity are to be members of the Church of England, and the charity is intended for them as such members exclusively. The persons to be selected for the almshouses are to be poor men and women of sound mind who have attained the age of sixty years or are incapable of maintaining themselves wholly by manual labour, and also, having been born in the parish, have resided there for the last five years, or, having been born elsewhere, have resided in the parish for the last ten years. Thus far the charity is eleemosynary only. The founder then adds these further essential qualifications. First, attending divine service at the parish church. This attendance is not to be merely occasional or even habitual; it is to be attendance on every Sunday for the last five years, except when prevented by sickness or other urgent cause. Secondly, the candidates must have been partakers of the Holy Communion—that is, in other words, partakers of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the rites of the Church of England as administered in the service of the Holy Communion. The expression "partakers of the Holy Communion" is taken from the rubric at the head of that service in the Prayer-book of the Church of England. Thirdly, they must have led a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's holy Name. This expression, again, is taken from the General Confession at Morning and Evening Prayer of the Prayer-book. These three tests are all practical, and eminently so; indeed, as efficient as any that can be reasonably suggested for ascertaining whether a person is a member of the Church of England. If the question is asked, Is a person who complies with these tests, who attends the parish church service every Sunday for five years, partakes of the Holy Communion, and leads the life described a member of the Church of England? it seems to me that the answer cannot be otherwise than in the affirmative. The third qualification necessarily excludes the argument which was pressed upon us for the appellants of mere conformity. A person who leads such a life must be honest and sincere and truthful as well in act as in words. It is urged as a matter of history that in former times Dissenters have complied with such conditions as these here imposed; but no instance was cited. What Dissenters, and honest Dissenters, may have done in times past when they were placed under civil disabilities by laws now acknowledged to be unjust, and which they felt to be unjust, appears to me to be wholly irrelevant. By reason of the injustice of the law which they denounced they may or may not have considered themselves justified in a mere outward conformity to the test imposed. It was further suggested that in 1851, when the civil disabilities had been removed, an honest Dissenter might conform to the tests prescribed. I am unable to accept this hypothetical suggestion. I think it is inadmissible. Certainly it is far-fetched and unpractical; it ought to have no weight in determining the question before us. What this founder has said by her deed may, I think, be fairly stated thus: "I will not ask these poor and old or infirm persons to make or subscribe any declaration that they are members of the Church of England. To put upon them such an obligation would be futile. They would probably not be able to understand it." (I throw in parenthetically that the learned counsel for the appellants were unable to state with precision what constituted lay membership.) "Their poverty, their age, or infirmity might induce them to say that they were members with a view to obtain admission into my almshouses. I will do better than that. I will have them judged by a long, continuous course of action, by their conduct, and by their lives. If they do such things and are such persons as I require they will necessarily and in a practical manner manifest that they adhere to the Church of England and are members of that Church. It is for them as such that I intend my charity." The above are the main grounds on which my judgment is based.

In regard to the requirement that the almsfolk shall have been partakers of the Holy Communion, it is worthy of mention that the Legislature, by the Corporations Act (11 Chas. 2, st. 2, c. 1, s. 11), made the taking of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the rites of the Church of England the test of membership with that Church which it imposed on officers in municipal corporations. There is a further point on which stress was laid by the appellants' counsel. By the deed the trustees of the charity are to be the rector of the parish for the time being (who is necessarily a member of the Church of England) and certain laymen members of the Church of England. In default of a vacancy in the lay trusteeship being filled up within a limited time the rector has the power of filling up the vacancy. These provisions do not appear to me to displace the reasoning as to the effect of the trusts for the beneficiaries. The trustees would naturally be in a better position of life than the poor old folk who would seek admission into the almshouses, and the founder thought proper to require that the trustees should be members of the Church of England without imposing on them all the strict practical qualifications necessary for the candidates for admission into the almshouses. The power of selecting for the almshouses is thus confided to members of the Church of England. This circumstance as to the trustees' qualification does not impair the conclusion at which I have arrived—indeed, it would seem rather to strengthen than to weaken it. In regard to Attorney-General v. Calvert, I have nothing to add beyond this, that there is nothing in that decision which precludes our construing this particular deed in the manner we have done. There is no rule of construction that stands in our way. Such rules may be and often are useful assistants, but they are not infallible guides.

An argument presented by Mr. Vaughan Hawkins requires notice. He said broadly that no eleemosynary charity can be "an ecclesiastical charity" within the Act of 1894. I do not agree. He attempted to read the words of section 75, sub-section 2 (e), as if "benefit of members of a particular church or denomination as such" meant for the religious benefit or edification of the members as such. In my opinion there is no justification for thus qualifying the meaning of the ordinary word "benefit," which includes temporal as well as spiritual or religious benefit. He referred to a passage in Lord Macnaghten's speech in Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C 531, at p. 583, in which charity in its legal sense was spoken of as comprising four principal divisions—trusts for the relief of property, trusts for the advancement of education, trusts for the advancement of religion, and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under the preceding heads. Lord Macnaghten was not there ranging charities into four distinct classes, each of which was exclusive of the others. It is plain that there may be a charity in the legal sense for purposes which are both eleemosynary and ecclesiastical or religious.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have not the slightest doubt but that the charity in the Perry Almshouses is a charity for the benefit of members of the Church of England as such, and that the intention of the donor was to exclude from the benefit of the charity all who are not members of the Church of England. It follows that even if the words of the 75th section, sub-section 2, clause (e), must be read as meaning a charity for members of a particular church or denomination exclusively, this charity is an ecclesiastical charity.

As to Ross's Charity, I agree in the construction put by North, J., and the other members of the court upon this very difficult section, and I further think that whether members of a particular church or denomination does or does not mean members of such a church exclusively, the preference given in this case to regular attendants at the church does not make the purpose of the charity the benefit of members of the church as such. I agree that the benefit is not limited to religious benefit to the exclusion of mere temporal benefit.

CHETWYND v. ALLEN. (a.)

Mortgage—Loan on faith of promise to transfer mortgage—Misrepresentations to lender—Part payment of mortgage with money lent—Equitable mortgage by deed to lender—Right of lender to charge on other property comprised in first mortgage—Merger.

C., being entitled to two properties—namely, to No. 1 as trustee for his wife, and to No. 2 beneficially, with her consent mortgaged both to T. for £2,000. Afterwards C. asked M. to lend him £1,200 to pay off an existing mortgage on No. 1, and promised M. a transfer of the above mortgage, but did not disclose that No. 1 belonged to Mrs. C. or inform M. of the amount of, or the securities for, the first mortgage. M. advanced the £1,200, and C. applied £1,000 in paying to T. part of the £2,000 due to him. Later C. executed an equitable mortgage on No. 1 to M. to secure the £1,200.

Held, that, when M. advanced the £1,200 and the £1,000 was applied in payment to T., the charge on both the above properties to the extent of the £1,000 paid to T. was kept alive in equity in favour of M., but so as not to prejudice the rights of T. and Mrs. C.

Patten v. Bond, 37 W. R. 373, followed.

Held, also, that M. did not lose the benefit of such charge by taking the equitable mortgage executed by C. on No. 1, the charge thereby given not operating as a release or extinguishment of the prior charge, and there being no reason for presuming merger of the securities.

There is no merger at law, even of a lower in a higher security, if the remedy given by the latter is not co-extensive with that given by the former.

The application of the doctrine of subrogation was argued, but was not decided, and the cases cited on this point are omitted.

ROMER, J.—The point I reserved for consideration is one of some difficulty. Prior to December, 1892, Mr. Chetwynd held a property called The Cedars as trustee for his wife, the plaintiff, and he held a property called the The Riding School in his own right. These properties he had with the consent of his wife mortgaged to Mr. Terrell for £2,000. In November, 1892, Chetwynd came to the defendant Mynors, and without disclosing the fact that The Cedars belonged to Mrs. Chetwynd and that the charge on that property was also a charge on the school, and was for a sum exceeding £1,200, he represented to Mynors that he wanted to borrow from him £1,200 in order to pay off an existing mortgage for that amount on The Cedars, and he expressly stat d that Mynors should have a transfer of the mortgage. As to this statement, which is substantially the only fact bearing on the point before me not admitted, I refer to the evidence of Mynors, supported as it is by the evidence of Mr. Pitt, his solicitor, both good witnesses, whose statements I have no hesitation in accepting. Chetwynd further represented that he expected to repay the amount shortly out of a larger sum which he hoped to raise later on by a mortgage of The Cedars and other property. On the faith and footing of these representations Mynors advanced the £1,200. Chetwynd applied £1,000, part of this £1,200, in paying to Terrell part of his principal sum of £2,000. A correspondence then ensued, and by a letter of the 16th of January, 1893, Chetwynd informed Mynors for the first time that the £1,200 did not entirely pay off Terrell's charge, and thereupon on the same day Chetwynd executed a mortgage on The Cedars to Mynors to secure the £1,200 and other sums, the mortgage reciting, as the fact was, that the £1,200 had recently been advanced to enable Chetwynd to pay off a then existing mortgage. As Mynors did not then know that The Cedars belonged to Mrs. Chetwynd, the mortgage on the face of it, as might be expected, said nothing about the fact of the money having also been advanced on the promise by Chetwynd that Mynors should have a transfer of the mortgage to be paid off with the £1,200.

On these points I have to consider what Mynors' rights are. Now, in my opinion, when Mynors advanced the £1,200 on the representations and promise above mentioned, and the £1,000 was applied in part payment to Terrell, the charge on The Cedars and school to the extent of the £1,000 was kept alive in equity in favour of Mynors so far as that could be done without prejudicing Terrell or the plaintiff. So far as Chetwynd was concerned, he could not complain that the charge was kept alive also on the school, seeing that it was by his fraud that the true facts as to Terrell's charge were kept hidden from Mynors. As regards Terrell, he clearly was not prejudiced, for the balance of his mortgage debt had priority over Mynors' charge; and as regards the plaintiff, she was not prejudiced, so long as no extra costs were thrown on The Cedars by reason of the original mortgage debt of £2,000 being divided as between Terrell and Mynors (and this I can provide for) and provided that as between the school and The Cedars the former remained primarily liable for the debt as between her and her husband. This primary liability clearly became in no way affected merely because the £1,000 debt and the securities for the same became the property of Mynors and not of Terrell. Of course, by subsequent events, the school might have been so dealt with to the prejudice of the plaintiff as to prevent Mynors from asserting his equitable right to the benefit of the £1,000 debt and securities for the same. But, fortunately for him, when the plaintiff came to assert her rights, Mynors owned the school, and it is still available to the plaintiff as the primary security for the £2,000 charged with her assent, and Mynors acknowledges the primary liability of the school. The case, so far, is not without authority to support the view I have taken: see Patten v. Bond, 37 W. R. 373, which was decided by Kay, J., on three separate grounds, and one of those grounds was based on the principle which I have given effect to in this case.

The next question is whether Mynors lost the benefit of his equitable security arising under the circumstances above mentioned by taking the mortgage of the 16th of January, 1893. I cannot see why I should hold that he did. That mortgage was not a legal mortgage, so that there was no merger of a lower security in a higher. Of course if the mortgage had been a legal one Mynors would have held free from the plaintiff's equity, seeing that he would have acquired the legal estate without notice of the plaintiff's rights. The existence of the equitable charge of the 16th of January, 1893, for the £1,200 is quite compatible with the co-existence of the equitable charge for the £1,000. The charge of the 16th of January, 1893, did not operate as a release or extinguishment of the prior charge. The recital in the charge of the 16th of January, 1893, as to how the £1,200 came to be advanced is not antagonistic to the fact that the advance was also on terms that Mynors should have the benefit of the prior charge. And certainly Mynors cannot be held to have lost the benefit of his prior charge because by reason of the fraud of Chetwynd he may have been ignorant of his exact rights or of the necessity of preserving them. Nor can I see any reason for presuming merger of the securities. The debts secured were not identical, the debt first secured being £2,000 and that secondly secured £1,200, and the securities were not identical, the first security being on The Cedars and the school, and the second security being on The Cedars alone. The courts do not hold merger to take place under such circumstances (see, for example, cases at law: Norfolk Railway Co. v. M'Namara, 3 Ex. 628, and Holmes v. Bell, 3 Man. & G. 213); and there is no merger at law even of a lower in a higher security if the remedy given by the latter is not co-extensive with that given by the former (see Bell v. Banks, 3 Man. & G. 258); and in the case before me there is another ground on which no merger should be held to take place—namely, that the second charge was ineffectual, owing to its not being binding on the plaintiff, the true owner of the property, and a good prior security will not be held to merge in a later inoperative one.

I therefore hold and declare that Mynors is entitled as against the plaintiff to the extent of £1,000 principal and interest to a charge upon The Cedars, but so that the school is to be the primary security, and so that no mortgagee's costs be unduly thrown on The Cedars by reason of the original mortgage debt of £2,000 given to Terrell having become divided between him and Mynors. I should add that, though in the hands of Terrell the £1,000 bore interest at a higher rate, yet in the hands of Mynors I think it ought only to bear interest at the rate he agreed to charge—namely, 5 per cent. The above decision renders it unnecessary for me to consider whether Mynors could have been held entitled as above on other grounds, such as that based on the principle of subrogation or on the general doctrine that the plaintiff coming to the court for equitable relief should be put on terms.

JOHNS v. WARE. (a.)

Bill of sale—Mortgage—Trade fixtures—Freehold land—Power to sell trade fixtures separately from land—Bills of Sale Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36).

A mortgage of land, whether by demise or by conveyance of the freehold, if it contain a power to the mortgagee to sell trade fixtures separately from the land, is a bill of sale as to those fixtures.

The principle was established by Ex parte Daglish, In re Wilde, 21 W. R. 893, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1072, and Ex parte Barclay, In re Joyce, 22 W. R. 608, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 576, and is not limited to mortgages by demise.

Motion.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 25th of March, 1869, and made between Jas. Harper and Thos. Taylor of the first part, Chas. Spackman, Thos. T. Spackman, Geo. Spackman, Julius Spackman, and Hy. Spackman of the second part, and the said Geo. Spackman and Hy. Spackman, hereafter called the mortgagees, of the third part, the parties of the first part, at the request of the said Chas. Spackman and Thos. T. Spackman and Julius Spackman, granted to the mortgagees and their heirs certain freehold lands, tenements, and premises at Bradford-on-Avon, in the county of Wilts, together with the water right to the said premises belonging, together with the steam and other engines, boilers, mill wheels, driving gear, mill gear, and millwright work machinery, appliances, fixtures, and chattels of every description affixed or annexed to or connected with the manufactory, messuages, and hereditaments therein described, or which at any time or times thereafter during the continuance of the said security should be affixed or annexed to or connected with the same premises by the said parties of the first part, or either of them or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, subject to redemption as therein mentioned. And the said indenture contained a usual power of sale of the said premises in case of default in payment of principal or any interest, and also an express power to sell all or any part of the steam and other engines, boilers, mill wheels, driving gear, mill gear, and millwright work machinery, appliances, fixtures, or chattels comprised therein separately from the freehold. And by an indenture dated the 17th of November, 1883, and made between the mortgagees of the first part, the said Chas. Spackman, Thos. T. Spackman, and Julius Spackman of the second part, George Ward and the said Thos. Taylor of the third part, and the plaintiff of the fourth part, the mortgagees by direction of the parties of the second part assigned the moneys secured by the said mortgage, and the benefit of all securities for the same to the plaintiff. And the mortagees also at the request of the like parties by direction of the parties of the third part conveyed and released, and the parties of the second part by the like direction each released, and the parties of the third part each confirmed to the plaintiff the premises aforesaid, subject to redemption as therein mentioned, whereby a new equity of redemption of the premises was created. And the said indenture contained an attornment and other clauses and covenants.

In the year 1897 the owner of the premises subject to the said mortgage became involved in financial difficulties, and executed a creditors' deed, of which deed the defendant was the trustee.

The defendant, as such trustee, had advertised for sale the whole of the fixed and moveable woollen cloth machinery, and effects, the fixed portion of which was claimed by the plaintiff as part of his mortgage security.

This was a motion to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from removing or disturbing any machinery or fixtures affixed to the said land and premises at Bradford-on-Avon, and from selling or disposing of any machinery or fixtures removed from the said land and premises by him.

Neville, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the plaintiff.—The Bills of Sale Act, 1854, was the governing statute at the time of the mortgage, and there was no need for the mortgagee to register thereunder. Ex parte Barclay, In re Joyce, 22 W. R. 608, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 576, and Ex parte Daglish, In re Wilde, 21 W. R. 893, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1072, turned on the right of a lessee to sever trade machinery put in by him. Mather v. Fraser, 4 W. R. 387, 2 K. & J. 536, shows that a mortgage of trade fixtures together with the freehold is not a bill of sale, and therefore does not require to be registered. This mortgage, therefore, is not a bill of sale. There is no decision that a conveyance which would be sufficient independent of any power is invalidated as to trade fixtures in the absence of registration.

Farwell, Q.C., and A. E. Russell, for the defendant.—The rule in Ex parte Barclay is of general application, as appears from In re Yates, Batcheldor v. Yates, 36 W. R. 563, 38 Ch. D. 112, and there is no distinction for this purpose between freehold and leasehold. The terms of the mortgage show that the mortgagee did not rely on the trade fixtures passing as part of the freehold. The power to sell the trade machinery as part of the land makes the mortgage a bill of sale; that it is not an invalid power is shown by In re Yates, where the question turned on the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. Therefore unless the deed is registered it is void as to the machinery in a case like this. The trade machinery here is consequently the property of the mortgagor's trustee, and he can dispose of it as he pleases: Small v. National Provincial Bank of England, 42 W. R. 378, [1894] 1 Ch. 686.

Neville replied.

ROMER, J.—I do not see my way to granting an injunction. Since Ex parte Daglish and Ex parte Barclay it has been settled law that a mortgage of land containing a power to the mortgagee to sell trade fixtures separately from the land is a bill of sale as to those fixtures. It was said that those cases turned on the mortgage being by demise, but, in my opinion, the decisions were not limited to mortgages by demise, and when the reasons for them are looked at ought not to be so limited. The Bills of Sale Act, 1854, says in section 7 that the expression "bill of sale" shall include licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt, and then it says that the expression "personal chattels" shall include fixtures, and you come at once under the Act when you are given power to seize fixtures. In my opinion, if you once gather from the deed that there is a special mortgage of fixtures the Act of 1854 applies. At any rate I am bound by In re Yates, and the same view as I take was taken by the Court of Appeal there. It was argued that the rights of a mortgagee of freehold were not interfered with, trade fixtures being part of the freehold, but after Ex parte Daglish and Small's case it is too late to reopen that question. A mortgage of land and chattels, where the chattels are mortgaged qua chattels, is a bill of sale, and, unless it is registered, the mortgagee cannot assert his rights over the chattels.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Lawrance, JJ.) Nov. 11, 29.

HOLIDAY v. NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. (LIMITED).(a.)

Negligence—Company—Independent contractor—Master and servant—Work to be done at a price to the satisfaction of company's foreman—Accident caused to stranger by negligence of contractor's workman—Work to be done not of a character hazardous to public—"Casual, collateral, or incidental negligence"—Liability of company.

Where a company contracts with an independent contractor that certain work which the company is lawfully authorized to do in a public street shall be done by him to the satisfaction of their foreman, the company is not liable for a casual negligent act of such contractor or his servant in the performance of the work, causing injury to a third party.

Semble, where, however, the work to be done by such contractor is from its character necessarily attended with risk to the public, unless special precautions are taken to insure their safety, the company cannot relieve itself of the responsibility of taking such precautions by employing an independent contractor.

This was an appeal by the defendant company from a decision of his Honour G. Pitt Lewis, Esq., Q.C., sitting as deputy-judge at the City of London Court, who had entered judgment for the plaintiff with £25, the agreed amount of the damages claimed in an action for personal injury based on the admitted negligence of a person alleged by the plaintiff to be a servant of the company.

The question for the decision of the court was (1) whether the workman, by whose negligent act the mischief was caused, was a servant of the company or an independent contractor; and (2) if he were found not to be a servant of the company, then whether the company were nevertheless to be held liable because they had contracted with him to do work for them in the performance of which a third party was injured.

The facts and the argument sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Mattinson, Q.C., and H. H. Lawless, for the appellants, the defendant company, submitted that the workman was an independent contractor, and the nature of the work which he contracted to do, not being of a hazardous character to the public, and the accident being due solely to the workman's folly, the company were not liable.

Lincoln Reed, for the plaintiff.—Every element of service was to be found in the contract under which the workman agreed to do the work for the company, except that he was to be paid so much for the job and not by the hour. That fact alone would not rebut the allegation that he was a servant of the company and render him an independent contractor for whose negligence the company was not liable. The company in either case had no power to shift the obligation they were under to see that the public were not endangered by the way the work was performed, and, therefore, whether the workman was their servant or not, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

Cur. adv. vult.

WILLS, J.—This is an appeal from the learned deputy-judge of the City of London Court, who tried the case without a jury, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for an agreed sum of £25 under the following circumstances: The defendants were laying down some telephone wires at the Pavement, Clapham Common. They had broken up the footway of the street, and for the purpose of this case it was admitted that they had obtained the requisite consent of the vestry to do so, and were acting lawfully in so doing. They had laid down a number of tubes, into which were inserted bundles of telephone wires. The tubes, which were socketed each into the next, were then joined up to one another, and the joints made tight by rings of lead and soldered. The lead or soldering material was melted in an iron pot, which, with the fire underneath it, were on the footpath, and the soldering material was ladled out of this pot and run into the joints. The joints were below the surface of the ground, and it was necessary to get a flare from a benzoline lamp. To get the vapour necessary to give the flare, heat must be applied to the lamp, and as heated benzoline vapour is highly elastic, and may be explosive if unduly confined, the lamp was furnished with a safety valve. The lamp that caused the accident was out of order, and the safety valve would not work, and it was conceded by the defendants that the workman ought to have known this, and that it was an act of negligence on his part to use it in its then condition and as he did. Wanting to heat it quickly, he dropped it into the molten metal, when it exploded, and injured the plaintiff, who was passing by. The general rule of the company was for themselves to dig the trench, lay the pipes, and fill in, except at the places where the joints were, these places being necessarily left open till the joints had been completed. To make the joints good the company usually employed a plumber, who was paid so much for each joint. In this case they sent to a man named George Highmore, who was a working master plumber, to do the requisite plumbing work, and he undertook to do so, and wrote to the defendants' manager on the 5th of December, 1896, as follows: "Dear Sir,—Re Lead cable joining. I beg to inform you that your price of 12s. per connection, bends included, has been accepted for the connecting with wiped joints, and seam the above cable to the satisfaction of the company's representative."

The only other evidence as to the position of Highmore was that it appeared that he had at least two men in his employ, and that at the time of the accident he had "got employment" at some gasworks and had said to his brother "You can take this job off me."

The course of business was for the defendants to send to George Highmore when they wanted connections made, and he came or sent a man, a second generally accompanying, and did the work personally as soon as he could, but there was no agreement for him to come at any specified time, and on the occasion in question Alfred Highmore came to do the work and came alone.

It was argued for the plaintiff that George Highmore was in the service of the defendants and that the defendants were liable for the negligence of the person who did the work under him or as his representative. We do not propose to discuss the question whether it makes any difference that Alfred Highmore did the work, and not George, and assume for the present purpose that the defendants' liability is the same as if George Highmore had done the work instead of his brother, but we think there was no evidence at all of the relation of master and servant between the defendants and George Highmore, and therefore none between the defendants and Alfred Highmore. They were under no obligation to find work for George Highmore, or to give him any particular job. All that they engaged was that, if they sent for him, and he did the soldering to their satisfaction, they would pay him so much per joint made. There is no evidence that they exercised any control at all over the manner in which he should set about or carry out the work, or interfered in any way whatever with what he chose to do. When the joint was being made the foreman was away, and only a labourer was left to fill in the hole when the work was done. The condition that it should be done to the satisfaction of the foreman stands upon precisely the same footing as the common condition in almost every building or engineering contract, that the work shall be done to the satisfaction of the persons for whom it is to be done, or his representative, and of course, if the work was badly done, he would order it to be done again.

The position of George Highmore appears to have been the very common one of a small master plumber, often, no doubt, working with his own hands, and making his own contracts when he could get them for repairs and the like, and he was no more the servant of the defendants than the gasfitter who is sent for to stop a leak of gas in a private house.

It was next argued that Highmore, though not actually a servant of the defendants, was so far under the control of their foreman that they must be liable for the consequences of the accident. This, however, seems to be an entire misconception of the evidence, as in no single particular was either of the Highmores ever interfered with or prevented from acting entirely upon his own initiative. It is true enough that if, although in no proper sense the servant of the defendants, Alfred Highmore had been actually directed by the foreman how to do the work, and required to do it in a particular fashion, and had submitted to and acquiesced in such dictation, there might have been evidence from which a liability on the part of the defendants might have been inferred on the ground that, though in fact the servant of another or not their servant, he had been treated as and acted as if he were the servant of the defendants. But in this case the evidence not only does not support, but negatives such a state of things. The learned deputy-judge said that the defendants "practically supervised" Highmore's work; that "they said at the beginning when and where the work was to be done, and they regulated the whole details. In consequence they practically supervised it." He went on to say that George Highmore "had not freedom of action to come and go when he pleased." We think there was no evidence to support this statement. There was nothing in his agreement to make joints at 12s. a joint to bind him to any time or to put him under any obligation beyond that of doing the work within a reasonable time after notice that it was ready for him. The judgment goes on to say that "in substance the defendants retained control of the works," and therefore they were liable. The phrase is too vague to be of much service—but it is incorrect so far as the mode of doing Highmore's work, which is the important matter for the present purpose, is concerned.

There remains but one other question. There are many cases in which a person who employs another to do work for him is not exempted from liability for accidents arising out of such work because he has employed an independent person and had not retained control over processes or details, nor even interfered in any way with the work at any stage. If a person orders a thing to be done which when done or as done is an interference with the safety or rights of another who, at the time he is injured, is in the exercise of his lawful rights, it is no answer to say that the person for whom the offending thing has been done has done it by virtue of a contract with someone independent of his interference or control—the "independent contractor" of the text-books. For example, a man has a hole dug for him into which a person lawfully passing near or over the spot falls without fault of his own and is injured. In a case of this sort the person ordering the work to be done is liable. He has interfered with the status quo, having no right as against his neighbour to do so, and his neighbour has suffered injury in consequence. So if a man puts up a sign projecting over a highway and it falls by reason of imperfect construction and someone is injured. The person to whom the thing which does the mischief belongs, and who has caused it to be put or who has maintained it, when it does the mischief is liable, no matter whom he employed to do it. The principle is this, that the person for whom the work has been done has failed to see that something has been done which it was his duty to do, either by himself or by someone else for him. The man who disturbs or who fails to create a state of things which other people have a legal right to expect at his hands is liable for such disturbance or failure. The man who maintains an insecure weight hanging over the heads of passers-by, and fails to take care that it shall not expose them to danger, does so at his peril if an accident happens. This is what Lindley, L.J., has termed "casual or collateral" negligence, and, as he has pointed out, the difficulty lies rather in the application than in the enunciation of the principle: Hardaker v. Idle District Council, 44 W. R. 323, [1896] 1 Q. B., 335 at pp. 340, 341. In the present case there seems to us to be little difficulty. The act of Alfred Highmore in carelessly plunging into molten metal a lamp containing benzoline, and with the safety valve out of order, is about as typical an instance of negligence merely casual, collateral, or accidental as can well be conceived. It is certainly not less so than the dropping of a brick by a workman employed in building a bridge in Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 4 Exch. 244.

We were much pressed with a decision of Bruce, J., in Penny v. Wimbledon Urban District Council, [1898] 2 Q. B. 212, 46 W. R. Dig. 138, in which he held that an urban council which had employed a contractor to do work in a street was liable for the negligence of the contractor who had left a heap of excavated soil on the highway unlighted and unprotected over which the plaintiff stumbled in the dark and was hurt. The ground of the judgment so far as this question is concerned was that there was necessarily danger to the public in the work done unless it were lighted; that the defendants must have known that they were ordering to be done what must be dangerous in itself and unless necessary precautions were taken, and that they were therefore bound to see that precautions were taken. Nothing less like the present case could well be imagined. No human being could anticipate such a piece of folly as that committed by Highmore, and if common care had been used there was no danger to anyone in the work ordered by the defendants to be done, nor anything calling for precautions to prevent the molten lead from flying about. In the ordinary course of events there was nothing to make the lead splash about or to constitute any source of danger to the public.

For these reasons we are unable to agree with the learned deputy-judge, and we must allow the appeal, and order judgment, with costs, to be entered for the defendants in the court below. The plaintiff must also pay the costs of this appeal.

Leave to appeal refused.

THE QUEEN v. NORTH RIDING OF YORKSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL.
Ex parte THE NORTH-EASTERN SEA FISHERIES DISTRICT COMMITTEE. (a.)

Fishery—Fisheries Committee—Purchase of vessel for use of fishery officer—Expenditure—Power to impose restrictions and conditions—Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 54), s. 6.

Where a sea fisheries district has been created by an order of the Board of Trade under the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888, and a joint committee has been constituted consisting of the representatives of several county councils and borough councils as well as other bodies, any one of the paying councils is not exempt from contributing to the expenses incurred by the committee in the purchase of a vessel for the use of their fishery officer unless the restrictions and conditions as to expenditure referred to in section 6 of the said Act are made, if not at the time of the original constitution of the committee, at least before any appointment by the committee of its fishery officer; and such restrictions and conditions cannot be imposed by one only of the contributing bodies, but must be agreed to by all.

Rule for a mandamus.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained for a mandamus directed to the County Council of the North Riding of Yorkshire commanding them to pay to the Fisheries Committee of the North-Eastern Fisheries District the sum of £572, being the proportion claimed as payable by them for the purpose of providing a vessel for the use of the fishery officer and for the cost of one year's working and maintaining of such vessel.

On the 9th of July, 1890, the Board of Trade, acting under the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 54), which enables them so to do, made an order creating the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District.

By this order it was provided that a local fisheries committee should be constituted for the regulation of the sea fisheries carried on within the said district. Such committee was to be a joint committee of the County Councils of Durham, of the North Riding of Yorkshire, of the East Riding of Yorkshire, and of the parts of Lindsey in Lincolnshire, and of several specified borough councils, and was to consist of forty members, twenty of them being appointed in certain proportions by the various county councils and borough councils, and twenty members representing the different fishing interests of the district appointed by the boards of salmon conservators and by the Board of Trade. These latter were to be appointed in each year before the 9th day of November. The former twenty were to be appointed by the councils in each year at the usual quarterly meeting of the said councils respectively held in the month of November. All members were to retire, and the new members were to come into office in each year on the 9th day of November.

The retiring members were to be eligible for reappointment.

It was provided that the North Riding was to be represented by four members.

The expenses of the committee were to be chargeable in certain specified proportions. It was provided that any council might make a regulation requiring the committee to submit to such councils once in each year an estimate of expenses proposed to be incurred by them under the Act.

Section 6 of the Act 51 & 52 Vict. c. 54, provides as follows: "Subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure made by the council or councils by whom a local fisheries committee is appointed, the committee may appoint such fishery officers as they deem expedient for the purpose of enforcing the observance within their district of bye-laws made by the committee."

In 1895 a fishery officer was appointed at a salary of £150 per annum, and his expenses and sums for travelling, and also the expenses incurred for the hire of vessels necessary to enable him to perform his duties were paid without exception. At the date of such appointment no restrictions or conditions in relation to expenditure had been made by the county or borough councils. On the 18th of January, 1898, it was resolved by the fisheries committee, affirming a resolution of a sub-committee, that a vessel should be purchased for the use of the fishery officer, and that precepts should issue for the payment of £2,860 by the contributory authorities. The precept was brought to the notice of the North Riding County Council at their meeting on the 27th of January, 1898, and at a meeting held on the 16th of March the county council instructed their representatives on the fisheries committee to oppose the purchase of the vessel. The county council on the 11th of May, 1898, refused to pay the £572, their proportion of the £2,860, and their resolution to that effect contained a paragraph that the expenditure for which they should be liable should not exceed £150 in any one year. The mandamus was sought to compel the payment of the full amount.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (G. A. R. Fitzgerald with him), appeared to show cause against the rule.—The fisheries committee were not warranted in issuing their precept for such an amount, as the county council for the North Riding had not been consulted as to the purchase of a vessel. This was not an expenditure of the ordinary annual character, but was expenditure in the nature of capital. Section 6 of the Act does not contemplate that a financial responsibility of this sort can be thrown by the joint committee upon the individual bodies who are representative of the paying authorities. The restrictions or conditions mentioned in section 6 may be imposed by each of such authorities, and it is not necessary that they should be imposed when the fishery officer is first appointed or before the issue of the precept. The case of Reg. v. Mayor of Plymouth, 44 W. R. 620, [1896] 1 Q. B. 158, is not an authority to that effect. In the present case the objection has been raised within the proper time.

Asquith, Q.C. (G. Blaiklock with him), in support of the rule.—The claim put forward by the county council is altogether unmaintainable. The steps taken by the joint committee are clearly not liable to veto by the constituent bodies. The question here is confined to the true construction of section 6 of the Fisheries Act. The power to impose restrictions or conditions, therein referred to, is not a power that can be exercised by any one of the councils alone; if that were so there would be no uniformity of action. Whatever power is given by that section is given to the councils as a whole body. Further, the word "expenditure" in that section must be read as relating to what follows—namely, the appointment of a fishery officer, but the expenditure here objected to does not relate to such an appointment. We are here dealing with the expenditure to be incurred in the proposed purchase and equipment of a vessel. Further, section 6 refers to restrictions and conditions laid down at the time the original fishery committee is constituted, or at anyrate before the precept is made and issued. So far as the actual decision in the case of Reg. v. Mayor of Plymouth goes it is an authority in support of this contention.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 7.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This case comes before us upon the argument of a rule which has been granted by this court, calling upon the county council of the administrative county of the North Riding of Yorkshire to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to pay to the treasurer of the local fisheries committee for the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District the sum of £572, being the proportion claimed as payable by that administrative county council in accordance with Part III. of the Order for the creation of the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District, of a sum of £2,860, being the amount required by the committee for the purpose of providing a vessel for the use of their fishery officer, and for the cost of one year's working and maintaining of such vessel, demanded by the committee in pursuance of the precept of the 22nd of January, 1898. The decision of the question of whether the mandamus ought to go depends upon the proper construction of the Order of the Board of Trade creating the sea fisheries committee in question, and the provisions of the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888, under which that sea fisheries committee was founded.

I think it will be convenient first to call attention in general terms to the provisions of the Act, and I do so for the reason that so far as I am aware this is only the second case in which questions of the nature which I have now to consider have come up for determination in the courts. That Act is 51 & 52 Vict. c. 54, section 1 of which provides that "the Board of Trade may from time to time, on the application of a county council or borough council, by order, create a sea fisheries district comprising any part of the sea within which Her Majesty's subjects have by international law the exclusive right of fishing, either with or without any part of the adjoining coast of England and Wales," and by that order the limits of the district and the area chargeable for expense are defined. It is also "to provide for the constitution of a local fisheries committee for the regulation of the sea fisheries carried on within the district," and it further provides that the Board of Trade may from time to time on the like application vary the order so made, as by uniting two or more districts.

The only observation I desire to make, in passing, on that section, is that it is apparent that although what is aimed at is the comprehension within one scheme of what may be a considerable area, ruled over by different municipal or local authorities, yet it is not necessary that it should be so; the order may be made on application of one county council or of a borough council, and may, although it is not likely that it would, comprise only an area within the jurisdiction of a single body. Sub-section 2 provides that "the local fisheries committee for a sea fisheries district shall be a committee of a county council or borough council, or if two or more councils appear to be interested, a joint committee of those councils, with the addition in each case of such members representing the fishing interests of the district, including members representing any board of salmon conservators having jurisdiction within the district, as may be directed by the order creating the district, such number of fishery members not being in the aggregate less than the number of members of the county or borough councils provided by the order creating the district. The fishery members shall hold office for the same time as the members appointed by the county or borough council or councils." So that the composition is a composition of what may be called, in the strict sense of the word, representative members sent by the county council or by the borough councils, and shall consist also of members not so strictly representative in their character, but members representing any board of salmon conservators within the district, so far as they may be included by the order made, but with the stipulation that the number of—what I for this purpose call—non-elective or non-representative members shall not exceed the number of the elective or representative members. Then sub-section 3 provides that "the law relating to committees and joint committees of county councils shall, subject to the provisions of the order constituting a local fisheries committee, apply to the local fisheries committee in like manner as if the powers and duties of that committee were powers and duties transferred by the Local Government Act, 1888, to the council or councils represented on the committee and delegated to the committee by the said council or councils." Then sub-section 4 provides that every order made by the Board of Trade shall be laid before Parliament, and if either House within thirty days resolves that either the whole or any part of the order ought not to be enforced then it is not to have force, but subject to any such resolution every order so made shall come into force at the expiration of thirty days. Then there is a provision in sub-section 5 which shows that this is not a purely voluntary scheme—namely, that in case a county council or borough council to whom application has been made by not less than twenty inhabitant ratepayers refuse to apply to the Board of Trade to create a sea fisheries district, then there may be a further application to the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade may then proceed to constitute a sea fisheries committee by their order as if the application had been made by the council itself; but by sub-section 6 there is the provision that before making any order creating a sea fisheries district the Board of Trade is to cause the draft of the order to be circulated, is to hear objections to its provisions, and is to give notice of inquiry to be held by advertisement or otherwise. Then section 2 gives power to the sea fisheries committee to make bye-laws for the regulation of its fisheries.

Now I come to the sections which are mainly in discussion and controversy in this case. Section 6 says, "Subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure made by the council or councils by whom a local fisheries committee is appointed, the committee may appoint such fishery officers as they deem expedient for the purpose of enforcing the observance within their district of the bye-laws made by the committee." So this section, it will be observed, very properly and naturally recognizes that the restrictions or conditions as to expenditure shall rest with the contributing bodies—in other words, the members of the fisheries committee, who are sent there as representing boards of salmon conservators, or other bodies of that nature, have no voice in this matter. The conditions and restrictions as to expenditure are to rest with the council or councils—the county council in the one case, the borough council in the other, and these restrictions or conditions as to expenditure are, according to the clear wording of the section, to precede the appointment of the fishery officers. Such fishery officers are to be appointed as the fisheries committee think right, but conditions and restrictions may be laid down by the council or councils representing the areas that have to bear the charge, and those conditions and restrictions, if laid down properly and in time, may be observed by the fisheries committee. One of the important questions—indeed, the crucial question in the case—is, when those conditions and restrictions are to be imposed. Then section 10 provides that "the expenses of a local fisheries committee, so far as payable by a county council, shall, according as is provided by the order providing for the constitution of the local fisheries committee, be general or special expenses within the meaning of the Local Government Act, 1888, and if special expenses shall be charged in manner directed by the order." Section 11 provides that "an order providing for the constitution of a local fisheries committee may contain such regulations consistent with this Act with respect to the number and mode of appointment of the members of the committee, and with respect to other matters relating to the constitution of the committee, as may seem expedient to the Board of Trade." So it will be seen that while the Act in general terms points out what is to be the mode for obtaining the appointment of a fisheries committee and some general outline as to the constitution of that body and as to its functions, it leaves a great many matters to be filled in by the provisions of the order of the Board of Trade, which itself is the efficient Act for the constitution of the fisheries committee, and that order may contain such regulations, always consistent with the Act, in respect of the number and mode of appointment of the members of the committee, and in respect of other matters relating to the constitution of the committee as may seem expedient to the Board of Trade.

Now, application having been made to the Board of Trade, we must assume that all the proper steps were taken by the Board of Trade, and we must also assume that the order which was on the 9th of July, 1890, made by the Board of Trade constituting the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries Committee was a valid order, and within the jurisdiction given to the Board of Trade under the Act to which I have referred. But it is necessary that I should call attention in some detail to the provisions of the order. It recites that application has been made to the Board of Trade by certain councils. It then recites that certain other places in addition to the councils appear to be interested in the proposed district. It then further recites that they had caused a circulation to be made of the draft proposal, and had considered certain objections and so on made. Thereupon, by clause 1 of what I may call the enacting part of this order, the sea fisheries district is created and its boundaries are set out in detail. On that I need not dwell. Clause 2 deals with the constitution of the committee: "A local fisheries committee shall be constituted for the regulation of the sea fisheries carried on within the said district." Then it provides that such committee shall be a joint committee of the councils of Durham, of the North Riding of Yorkshire (that is the county council in question), of the East Riding of Yorkshire, and of various other places, including certain borough councils—South Shields, Sunderland, and so on; that it shall consist of forty members, two appointed by the County Council of Durham, four by the County Council of the North Riding of Yorkshire, four by the County Council of the East Riding, and so on, and various other provisions with which I need not deal, including the boroughs to which I have referred, representing altogether some twenty members, with the addition of twenty members representing the fishing interests of the district, and one from the Board of Conservators of the Tyne Fishery, another from the Wear Fishery, another from the Tees Fishery, and so forth, and fourteen members by the Board of Trade—that is to say, six boards of conservancy members and fourteen nominated by the Board of Trade. So that you have got the forty members altogether. "The members to be appointed by the councils shall be appointed in each year at the usual quarterly meeting of the said councils respectively held in the month of November." That will be found to be not unimportant. "The members to be appointed by the boards of salmon conservators and by the Board of Trade shall be appointed in each year before the 9th of November." Then comes this provision, which is also important. "All the members shall retire, and the new members shall come into office in each year on the 9th day of November." I refer to that because it makes intelligible what at first sight did not seem to me so, in some of the observations of Vaughan Williams, J., in Reg. v. Mayor of Plymouth, where he spoke of the appointment each year, or the re-appointment each year of the fishery inspector. It would appear from the constitution of this body that, unlike most similar bodies, as to which the usual provision is that a certain proportion of them retire annually, it seems to be the scheme of the constitution of this body that they shall all retire, being capable of re-election, but that they shall all retire at the end of each year. So that there would seem to be, therefore, a moment of time when the fisheries committee did not exist. Therefore there does seem to have been ground for the language used by Vaughan Williams, J., in the Plymouth case, in which he spoke of the re-appointment annually of the fishery inspector. Clause 2 then goes on to say: "Provided that the first members to be appointed by the councils and by the boards of salmon conservators shall be appointed at the meeting of each body respectively held next after the coming into force of this order, and the first members to be appointed by the Board of Trade shall be appointed before the 1st of September next, and that the first members of the committee shall come into office on the 1st of September next, and shall retire on the 9th of November, 1891. Retiring members shall be eligible for re-appointment." Now I come to something that is more material. "Except as provided by section 6 of the Act"—that is the section which deals with restrictions which may be laid down as to expenditure by the council or councils—"no council shall make, vary, or revoke any regulations or standing orders respecting the quorum or proceedings of the committee hereby constituted, or as to the area within which it is to exercise its authority, provided that any council may make a regulation requiring the committee to submit to each council once in each year an estimate of expenses proposed to be incurred by them under the Act, and once in each year a printed abstract of their account for the preceding year, and to afford to any person or persons appointed for the purpose by the council access at all reasonable times to the books containing their accounts." Then it proceeds: "Subject to any restrictions or conditions, made under section 6 of the Act, the committee"—that is, the fisheries committee—"shall not be required to report its proceedings to any council, nor shall its acts or proceedings be submitted to any council for approval."

Now we come to deal with the only remaining clause which it is necessary to refer to, but which is the one dealing with the mode in which the burthen of expense is distributed and borne. "The expenses of the committee, other than those which may be required to be incurred under section 8 of the Act, shall be chargeable as follows:" two-twentieths by Durham, four-twentieths by the North Riding, two-twentieths by this authority, one-twentieth by that authority, and so on, till the entire twenty-twentieths are distributed. Now, it is important in this connection, therefore, to observe that it is not possible to increase the burden upon any one of those expense-bearing areas—that is to say, once the amount of the expenses has been determined, it is clear that that is an estimate not of expenses that have been incurred, but of expenses for a year to be incurred. Once that figure is determined, then the North Riding can only be charged with four-twentieth parts of that expense. And the object of that on consideration, of course, will be apparent. When we come to the consideration of that which is of the real consequence in this case namely, whether—after there has been an estimate of the expenses which the sea fisheries committee have come to the conclusion is necessary to be made or provided for in the coming year, in order to give effect to the objects of the Act, and to the objects for which they were created—it is possible for one of the councils, whether borough or county, to say, "We object to this item or that item in that expenditure, and we decline to be responsible to contribute our quota towards that expenditure"? Of course, if that contention were in the results found to be well founded, the consequences clearly would be that it would be in the power of one of these bodies, it may be, to defeat the whole operation of the Act, because it must be assumed that the estimate of the necessary expenditure was an estimate of what the committee, after careful inquiry, had arrived at the conclusion was necessary to be expended; and if one of the bodies upon whom the burden of expense falls says "I will not contribute my share," where is the provision by which his defalcation can be made good? There is none. As I pointed out, the quota of the other expense-bearing authorities or areas cannot be increased.

I have said all that is necessary both as to the provisions of the Act, and as to the order made under the authority of the Act, and now it is necessary, to bring the matter to the point, to state the facts in the order of time. The order of the Board of Trade was made on the 19th of July, 1890. The committee was appointed, and presumably elections have gone on, and estimates of expenses made, those expenses borne by the several constituent bodies, to use a brief expression, for 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896. How far the personnel of the sea fisheries committee was altered we do not know, nor is it material to inquire. Either the same members were re-elected or fresh members elected annually in their place. But the fact is that the fishery officer, who is now acting for the sea fisheries committee, was appointed on the 10th of July, 1895, and having since been continued, in 1896 and 1897, in his appointment, must be taken to have been re-appointed at the beginning of each successive year; there has been no exercise of the power given to the county council or councils to make any restrictions or any conditions whatever, and it would seem, and certainly does seem, that upon the mere statement of those facts there is an end to any arguments tending to or endeavouring to show that the council of the North Riding is to escape liability, because the words are: "Subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure made by the council or councils by whom a local fisheries committee is appointed, the committee may appoint such fishery officers as they deem expedient for the purpose of enforcing the observance within their district of bye-laws made by the committee." Therefore it is clear that the restrictions and conditions are restrictions and conditions that must precede the appointment of such fishery officers, and it is equally clear that the appointment of such fishery officers as the sea fisheries committee deem expedient, embraces consequently such expenses of equipment, whatever direction that equipment may take, as shall enable that officer and those officers to discharge the duties entrusted to them, and cast upon the sea fisheries committee by the statute and by the order of the Board of Trade. That would really seem to me quite enough to end the case, but I think it may be well that I should examine the matter a little further. It will follow, if I am right so far, that the North Riding neither singly (if it could do so effectually, which I do not think it could) nor in concert with others, having made any restriction or conditions as regards the estimate for the year in question, are bound to pay their quota as that quota is fixed by the Board of Trade Order.

On the 19th of January, 1898, the sea fisheries committee resolved, by their sub-committee, that it would be better to buy rather than to go on hiring a vessel for the use of their fishery officer. They made an estimate of the expenses, and arrived at the conclusion that that would involve the expenditure of £2,500 on the purchase of a vessel, and £360 for the maintenance of that vessel for one year, making a total of £2,860. That was merely the resolution of the sub-committee; it was not the act, therefore, of the sea fisheries committee itself. But apparently they had a further committee, called the expenses committee, or the executive committee, and the resolution or recommendation of the sub-committee came before them, and was approved of, and finally it comes before the sea fisheries committee as a collective body and was passed, so far as the evidence shows, unanimously. On the 22nd of January, 1898, a precept was issued by the sea fisheries committee to the County Council of the North Riding to pay its share, amounting to £572, and up to that point no objection whatever was made as to what the sea fisheries committee were proposing to do or to what they had done. And it is further to be observed that although clause 2 of the order constituting the committee gives to any council the right to make a regulation requiring the sea fisheries committee to submit to such council an estimate of the year's expenses proposed to be incurred, no such regulation has been made by the North Riding County Council, nor, so far as we know, by any of those councils. It seems to me, therefore, as plain as anything can well be, that this North Riding council cannot now say, "We object to this expenditure; we think this expenditure is unwise, and we decline to pay our part." To allow such a repudiation at such a stage would be to render the whole scheme contemplated by the Act and by the order unworkable, and would put it into the power of one council of a borough or a county to defeat the whole object. For instance, to illustrate again what I have previously adverted to, if the North Riding are right in this repudiation, where is the £572, which is part of the supposed necessary expenditure for this year, to come from? It cannot come from any of the other contributing bodies, for their quota of the total expenses is fixed by the order, and cannot be altered.

Now, following upon the issue of the precept, the North Riding council instruct their representatives to oppose the scheme, and accordingly a motion was made some time in the month of March in the sea fisheries committee which practically was for the purpose of endeavouring to undo the work of the council, but it was rejected by a large majority, It is not unimportant to observe the character of that resolution. At their meeting held on the 11th of May they passed this resolution: "Pursuant to the resolution adopted on the 16th of March, the requisite steps shall be taken to protect the ratepayers in the Riding from liability in respect of the expenditure incurred by the committee; that the amount being the total amount of the accounts recommended for payment by the finance committee be reduced by £572, being the amount of the precept of the sea fisheries committee, and that in pursuance of the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act of 1888, the county council restrict the expenditure to which it would be liable, to expenditure the contribution of which payable by the county council shall not exceed £150 in any one year." Now, see, therefore, what they propose. They say, "Although we have not a priori—that is to say, before the appointment or re-appointment of these fishery officers—laid down any restriction or condition, and although we have not even passed any regulation of our own body requiring the sea fisheries committee to furnish us with an estimate of the proposed expenditure, yet, the whole thing having been done and considered by the sea fisheries committee, we now object." They cannot be heard to say so.

I think, therefore, that this case is a very clear case. I quite agree that cases may be put as to which questions of more or less difficulty may arise, and it may, from the public and important character of this question, be well to say a word or two about them. It was argued before us that any one council might lay down restrictions or conditions, and that, to consider the case in the concrete, when they were sending their representatives and electing their representatives at the end of the year and before the beginning of the next, they might elect their representatives and say: We elect you subject to this restriction or condition—namely, that no expense shall be incurred by the sea fisheries committee which will involve a greater contribution on the part of the County Council of the North Riding than, say, £150. Would that be legal? Would that be within their compass? It seems to me it would not. It seems to me to be apparent that the time at which the conditions for the constitution of that body ought to be framed certainly is, if not at the original constitution of the sea fisheries committee by the agreement and assent of all the contributing authorities, certainly before any expense has been incurred by the committee by the appointment of its officers. Therein one is well founded by the express words of the Act itself. But assuming that objection is made before the appointment of the officers, it cannot be said that the objection of one of the constituent and contributing bodies is enough to create a restriction or condition within the meaning of section 6. It seems to me that there must be an agreement amongst all the bodies concerned, and that it does not lie within the power of any one of them to say: "This is a restriction which I insist upon being observed in the action of the sea fisheries committee, or else I do not come under a liability under the scheme." To admit of that interpretation of the statute would enable one body that took a short-sighted view, it may be, of its own interests, a body that thought that it was contributing more than it was gaining by the scheme, to defeat the whole scheme, and to prevent the operation of the Act which was intended to proceed upon this just principle, to give effect to what was believed to be a great public object in the preservation and regulation of our fisheries, and at the same time to construct an equitable scheme by which the burthen of carrying out that object should be borne by those who were interested in it. But to allow each one of the constituent or expense-bearing or contributing bodies to judge for itself what was the measure of its gain, and what ought to be the measure of its contribution, would, as it seems to me, wholly and entirely defeat the Act of Parliament. I think, therefore, that the precept has been properly issued, and the mandamus to enforce it must go.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree in everything which my lord has said, and I probably should have said no more, except that the case is a very important one, and it raises points which have not been discussed before, and as I have penned a judgment I think I ought to deliver it.

The substantial question in the case is, What is the meaning of section 6, sub-section 1, of the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888. "The committee," that section says, "may appoint such fishery officers as they deem expedient" (which means, I presume, as they deem it expedient to appoint), "subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure made by the council or councils by whom a local fisheries committee is appointed." The English is not very good, and the phraseology is not very accurate. No fisheries committee is appointed by a council or by councils. The meaning, however, is clear, and the phrase should be read: "Subject to any restrictions or conditions as to expenditure made by the council or councils by whom members of a local fisheries committee are appointed." The fisheries committee, it is obvious from section 2, is to consist partly of members appointed by councils which will have to provide the funds, and partly of at least an equal number of members representing bodies of conservators or other interests who provide no funds. It was therefore reasonable to give some control over expenditure, to the paymasters. Accordingly, if there be but one council providing the funds, that council may impose restrictions as to expenditure, but if there be more than one council, how can any one council by itself impose restrictions on the expenditure, or on its own contribution? The two phrases come to the same thing, for if the one council can impose restriction on its own contribution, it thereby must impose a restriction on the total expenditure, which is a definite multiple of the contribution of each council. I cannot think this the meaning of the section, as it would put it in the power of any one council to cripple or destroy any effective work on the part of the committee. The restrictions must be imposed by the councils—that is, by the agreement of all the councils. This, I think, is made plainer by the enactment of section 1, sub-section 3, which says that "the law relating to committees and joint committees of county councils shall, subject to the provisions of the order constituting a local fisheries committee, apply to the local fisheries committee in like manner as if the powers and duties of that committee were powers and duties transferred by the Local Government Act of 1888 to the council or councils represented on the committee and delegates to the committee by the said council or councils." By section 81, sub-section 1, of the Local Government Act of 1888, it is provided that any county council or councils may join in appointing out of their respective bodies a joint committee to whom by sub-section 2 any county council taking part in the appointment, may delegate any power which such county council might exercise for the purposes for which the committee is appointed; and by sub-section 4, "subject to the terms of delegation, any such joint committee shall, in respect of any matter delegated to it, have the same power in all respects as the councils and courts appointing it, or any of them."

Now, it is quite plain that the terms of delegation spoken of must necessarily be the same in all the resolutions of delegation, or else the scheme would be unworkable, and in like manner the work of the fishery committee could not be carried on unless the restrictions or conditions relating to expenditure, if any, were identical in the case of each of the councils imposing them. Unless, therefore, there be unanimity on the part of the several councils concerned there can be no operative restrictions under section 6. In this instance there were none at all by any of the councils until the resolution of the North Riding council of the 11th of May, 1888, and as those restrictions were not concurred in by the other councils, they are, in my opinion, inoperative.

It was urged upon us that the provision contained in the order of the Board of Trade that any council may make a regulation requiring the committee to submit to such council once in each year an estimate of expenses proposed to be incurred by them under the Act, and once in each year a printed abstract of their accounts for the preceding year, and to afford to any person or persons appointed for the purpose by the council access at all reasonable times to the books containing their accounts, would be fruitless unless the council could, after examining the estimate and accounts, pass an effective resolution to limit the expenditure. But that consequence does not follow. Any reasonable or well-considered objection to the nature or extent of proposed expenditure coming from any of the contributory councils would be sure to meet with careful attention by the committee, and the consideration of estimates and accounts by the several councils would enable them to request their appointed members to represent to the committee the objections entertained. I am well aware that cases of apparent hardship may be conceived as possible under this legislation, but the answer is that all legislation of this kind is practical, and can rarely so much as aim at completeness or perfection, and I have no doubt that the good sense of the various bodies represented on the committee and of the members of the committee itself may safely be trusted to enable the important work of the committee to be done with a due regard to the various interests represented, and without injurious friction or serious injustice to anyone concerned. By the order of the Board of Trade all the members of the committee go out of office every year, and therefore the opportunity occurs once a year of changing the personnel of the committee, and of imposing any restrictions upon expenditure as to which the councils interested may be unanimous. This provision probably is a sufficient safeguard against things going seriously wrong in the matter of expenditure or anything else.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the rule for a mandamus should be made absolute.

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Foreign security issued in the United Kingdom—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 82, sub-section 1 (6) (i.).

The bond of an American railway company, payable to bearer, contained a clause on the face of the bond: "This bond shall not be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the certificate hereon indorsed of the trustee. . . ." This instrument had been executed in the United States and delivered to a trust company, which was to act as trustee; but the certificate was unsigned, and the instrument was transmitted in that state to London, where the certificate was signed as required, and the bond issued to the holders.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L JJ.), reported sub. nom. Baring v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 46 W. R. 98, [1898] 1 Q. B. 78, affirming a judgment of the Divisional Court.

Both the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal had held that the bond was issued in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the sub-section.

Cohen, Q.C., Bray, Q.C., and Willes Chitty, for the plaintiff.—The bond was issued in New York. The statute speaks of the original issue. There was no act to be done by the new company to validate the bonds. The bondholders could require the certificate from Barings.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for respondent, were not called upon.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C. — I confess that it appears to me that there is not much difficulty in determining this case. In my opinion this marketable security was both made and issued in London. It is to my mind immaterial to consider the origin of this document, or the place in which it was written, or where the process of its manufacture originally commenced. The document is a document which when completed became undoubtedly, within the meaning of the statute, a marketable security, and the marketable security, when thus completed, is for the first time delivered to a person who is entitled to receive it in London. I think that was an issue of that marketable security to that person in London. It was, therefore, I think, issued in London. It was also, however, in my opinion, made in London. The earlier history of the transaction is immaterial. We are dealing now with a taxing Act which imposes the necessity of placing a stamp upon particular instruments of the character designated and described by the statute itself. The statute has given a test of what is a marketable security, and any document which has that character and is issued in London or made in London is liable to that tax. I think that this document was issued in London. Was it made in London? Its commencement was in another country, but it cannot be denied that at the time when it first reached this country it did not fill the character of an instrument to which the Act has affixed the necessity of a stamp being applied. It is admitted that when it got to London, it for the first time fell into the category to which the statute applies. It required a particular signature; and be it observed that we are here not dealing with those wider questions of the contractual relations between the parties, we are dealing with a taxing Act which affixes to a particular instrument of a particular character the necessity of having a stamp. For the first time in London this instrument gets that character by a signature affixed in London. I am wholly unable to understand why, when for the first time it assumes that character and falls into the definition which the Act of Parliament gives, which renders it liable to stamp duty, one should do more than look into the instrument itself and see whether it has first assumed that character of a marketable security, in this country. For my own part I think the case extremely plain, and that the instrument was both made and issued in this country, and I decline to go into the earlier history of the transaction, to see who was a party to the first part of it, and who was a party to the second part. To my mind it is enough to say that this document first assumed that character in this country, and in that character was for the first time "issued" in this country to the person entitled to receive it. Under those circumstances it appears to me, quite independently of the early history of the matter, that it fills the character which the Act of Parliament contemplated as that of documents which were to be subject to the stamp duty. Therefore, though I cannot agree with all the reasons given by the judges below, I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was substantially right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion these bonds were both made and issued in this country within the meaning of the Stamp Act. I think that they were "made" when the finishing touch was put to them and they became by the addition of the certificate valid and operative instruments as "marketable securities." It seems to me that they were then for the first time "issued" as marketable securities. Before that addition was made the bonds on the face of them bore the statement that they were not valid for any purpose. I cannot understand how any document can be issued as a marketable security which proclaims on the face of it that it is not a marketable security at all.

Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord SHAND. — I am of the same opinion. I think that there is much room for the argument that these bonds were issued in the state in which they were issued in America, because they were documents which were there given over or delivered by debtors practically to their creditors in fulfilment of obligations previously undertaken. The bond in question might have been delivered to the appellant himself, but instead of that the bonds were handed to trustees to be held for the appellant and other bondholders in fulfilment of obligations. But the point on which my judgment turns in the case in this, that when the bonds were so handed and issued to the creditors entitled to them, or to trustees for their behoof, they were not marketable securities. They became marketable securities only after they arrived in England, when they were made marketable by the certificates there signed; and we therefore have an issue here of a document essentially different from that which it had been in America. What had been an unmarketable security was made a marketable security, and then for the first time issued as such in England. It appears to me that, in these circumstances, the clause of the statute applies, and that the stamp duty which the Crown insists upon became due. In short, I agree practically with what was said by Smith, L.J.: "If when the certificate was indorsed in London by Mr. Merritt it then and there became a marketable security, and was not a marketable security until that period, it became then a marketable security issued in the United Kingdom." On that ground I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Patent—Infringement—Threat of legal proceedings—Injunction — Breach — Contempt of court — Costs—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

C., trading as M. & Co., had been restrained by injunction—in an action brought by E. against M. & Co. — from publishing, either verbally or otherwise, any statement to the effect that an injunction had been granted against E. restraining him from infringing certain letters patent, and also from threatening E. or any of E.'s customers with any legal proceedings or liability in respect of the manufacture, sale, or purchase of a certain machine. After the order M. & Co. circulated amongst E.'s customers a pamphlet prepared by the A. B. Co., which stated in effect that M. & Co. were the special agents of the A. B. Co., who were the exclusive makers of the machine in question under the license of the patentee, and who intended to prosecute all infringers of their patents.

On motion to commit C. to prison for contempt of court for a breach of the injunction, Romer, J., ordered C. to pay the costs of the motion. On appeal, Held, by Lindley, M.R., and Vaughan Williams, L.J. (dissentiente Chitty, L.J.), that the injunction was not so plainly worded to prohibit what C. had done, as to justify a judicial decision that a breach of the injunction had been committed.

Per Lindley, M.R.—The court will not strain the language of an injunction even to meet a case which would have been prohibited if foreseen.

Appeal of the defendants from a decision of Romer, J.

On the 22nd of July, 1898, Romer, J., upon the motion of the plaintiffs, which was treated as the trial of the action, granted an injunction in the following terms: That the defendants, H. F. Martyn & Co., their servants and agents, be perpetually restrained from publishing, either verbally or by circular, letter, notice, or otherwise howsoever any statements that, or to the effect that, injunctions have, or an injunction has, been granted against the plaintiffs restraining them from infringing certain letters patent, No. 12,013 of the year 1887, granted to one Herbert John Allison, or any other letters patent, and also from threatening the plaintiffs or any of the plaintiffs' customers with any legal proceedings or liability in respect of the manufacture, sale, or purchase of the duplicating machine known or described by the defendants as the "Genuine Edison Mimeograph."

After the order the defendants circulated amongst the plaintiffs' customers a pamphlet headed "The Genuine Edison Mimeograph," and printed on the outside were the words: "H. F. Martyn & Co., special agents for the A. B. Dick Co., exclusive makers for the world under authority of Mr. T. A. Edison." On the back of it was printed a notice as follows:

"From the office of the A. B. Dick Co., Chicago, June 24, 1896. To whom it may concern. Public notice is hereby given that we are the exclusive makers for the world of the Edison Mimeograph, and all supplies for same, under our authority so to do through the inventor, Mr. Thomas A. Edison. We further declare it to be our intention to prosecute all infringers of our patents. So-called Edison Mimeographs and supplies made by other parties we stamp as fraudulent imitations of goods made by us, and such imitation stuff is not made with any authority either through us or through Mr. Edison.

"(Signed) A. B. DICK CO."

The plaintiffs moved for leave to issue a writ of attachment against the defendant Thomas H. D. Cooke, trading as H. F. Martyn & Co., or in the alternative to commit him to prison for contempt of court.

Romer, J., on the 18th of November, 1898, made no order except that the respondent should pay the costs of the motion. He thought that the respondent had committed a breach of the injunction, though not intentionally.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—LINDLEY, M.R.—The question in this appeal is whether the defendant has committed a breach of the injunction. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The learned judge has come to the conclusion that the defendant has been guilty of a contempt of court by infringing the injunction against threats. The question is of some importance. I am unable to agree with the learned judge. To threaten is one thing; to circulate threats by someone else is another and different thing. Primâ facie, at all events, the statement is true. Evidence may be adduced to prove that the circulation of threats by someone else is only a cloak to conceal threats really made by the person who circulates them. But there is no evidence in this case to show that the statement made by the defendant is untrue. He says in his affidavit that the pamphlet complained of was prepared by the A. B. Dick Co. in America, and was sent by them to him as their agent to circulate. He further says that the pamphlet was not one of the documents complained of on the motion for an injunction. The A. B. Dick Co. were not parties to that action, nor are they parties to the application to commit the defendant. The court will not for a moment tolerate a breach of an injunction, but will always enforce observance of its orders, and will not allow itself to be tricked or trifled with. But this very circumstance renders it incumbent on the court not to strain the language of an injunction, even to meet a case which would have been prohibited if foreseen. To imprison a man is a very serious matter, and although the defendant has not been imprisoned, still the order made against him (i.e. that he pay the costs of the application to commit him) is only justifiable on the ground that he has disobeyed the injunction of the court, for which disobedience he might probably have been imprisoned if the judge had thought proper to make an order for his committal. I cannot bring myself to say that the injunction is so clearly worded as to extend to circulating the threats contained in the pamphlet. The A. B. Dick Co. are not myths; they are real traders; the defendant is their agent: the threats circulated are their threats, not his. He does not threaten; they threaten, and make their threats known by him. That he might be restrained from circulating the threats is very likely, and I will assume that he could. I have, moreover, no doubt that these threats, which are sent to the plaintiffs' customers, are a serious injury to the plaintiffs. But, for all that, in my opinion, the injunction as worded does not so plainly prohibit what the defendant has done as to justify me in holding judicially that the defendant has been guilty of a breach of the injunction. The order appealed from ought to be discharged, but without costs, for the defendant has unquestionably done that which was eminently calculated to lead to an application for his committal, and that which Romer, J., and one of my brothers think is a breach of the injunction. Under these circumstances, although the defendant succeeds, he cannot reasonably complain of the application made against him, and no injustice is done in not giving him any costs.

The order will therefore be discharged without giving the defendant costs either here or below.

CHITTY, L.J.—I differ, though with regret. Romer, J., by ordering the defendant to pay the costs of the motion to commit him, as he has done, adjudged that there was a breach of the order for which he might have been sent to prison. In the exercise of his discretion Romer, J., has thought it right to make the more lenient order that he should pay the costs only. But his opinion was clear—first, as to the injunction granted; and, secondly, as to the breach. He says that the defendant must not actively by his own conduct threaten, and that in his opinion he has threatened the plaintiffs or the plaintiffs' customers with legal proceedings for liability in respect of the manufacture, sale, or purchase of the machine referred to in that order and, in his opinion, the order as it stands, is not restricted to legal proceedings by the defendant or liability at the suit of the defendant. It means what it says. Now I take the order and read it, and I am unable to find any ambiguity in it. Reading it as you must read it, without any assistance by reference to the pleadings or the like, there being no pleadings in the case, and having nothing to refer to except the order itself, the order on the face of it refers to no other document which can be read for the purpose of limiting or expounding or explaining the words that are actually found. The material part of the injunction is from threatening the plaintiffs, or any of the plaintiffs' customers, with any legal proceedings or liability. That is not an injunction directed to threats that the defendant himself will take any legal proceedings or attempt to impose liability. The injunction is general in terms. As Romer, J., has said (and I agree with him in this) it is not restricted to threats made by the defendant himself that he will take the steps which are here restrained. The gist of the injunction is threatening the plaintiffs' customers. In my opinion the document which has been issued is a breach. I agree that it is not a threat by the defendant himself that he will take proceedings, but it is a threat in my opinion that other persons—namely, the A. B. Dick Co.—will take proceedings founded upon their patent. I think it is quite plain that what has been done is within the mischief of the injunction, but I say that merely to state expressly my opinion that I do not go upon any question of construing the injunction so as to make it wider. I take the injunction just as it stands, and I agree with Romer, J., that there is a breach.

Something was said during the argument with reference to the 32nd section of the Patent Act of 1883. It was said that the injunction was granted obviously simply under that section. I think that argument cannot be maintained. There is nothing to show that the defendant against whom the injunction went was a person who claimed to be a patentee. I quite agree that the language of the injunction follows the language of the section. There may have been other just grounds to make the injunction in this form. It is a settled rule that you cannot question the validity of the order on a motion to commit, but if the order is wrong in terms then the court may allow on such a motion the matter to stand over, in order that the defendant sought to be committed can get the order set right if he is in a position so to do. The result, in my judgment, is simply this: I think there is a plain order and a plain breach.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. According to my reading of this order it is an order based upon the 32nd section of the Act of 1883, and under those circumstances, if that is the meaning of the order, in my judgment there is no breach of it.

RITSON v. RITSON. (a.)

Partnership—Assets—Deposit of title-deeds by partner to secure partnership debt—Devise of real estate—Sufficiency of partnership assets to pay debts in full—Real Estate Charges (Locke-King's) Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113), s. 1.

A testator who was a partner in a firm of shipbuilders had deposited at a bank the title-deeds of a real estate belonging to himself to secure the partnership overdraft. By his will he specifically devised the real estate. The partnership assets were, at the testator's death, sufficient to pay the firm's debts.

Held, affirming Romer, J. (46 W. R. 478), that the charge only extended to the debts of the partnership, and that, as the partnership assets were sufficient to pay these, no part thereof was a charge on the real estate of the testator comprised in the memorandum of charge.

Appeal of the defendants from Romer, J. (reported 46 W. R. 478).

The testator, John Ritson, who died on the 15th of September, 1897, was in partnership with his brother as timber merchants and shipbuilders.

In August, 1896, the testator had deposited the title-deeds to certain rent-charges belonging to him with a bank to secure the partnership overdraft, signing at the same time a memorandum of deposit; he also gave an undertaking to execute a legal mortgage if called upon to do so.

By his will, dated the 21st of June, 1897, the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for his wife for life and on her death upon trust as to certain real estate, which included the real estate charged to the bank, for his son absolutely, and as to all the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for his (the testator's) children equally.

At the testator's death both his private account and the partnership account were largely overdrawn at the bank, but the assets of the partnership were more than sufficient to cover all their debts.

The executors took out a summons for the determination of certain questions arising in the administration of the estate. The chief question raised by the summons was whether such part of the amount due from the partnership to the bankers, secured by the said memorandum, as was payable by the estate of the testator, ought to be paid out of the real estate mentioned in the memorandum, or out of his share in the partnership assets.

Romer, J., held that the charge only extended to the debts of the partnership, and not to the private overdraft of the testator; and that as the partnership assets were sufficient to pay these, the partnership debt to the bank was payable thereout, and was not a charge on the real estate comprised in the memorandum.

The defendants, three of the younger children of the testator, appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the appellants.—The real question is whether Locke-King's Act applies to partnership property. Was the debt of the firm payable out of the real estate or out of the personal estate, the assets of the partnership? We have not to show a charge on the personal estate, but a loss on the personal estate.

They referred to section 9 of the Partnership Act, 1890.

Neville, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that any member of this court has any doubt about this case. I agree with Romer, J., that when the case is really understood Locke-King's Act has nothing to do with it.

The case is simple. There is a partnership with joint debts and one of the partners gives to a bank a separate security on his separate estate for the joint debt of the firm. That partner dies, and when he dies it is ascertained that the joint assets are amply sufficient to pay the joint debts. The joint debts, notwithstanding the charge, which is immaterial, have to be paid out of the joint assets if there are enough. What the estate of the deceased partner is concerned with is what remains after payment of the joint debts including the guarantee. The order made by Romer, J., is quite right. It is worth reading—"This court doth declare that the memorandum of deposit dated the 15th of August, 1896, in the said summons mentioned extended to the debts and overdrafts of the partnership business carried on by the testator and Thomas Smith Ritson only, and not to the private debt or overdraft of the testator. And it being admitted that the assets of the said partnership business were sufficient for the payment of all partnership debts, including that due to the bank, this court doth declare that such last mentioned debt is payable out of such partnership assets and not out of the assets of the testator, and that no part thereof is a charge on the real estate of the testator comprised in the said memorandum."

That appears to me to be absolutely right, and following his line of thought in his judgment he is quite right when he says, "The case therefore is not one 'between the different persons claiming through or under the deceased person' within the words of section 1 of Locke-King's Act." And then he goes on to say that it would be very different if the joint estate were not sufficient to pay the debts in full. The judgment is absolutely right and the case is not within the scope of Locke-King's Act, or within the language of it.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and really for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls and by Romer, J. The debt was the joint debt of the firm, and the assets of the firm in the hands of the surviving partner were more than sufficient to pay the debt. What was the interest of the deceased in the partnership assets? It was merely to take his share of the surplus property, the balance remaining after payment of the debt. The result is that there was no charge on the testator's estate at all; and I agree that within the meaning of the Act there are no persons claiming through or under the deceased person. The whole fallacy appears to me to be this: that the testator's estate is assumed to consist of that of which it does not consist at all.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. The Act is intended to apply where there are different persons claiming through or under the deceased person. It seems to me that the Act can have no application unless there is such a difference. There is no such difference here, and if the partnership estate is solvent there is no question of any incidence of this kind on the personalty in the distribution of this estate. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Receiver — Married woman—"Equitable execution"—Jurisdiction—Costs "payable out of married woman's separate estate, but not otherwise"—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25.

A married woman, in an action unsuccessfully brought by her, was condemned in costs, to be taxed and paid to the defendants "out of the plaintiff's separate estate, but not otherwise." The only separate estate to which the plaintiff was entitled was a reversionary share in some property left to her by her sister's will. The share having come into possession, Kekewich, J., on the application of the defendants, and before the certificate of the defendants' costs had been issued, appointed a receiver of the plaintiff's share.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, on the authority of Kearns v. Leaf, 12 W. R. 462, 1 Hem. & M. 681, that, apart from the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, there was jurisdiction in the court to appoint a receiver of the married woman's separate estate for the protection of the fund out of which the costs were directed to be paid.

Decision of Kekewich, J., ante p. 138, affirmed.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the decision of Kekewich, J., ante p. 138.

In 1897 Elizabeth Cummins, a married woman, suing in respect of her separate estate, had brought an action against her former solicitors for damages by reason of a sale alleged to have been made by them at an undervalue of her reversionary share under the will of her sister Sarah Ann Ellis, deceased.

The action came on for trial on the 22nd of July, 1898. By the judgment it was ordered that two bills of costs delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff should be taxed, and that the amount to be certified as due on the taxation should, subject to the defendants' right of set-off in respect of their taxed costs of the action, be paid within twenty-one days after service of the present order and the taxing-master's certificate in pursuance thereof by the party from whom to the party to whom the same should be certified to be due, unless the court should, upon special circumstances to be certified by the taxing-master, otherwise order upon application to be made within one week after the date of the certificate by the party liable to pay such amount; then it was ordered that the action should be dismissed and that the plaintiff should pay the defendants their taxed costs of the action, such costs to be payable out of the plaintiffs separate estate, but not otherwise.

The only property which the plaintiff possessed consisted of her said share in her sister's estate. The share had recently fallen into possession. The judgment had been passed and entered, but owing to delay the taxations had not been completed nor the taxing-master's certificate issued, and the defendants moved before Kekewich, J., for the appointment of a receiver of the plaintiff's said share, on the ground that the trustees of the will were about to distribute the estate, and that unless a receiver were appointed the defendants would lose the benefit of the judgment.

Kekewich, J. (see ante p. 138), appointed a receiver without salary of the plaintiff's share in her sister's estate to the extent of £270, the amount of the defendants' bill.

The plaintiff appealed.

Benshaw, Q.C., and Peterson, for the appellant.—Until a creditor is in a position to issue legal execution, he cannot issue equitable execution. There is no jurisdiction in the courts to grant protection to a creditor pending an action. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Is not this a charge on the lady's reversion?] We submit not. Robinson v. Pickering, 16 Ch. D. 371, and on appeal 29 W. R. 385, 16 Ch. D. 660, shows that a married woman cannot be restrained pending an action from dealing with her separate estate. Ord. 42, r. 17, shows that legal execution cannot issue here, because there is no certificate for costs; therefore, so far as this is process for execution, no execution can issue and no receiver can be appointed. Then the question arises, Is a charge created by the Married Women's Property Act? We submit not. If it were so, the Act itself would create a charge, and the words in the judgment might be disregarded; then it would merely be an order that a married woman do pay costs, and those costs must come out of her separate estate. This is not a charge, but is restrictive, merely indicating the property subject to execution on the order of the court. At most it could only be a right to be paid out of a particular fund. It really resolves itself into a question of construction on the Act, and the Act does not create a charge; therefore the order made by Kekewich, J., is wrong.

They referred to Harris v. Beauchamp, 42 W. R. 451, [1894] 1 Q. B. 801; Holmes v. Millage, 41 W. R. 354, [1893] 1 Q. B. 551; and In re Shephard, Atkins v. Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, 43 Ch. D. 131. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to Kearns v. Leaf, 12 W. R. 462, 1 Hem. & M. 681.]

Warrington, Q.C., and Waggett, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In this case it appears to me the order is founded on perfectly intelligible and sound principles. There is a judgment against a married woman for the payment of costs not yet taxed, and those costs are by the judgment to be payable out of her separate estate. It appears that she has no separate estate except the share to which she is entitled in her sister's property under her sister's will. The judge was of opinion that this fund was in danger, that is to say, that this lady was in a position to and would, get it, and that if she got it the creditor would not recover his costs. Thereupon the judge did that which I think he had ample jurisdiction to do; he appointed a receiver to protect that property and to preserve it in order that it may be applied in accordance with the judgment which the defendants have obtained. It is said that is wrong. It is said that this is equitable execution, and there has been some discussion upon that footing; but we must bear in mind this is a case in which we are dealing with equitable estates, and a judgment that money is to be paid out of a particular estate. When once you have got that, quite independently of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, the authorities which were very familiar thirty-five or forty years ago show plainly enough that if you have a right to be paid money out of a particular fund you could obtain in equity protection to prevent that fund being dissipated contrary to your right. It is very true you might not have had a specific charge so as to give you priority or anything of that kind, but the courts settled after a long series of decisions—there was a great fight about it at one time, but it was settled—that you could get an injunction, and if an injunction it followed on principle that you could get a receiver in a proper case to protect a fund from being misapplied. That is the principle on which the judge has gone, a perfectly sound principle even without invoking section 25 of the Act. But the introduction of that section does not curtail the powers of the court to grant injunctions. It expands it. It has not revolutionized the law, but it has enabled the court to grant injunctions and receivers where it used not to do so before. I will not go so far as to say where it had no jurisdiction to do so; that would be going a little too far; but where in practice they never did, as, for example, in trespass and in cases of first mortgagees who were out of possession. Very well; what is the wrong in this? Absolutely nothing at all. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The receiver has been appointed for the protection of the fund out of which according to the judgment the costs, when the taxation is completed, are to be paid. It seems to me that that falls within the principle of the case which the Master of the Rolls referred to during the argument, Kearns v. Leaf. No doubt that was a case of contract, but I see no difference between a case of contract and a case of an order of the court to pay. I agree that it does not create a special charge so as to involve any question of priorities, but it does give a right to have the fund protected out of which alone the payment is to be made. Wood, V.C., says such a species of interest in the fund as would entitle the plaintiff in the case before him to interfere and save the property from being wasted. That is the principle on which I think the order of Kekewich, J., was properly made, and ought to be maintained. I agree that the Judicature Act, s. 25, has to some extent enlarged the powers of the court; but upon this occasion I do not think it necessary to enter into any discussion of the particular effect that that section has.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.) upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The instrument as to which the opinion of the commissioners was required was a trust deed for securing debenture stock. It was dated the 6th of May, 1897, and was made between the City of London Brewery Co. of the one part, and certain trustees of the other part. After reciting that there was then outstanding £500,000 debenture stock of the company constituted and secured by a trust deed dated the 20th of February, 1892, and made between the same parties, and reciting the determination of the company to issue further debenture stock, to be called irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock, ranking after the former debenture stock, and to be constituted and secured in manner thereinafter provided, it was witnessed as follows: By clause 2 the company acknowledged that it was indebted to the trustees in the sum of £300,000, carrying interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum. By clause 3 the stockholders were to be regarded as the beneficial owners of their respective shares of the stock. By clause 5 it was provided that, as and when the stock or any part thereof ought to be paid off in accordance with the provisions of the deed, the company should pay to the stockholders or to those whose stock ought to be paid off the full nominal amount of the stock held by them respectively, with such premiums, if any, as should be payable in respect thereof, and such payment should operate in satisfaction of the amount of the stock, and in the meantime until the stock was paid off the company should pay the stockholders interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. By clause 7 the stock was limited in the first instance to £300,000, but the company was to be at liberty to issue further irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock, entitled pari passu to the benefit thereof, subject to the following provisions, that is to say: "(a) Such further irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock shall not exceed £540,000 in amount, making with £300,000 stock above mentioned a total of £840,000. (b) Such further stock shall only be issued for the purpose of redeeming or paying off the 4 per cent. debenture stock of £500,000. (c) Whenever it is proposed to issue any of the said further irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock, the company must notify in writing to the trustees or trustee the amount of the proposed further issue, and must satisfy the trustees or trustee that, by arrangement with the holders of a corresponding amount of 4 per cent. debenture stock, or by reason of notice of redemption having been given, the company is in a position to pay off or redeem a corresponding amount of 4 per cent. debenture stock, and must provide to the satisfaction of the trustees or trustee for the application of such further debenture stock, or of the proceeds thereof, to such redemption or payment and for the transfer of 4 per cent. debenture stock to be redeemed or paid off, and the securities for the same, to the trustees or trustee hereof, and for the purposes of this clause the corresponding amount aforesaid is to be calculated on the basis that not more than £108 of the further irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock is to be issued in respect of every £100 of the 4 per cent. debenture redeemed or paid off. (d) The company must, before any of the said further debenture stock is issued or offered for subscription, execute and deliver to the trustees or trustee an acknowledgment of indebtedness for the amount of the further proposed issue, duly stamped, and framed in accordance with clause 2 hereof, and until such acknowledgment is so executed, stamped, and delivered no part of such further stock is to be entitled to the benefit hereof." By clauses 8 and 9 the company conveyed, by way of mortgage, certain freehold and leasehold properties to the trustees subject to the 4 per cent. debenture stock and the securities for the same. By clause 10 the company charged in favour of the trustees all its other assets, present and future. By clause 12 the security constituted by the deed was to become enforceable in the event of the company making default in payment of any principal or interest under the deed and in each and every of four other named events.

Up to the time when the instrument was presented to the commissioners for their opinion, no acknowledgment of indebtedness referred to in clause 7 (d) had been executed or delivered.

The commissioners were of opinion that the sum of £840,000 mentioned in clause 7 was the limit of the total amount secured by or to be ultimately recoverable under the trust deed within the meaning of section 88, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891. They therefore charged the instrument with the duty chargeable under the head "Mortgage, &c.," in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, by reference to section 86, sub-section 1, of that Act, and they assessed such duty at £1,050, being 2s. 6d. for every £100 of the amount secured.

The company being dissatisfied with the assessment so far as regards £675, part of the duty assessed, being the amount attributable to the sum of £540,000, the commissioners stated this case. The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether the instrument was chargeable with the duty of £1,050; (2) if not, with what duty it was chargeable.

The Divisional Court held (1) that the trust deed was a security for the repayment of £840,000 advanced or to be advanced within the meaning of section 86, sub-section 1, and section 88, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891, notwithstanding that certain preliminaries must necessarily be complied with before the issue of any further stock in excess of £300,000; but (2) that, in respect of £500,000, the deed was a substituted security, and was therefore only liable to the ad valorem duty of 6d. per cent. under the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant," in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891.

The commissioners appealed, and the company gave notice by way of cross-appeal.

By section 86, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891, it is enacted as follows: "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'mortgage' means a security by way of mortgage for the payment of any definite and certain sum of money advanced or lent at the time, or previously due and owing, or forborne to be paid, being payable, or for the repayment of money to be thereafter lent, advanced, or paid, or which may become due upon an account current, together with any sum already advanced or due, or without, as the case may be; and includes . . . (c) any conveyance of any lands, estate, or property whatsoever in trust to be sold or otherwise converted into money, intended only as a security, and redeemable before the sale or other disposal thereof, either by express stipulation or otherwise, except where the conveyance is made for the benefit of creditors generally or for the benefit of creditors specified who accept the provision made for payment of their debts, in full satisfaction thereof, or who exceed five in number."

By section 87, sub-section 3, "A transfer of a duly stamped security, and a security by way of further charge for money or stock added to money or stock previously secured by a duly stamped instrument, is not to be charged with any duty by reason of its containing any further or additional security for the money or stock transferred or previously secured, or the interest or dividends thereof, or any new covenant, proviso, power, stipulation, or agreement in relation thereto, or any further assurance of the property comprised in the transferred or previous security."

By section 88, sub-section 1, "A security for the payment or repayment of money to be lent, advanced, or paid, or which may become due upon an account current, either with or without money previously due, is to be charged, where the total amount secured or to be ultimately recoverable is in any way limited, with the same duty as a security for the amount so limited."

By the first schedule to the Act a mortgage, bond, debenture, or covenant, where it is "the only or principal or primary security (other than an equitable mortgage) for the payment or repayment of money," is chargeable with ad valorem duty at the rate of 2s. 6d. per cent.; where it is "a collateral, or auxiliary, or additional, or substituted security (other than an equitable mortgage), or by way of further assurance for the above-mentioned purpose where the principal or primary security is duly stamped," it is chargeable with ad valorem duty at the rate of 6d. per cent.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and M. M. Macnaghten, for the City of London Brewery Co.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The two questions which appear to me to arise in this case are, first, whether a deed bearing date the 6th of May, 1897, is "a security by way of mortgage for the repayment of money to be thereafter paid," within the meaning of section 86, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891, and is thus liable under the first schedule of that Act to a stamp duty of 2s. 6d. for every £100 of the amount secured; and, secondly, whether, if it be such a security, it falls within any of the provisions of that Act so as to be exempt from such liability.

By a deed dated the 20th of February, 1892, the respondents, the City of London Brewery Co. (Limited), conveyed by way of mortgage to trustees for debenture stockholders in that company all its freeholds and leaseholds, in trust to secure to such stockholders the amount of not exceeding £500,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent., and by this deed it was provided that the company might give to these stockholders six months' notice expiring at any time after the 1st of January, 1913, to redeem the stock held by them at the price of £108 for every £100. In the year 1897 the company was desirous of issuing a further amount of debenture stock which should carry 3½ per cent. interest, and upon the 6th of May, 1897, the indenture which is the subject-matter of this case was executed between the company and trustees on behalf of stockholders. The trustees under this deed are the same persons as under the deed of 1892; but this seems to me to be an accidental circumstance, and not material to this case. By the deed of 1897, after reciting that the £500,000 debenture stock of the company constituted and secured by the trust deed of 1892 was then outstanding, and that the company had determined to issue further debenture stock to be called irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock ranking after the former debenture stock, it was witnessed that the company thereby acknowledged that it was indebted to the then trustees in the sum of £300,000 carrying interest at the rate of 3½ per cent.; that the stockholders were to be regarded as the beneficial holders of their respective shares of this stock; that, as and when the stock or any part thereof ought to be paid off, the company would pay the same to the stockholders at par; that in the first instance the issue of this 3½ per cent. irredeemable stock should be limited to the amount of £300,000, but that a further issue of the stock, not exceeding £540,000, making, with the £300,000, £840,000, might take place; that such further issue of £540,000 stock should only be used for the purpose of redeeming or paying off the £500,000 4 per cent. stock; and that this further issue of £540,000 was only to take place when the company was in a position to pay off or redeem a corresponding amount of the 4 per cent. debenture stock. This deed of 1897 also provided for the transfer of the 4 per cent. debenture stock to be redeemed and paid off, and the securities for the same, to the trustees of the deed of 1897, and that, before any of this £540,000 debenture stock was issued by the company, they should acknowledge to the trustees their indebtedness for the amount of the proposed issue in the same manner as by the deed provided as regards the issue of the £300,000. It is also provided by the deed that the security thereby constituted should become enforceable on the happening of five different events, which are particularly set forth in the deed, and by it the freeholds and leaseholds of the company are conveyed to the trustees, and a floating charge is also given by the company in favour of the trustees for the stockholders on the general assets of the company; and it is provided that, when "all the stock entitled to the benefit of the trusts herein contained and for the time being issued has been paid off or satisfied, and upon payment of all costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the trustees or trustee in relation to these presents, the trustees or trustee shall, at the request of the company, reconvey or reassign to the company, subject to the security (if any then subsisting) of the holders of the 4 per cent. debenture stock, or their trustees or trustee, the mortgaged premises, or such parts thereof as may remain vested in the trustees or trustee hereof, freed and discharged from the trusts herein contained, or otherwise release the mortgaged premises from this security."

These being the material facts, it is first argued by the company that this deed of 1897 is not a security by way of mortgage for the repayment of money to be thereafter paid. It is a security by way of mortgage; for, although the £840,000 is called irredeemable 3½ per cent. debenture stock, the properties of the company conveyed by the deed to the trustees to secure the same are redeemable upon the happening of the named events. The deed, therefore, contains a clause enabling the company in certain events to redeem, which imports a mortgage. It is clearly not an absolute assignment by the company. Then, is it a security "for the repayment of money to be thereafter paid"? It is a deed to secure the repayment to the holders of the 3½ per cent. stock of moneys paid by them, which repayment by the company is secured to them by means of the machinery of trustees. In my opinion, this deed is what it describes itself as being—namely, a mortgage deed, and comes within the provisions of section 86 of the Stamp Act, 1891. There is, I think, no need for the Crown to resort to sub-section (c) of section 86, though I think that sub-section would have availed, if it had become necessary to rely upon it. I agree with what Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown pointed out—namely, that, if the deed of 1897 is a mortgage within the Act as regards the £300,000, then section 88, sub-section 1, also imposes the duty upon the £540,000, the difference between the £300,000 and the £840,000.

I now come to the second branch of this case, which is whether upon the facts relating to this mortgage deed of the 6th of May, 1897, it is exempt from the 2s. 6d. stamp duty per £100 upon the £840,000, and is liable either to no duty or at the most to a duty of 6d. per £100 upon the £840,000.

There are many points made as to this on behalf of the company.

First, it is said that the deed of the 6th of May, 1897, is not "the only, or principal, or primary security for the payment or repayment of money" (see Schedule I. under heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" of the Act of 1891), and therefore is not liable to a duty of 2s. 6d. for every £100 secured thereby.

Now, what is the security the stockholders take as regards this issue of the 3½ per cent. stock? It is argued for the company that, inasmuch as by the deed of 1897 the security of the deed of 1892 is kept alive and transferred to the trustees of the 1897 deed, and it is so kept alive and transferred to the trustees to protect the stockholders under the deed of 1897 against any mesne incumbrances which might have been created upon the property of the company between 1892 and 1897, that the deed of 1897 is not the "only, or principal, or primary security for the payment or repayment of money." What security would the stockholders of the 3½ per cent. stock have as regards that issue were it not for the deed of 1897? Were it not for this deed, the stockholders of 1897 would have nothing to do with the deed of 1892, which demonstrates that the deed of 1897 is the only, or principal, or primary security for this 3½ per cent. stock; and this point therefore fails the company.

I come to the next point, which is that the deed of 1897 is an "additional security," so far as £500,000 of the £840,000 is concerned, and that, therefore, under clause 2 of Schedule I. of the Act under the heading "Mortgage" this £500,000 is only liable to a duty of 6d. for every £100 of this £500,000. It must be remembered that the stockholders of the 4 per cent. stock provided for by the deed of 1892 are under no obligation whatever to take the 3½ per cent. stock provided for by the deed of 1897. They need take none of it. They might, if they pleased, continue as they were under the deed of 1892. The issue of the 3½ per cent. stock and the security given for it by the deed of 1897 was a new matter, though the property of the company with some addition is again pledged as security for this stock, subject to the rights, if any, of the 4 per cent. stockholders thereto. This 3½ per cent. stock might be sold to the public upon the open market; as to this fact my brother Grantham was under a misconception. The only connection, if it can be called a connection, which the 3½ per cent. issue has with the 4 per cent. issue is that the 3½ per cent. stock could not be issued unless and until the company had put itself in a position to pay off a corresponding amount of the 4 per cent. stock. How is this deed of 1897 an additional security to the stockholders of the 4 per cent. stock, or, indeed, to anyone else? To the 3½ per cent. stockholders it is their only security. It seems to me that whatever security the 4 per cent. stockholders had under the deed of 1892 remains as it was before, and they take no rights under the deed of 1897, unless they enter into the new adventure and take the new stock by reason of a new bargain, and that no additional security is given to the 4 per cent. stockholders by the deed of 1897. The giving the holders of the 4 per cent. stock the opportunity of obtaining a new stock carrying 3½ per cent. by a new bargain is not giving them an additional security for their 4 per cent. stock, nor is the giving them the possibility of being paid off their 4 per cent. stock earlier than it otherwise might have been, an additional security within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891. Nor is the deed of 1897 a substituted security. It is not a security substituted for the security for the 4 per cent. stock. It is a security given for a new stock which an old stockholder may take or not as he likes. If he does so, he has then only the security of the 1897 deed to rely on.

For the reasons above, I am also of opinion that the deed of 1897 is not a "transfer" of the deed of 1892, nor is it a security by way of further charge, and it does not therefore come within the meaning of section 87, sub-section 3, of the Stamp Act; and this point of the company is also untenable.

I have now covered all the points raised in argument by the company, and answer the questions put to us thus: that the instrument is chargeable with the duty of £1,050 in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners, and I am of opinion that the Crown succeeds, and that this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment: The trust deed of 1897 is a security for a perpetual annual payment to the registered irredeemable debenture stockholders of an annual sum calculated at the rate of £3 10s. for every £100 of the debenture stock held by them respectively. If the annual payments are regularly made, and the company continues to carry on business, a state of things which may continue for an unlimited period of time, no other sum whatever will become due, but the position of stockholders will be analogous to that of holders of consols who are only entitled to a perpetual annuity redeemable in certain circumstances. The deed, however, provides a machinery by which the stockholders in certain events may become entitled to be paid in satisfaction of their stock either the nominal par value of the stock, or in the case of a winding-up of the company its market value for the time being. By clause 5 of the deed the company covenants, as and when the stock or any part thereof ought to be paid off, to pay the stockholders or those whose stock ought to be paid off, the full nominal amount of the stock held by them respectively, with such premiums, if any, as shall be payable in respect thereof. The nominal par value may be, and probably will be, a different thing from the price at which the stock is issued, and the market value at the time of winding up may be altogether different both from the nominal par value and the issue price. In calculating the sum to be paid in satisfaction of the stock, the issue price, which is the only sum passing from a subscriber to the company, is not treated as a factor. I not see how it is possible to treat this as in any sense a transaction of borrowing and lending. It is one of sale and purchase of an annual sum with a superadded right on the part of the purchaser to have, in certain defined events, a lump sum, to be ascertained according to the events, paid to him in lieu of further annual payments. If the subject-matter had been property of any other description than stock having a nominal value in the books of the company, it never could have been doubted that this was the nature of the bargain, and the fixing of a nominal value to the property dealt with seems to me in no way to affect the substance of the transaction. If for the support of the claim of the commissioners it had been necessary to bring the deed within the special definition of "mortgage" contained in the Stamp Act, 1891, I should have felt great difficulty. Turning to the definition in section 86 of the Act, and dealing first with the introductory words explaining the meaning of the word "mortgage" for the purposes of the Act, it may, I think, be assumed that the security is a security by way of mortgage; but it clearly is not for the payment of a definite and certain sum, advanced or lent at the time, or previously due and owing, or forborne to be paid, being payable. I think it equally clear that it is not a security for the repayment of money to become due on an account current. It is, indeed, money to become due, but it is to become due by virtue of the express covenant to that effect contained in the trust deed, coupled with the payment of the issue price. The only remaining words of the introductory part of the section are, "the repayment of money to be thereafter lent, advanced, or paid," and, if the case cannot be brought within these words, I do not see how the security can be a mortgage within the meaning of the Act. Now, the price paid for the stock cannot in any usual or ordinary sense of the term be said to be "advanced" any more than the price paid to a tradesman for goods bought in his shop can be said to be advanced to him. It is, of course, paid, but it is paid out and out, without thought on either side of repayment, though something more or less approximating to it in average circumstances is to become due from the company. I have, therefore, great difficulty in bringing the case within the introductory words of the section defining the term "mortgage."

It was argued on the part of the Crown that the deed falls within the description of sub-section (c) of section 86, and I am of opinion that it does, but it seems to me that this will not suffice to make the deed a "mortgage" within the Act. Sub-sections (a) to (g) are not to be taken as though they were parallel clauses extending the introductory words defining the meaning of "mortgage" and adding cases not included within them. They only add by way of greater precaution and to avoid misapprehension an extensive, though possibly not exhaustive, list of the various sorts of instruments which, if they answer the requirements of the introductory words, will be "mortgages" within the meaning of the Act. To treat them as operating independently of the introductory words would be altogether to deprive of effect in most, if not all, cases the very words which are inserted to give the meaning of "mortgage." If it were necessary to decide the point, I should be strongly inclined to be of opinion that the trust deed of 1897 is not a mortgage within the meaning of the Act.

It is, however, a security containing (clause 5) a covenant by the company to pay in the events specified the lump sum payable to the respective stockholders, and I consider that the name "debenture" is properly attributable to it: see Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co., 36 W. R. 411, 37 Ch. D. 260, and cases therein referred to. The stamp duty payable upon it as a debenture is 2s. 6d. in the £100 on the amount with which it is to be charged with duty, and this has to be determined by section 88 of the Act. The security is a security for the payment by the company under clause 5 of money to be paid by them, and the total amount secured or to be ultimately recoverable extends and is in every case, except that of the company being wound up when the market value of the stock is above par, limited to the sum of £840,000. It is therefore available as a security for the whole of that sum, and it is with duty on that sum that the deed is to be charged at the rate of 2s. 6d. per £100. The duty so reckoned is £1,050, the sum assessed by the commissioners.

I agree with all that A. L. Smith, L.J., has said as to the question of this being a collateral, or auxiliary, or additional or substituted security within the meaning of the schedule. The only security taken by the stockholders is under the trust deed of 1897, although by that deed provision is made for keeping alive the security in favour of paid-off 4 per cent. stockholders under the deed of 1892. This last-mentioned security would have disappeared altogether but for the provisions of the deed of 1897, and, to the extent to which it operates when kept alive, is as much part of the security of 1897 as any part of the security created for the first time by that deed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I agree. I am of opinion that this deed certainly comes within one or other of the provisions of the sections.

Appeal allowed and cross-appeal dismissed.

WALL v. LONDON AND NORTHERN ASSETS CORPORATION. (a.)

Company—"Amalgamation" with other company—Sale of assets—Legality of consideration—Meeting—Closure—Refusal to put amendment.

A clause in a company's memorandum of association empowering the company to "amalgamate" with other companies, authorizes a sale to another company, for shares in the purchasing company, of all the selling company's assets, except certain shares already held by it in the purchasing company.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The majority of a general meeting of a company is entitled, after allowing a reasonable hearing to the minority, to pass a resolution closing the debate.

When a general meeting is called for the single purpose of confirming or rejecting a particular resolution, an amendment altering the terms of the resolution is irrelevant, and ought not to be put by the chairman.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

The London and Northern Assets Corporation (the defendant company) was established for the purposes of raising money by share capital and acquiring and holding bonds, stocks, obligations, and securities, and generally carrying on a financial business. The particular purposes stated by the memorandum of association were as follows: "To sell, lease, convert into money, barter, or otherwise dispose of any portion of the assets, estate, and effects of the company, and for such purposes to carry on, work, or develop any property or business of any kind in which the company may be interested, or to concur with others in so doing, or employ others so to do, as may be found expedient, and in consideration or part consideration for any dealing with the property of the company under this clause to accept either cash or shares, debenture stock, mortgage debentures, debentures, or other security of any company, partnership, or person with whom this company may have dealings, and to divide any assets of the company among its members in specie" (clause 3 (i)); "To amalgamate with any persons, companies, or firms carrying on business of a like or similar nature, or to acquire any such business or an interest therein either by purchase or otherwise, and to accept payment as may be found expedient" (clause 3 (o)).

The capital of the defendant company consisted of 100 founder's shares and 50,204 ordinary shares of £2 each, £1 10s. paid. The founder's shares conferred certain advantages as to interest over the ordinary shares, but not as to capital.

Another company, the London and Northern Debenture Corporation, was carrying on a business similar to that of the defendant company, and for some time the two companies had been acting by one board of directors.

In February, 1898, the directors of the defendant company entered into an agreement for the sale to the debenture corporation of all the defendant company's assets except 3,315 ordinary shares and ten founder's shares in the purchasing company; the consideration for the sale being the issue to the shareholders of the company of 59,736 fully-paid shares of £1 in the debenture corporation, and £1,255 either in cash or in shares of the debenture corporation. Each holder of a founder's share in the defendant company was to get more than the holder of an ordinary share. The defendant company was at once to go into voluntary liquidation. The whole agreement was made conditional on the approval thereof before the 15th of March, 1898, by resolutions duly passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings, of the two companies respectively.

On the 22nd of February, 1898, a meeting of the defendant company was held, and a resolution approving the contract and authorizing the directors to carry it into effect was proposed. At the adjourned meeting, on the 22nd of March, a resolution that the debate should forthwith close was carried, and the original resolution was then put and carried. At a meeting held on the 6th of April to confirm the resolution the plaintiff sought to move an amendment, of which he had given the chairman notice, to add these words to the resolution: "Subject to the purchasers agreeing to allow any individual or any body of dissentient shareholders to have their share of the assets agreed to be sold, in lieu of the London and Northern Debenture Corporation shares due to them." This amendment the chairman declared out of order, and refused to put. On a show of hands the resolution was carried, and on a poll being demanded, the majority for the resolution was 25,593 to 10,866.

The plaintiff, who was the holder of three founder's shares and 1,800 ordinary shares in the defendant company, and of one founder's share and four ordinary shares in the debenture corporation, then, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders except those who had voted for the resolutions, commenced an action against the defendant company and its directors, claiming a declaration that the resolutions and the agreement for sale were void. The plaintiff moved for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from acting on the resolution passed and confirmed on the 22nd of March and the 6th of April, 1898. The defendant company gave an undertaking not to distribute any shares they should receive under the agreement otherwise than in accordance with the rights of the shareholders of the defendant company, and Stirling, J., made no order on the motion.

The plaintiff appealed.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the appeal, contended that the agreement was ultra vires and the meetings irregular.

LINDLEY, M.R.: I think that in this case the decision of Stirling, J., is quite correct, and that the portion of it which relates to the distribution of shares need not be disturbed. If there is any fault to find with Stirling, J.'s, judgment, it is that he has too much minimised the effect of sub-clause (i) of clause 3 of the company's memorandum of association.

The London and Northern Assets Corporation had nothing in the shape of an undertaking to work; it had not a railway, or a tramway, or a canal, or a factory, or anything of the sort. It was a financial company, its object being to speculate in shares and other securities; and its assets consisted of various investments which appear on the balance sheet, and to which Mr. Cozens-Hardy called our attention. [His lordship read clause 3 (i) of the memorandum, and proceeded:] The assets at the time in question consisted, amongst other things, of certain investments, and amongst the investments were 3,315 ordinary shares and ten founder's shares in the London and Northern Debenture Corporation. The London and Northern Assets Corporation entered into an agreement with the London and Northern Debenture Corporation, and the agreement they made was this: to sell all their assets, minus those shares, to the debenture corporation. Now, suppose the assets corporation had been selling its assets to another company in which it held no shares, I cannot conceive why such a sale should not have been within the powers conferred by clause 3 (i). The only way of making out that it is in any way improper, is to say that the exception from it is a mere trumpery exception beneath notice; but I am not prepared to hold that the exception of over 3,000 fully-paid shares is to be so treated. If, then, that is the right view, what has been done appears to me distinctly to come within the clause I have referred to. But I am not prepared to say that it does not also come within clause 3 (o), the valuation clause. [His lordship read that clause, and proceeded:] There is no very precise meaning to be given to the word "amalgamate" when you talk about amalgamating a company with companies, persons, or firms. I do not doubt that "amalgamation" includes the case put by Lord Hatherley in Higgs' case, and by Lord Davey in New Zealand Gold Extraction Co. v. Peacock. I have no doubt that it includes an arrangement involving the formation of a new company for carrying on the businesses of the two which amalgamate. But, while I have no doubt that it includes that case, I do not think it is confined to that. How a company can amalgamate with companies, persons, or firms is not quite clear, unless it does, in some form or other, sell its assets to them or to a new company, not for money—that would not be amalgamation—but for shares in the purchasing company. Therefore, if you want a still larger power of transferring assets than clause (i) gives, I think you get it under clause (o). It appears to me, therefore, that on this point the real foundation of the argument for the appellant fails, and that what has been done is not ultra vires of the company.

Another point was made by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, who argued the case with his usual ability—viz., that the consideration for the purchase is illegal. The consideration was this: Clause 1 of the agreement says that the vendor shall sell and the purchaser shall purchase all the assets except the 3,315 ordinary shares and the ten founder's shares, and the consideration for that shall be the sum of £60,991, which shall be satisfied as to £59,736 by the allotment to the vendor or his nominees of 29,868 fully-paid ordinary shares of £2 each in the purchasing company (or, if the capital has been sub-divided, an equivalent amount in ordinary shares), and the balance of £1,255 in cash or fully-paid ordinary shares, at the option of the vendor or his nominees. There is nothing at all there which is illegal. The agreement goes on in this way. In the distribution between the members of the assets corporation of those shares and of the shares of the purchaser retained by the selling company, each holder of a founder's share shall receive six and a-half shares of £2 each, or thirteen shares of £1 each, in respect of each founder's share, and the residue of the shares and cash shall be divided among the holders of ordinary shares in proportion to the number of shares they hold. It is said that that distribution, of what I will call the purchase-money, is inconsistent with the memorandum of association of the assets corporation. I do not know whether it is inconsistent or not, and Stirling, J., has not said whether it is or not, but has reserved that point to be disposed of at the trial. Taking the view I do, that the transaction is not tainted with illegality, I think, on the authority of Griffith v. Paget, that the learned judge was perfectly justified in saying that at anyrate it did not affect the validity of the agreement. I am not prepared to say whether or not the proposed distribution can be carried out. It may be, as is contended, that you must put back the founder's shares. But that does not concern the vendor as vendor. At anyrate it does not taint the agreement with illegality. Therefore, as to that part of the case also, I think Stirling, J., has done all that is necessary. He has said, as it were, that the distribution to the holders of founder's shares should not be proceeded with at present; and after the explanation given by Mr. Jenkins I see no necessity for altering even the terms of the judgment. That disposes of the substance of the case.

Then Mr. Hardy urged various other points of irregularity at the meetings which I shall dispose of very shortly, because I do not think they are matters with which this court has anything to do. The only new point is this one about the closure. It appears that there was a discussion at the meeting, and that, having heard the views, I do not say of all who opposed, but of one or two of them, the majority came to the conclusion that they had heard enough, and need not hear more, and the chairman then applied the closure. It is said that that calls for the interference of this court. I do not think it does at all. I think it would be a very bad precedent if we were to say that we should interfere in such a case as this. I am quite aware that an important distinction is made by Lord Eldon in Const v. Harris, Turn. & R. 496, at p. 525, in which he said: "I call that the act of all which is the act of the majority, provided all are consulted, and the majority are acting bonâ fide—meeting not for the purpose of negativing what anyone may have to offer, but for the purpose of negativing what, when they are met together, they may on due consideration think proper to negative. For a majority of partners to say, 'We do not care what a partner may say; we, being the majority, will do what we please,' is, I apprehend, what this court will not allow." I think that principle is as important now—perhaps more important now than it was sixty or seventy years ago. But that does not mean that a minority who are bent on obstructing business by talking for ever are not to be put down. The majority must not be tyrannical, but here there is no reason for supposing that there was anything tyrannical in the conduct of the majority. The appeal must be dismissed with costs in the usual way.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think also that the agreement may be supported under clause (i). The company had nothing which in ordinary language would be called an undertaking. It had not a mine or even a business. It had not, as far as I can see, any goodwill whatever. But the nature of its operations is shown by the earlier words describing the objects of the company, and by the balance-sheet which has been referred to, and which, in point of fact, shows how this company has been worked. Those operations were buying and then selling again bonds, stocks, obligations, and securities. No doubt the object was to make a profit in that way. Clause (i) enables them to sell any portion of their assets, estate, and effects. They had no undertaking to sell; and what they have sold is a portion of the assets, estate, and effects. The exception from that sale is not made merely for the purpose of saying that there is an exception—it is a substantial one; and it is of no avail to say that it includes only that which could not have been sold to the purchasing company. With regard to the "amalgamation," I agree that the term has no fixed meaning in point of law. You have to look to see how the term is used in the particular document you are construing. I referred during the argument to Palmer's Company Precedents, not as an authority, but for the purpose of seeing how a gentleman well versed in the ordinary business of forming and amalgamating companies, and dealing with the matter from the lawyer's point of view, treats the subject. I find that among the various kinds of amalgamation he speaks of he gives precedents, as for an amalgamation, of that which is really a sale and transfer. In the present case there is a sale of the assets of the company, with the exception I have mentioned, and, I think, an amalgamation in this sense, that the purchasing company gives its own shares to the company which was selling. That seems to me to be in the ordinary and the reasonable sense an amalgamation. In strictness I do not see how you can amalgamate two corporations having a separate existence. You cannot do it. It has been suggested by Mr. Cozens-Hardy that the right way is to form a third company. I agree so far; but that is not an amalgamation. That is the two companies transferring their business to a new entity; and then the original companies vanish out of existence. The term cannot be, in any strict scientific sense, explained. In this particular memorandum (clause 3 (o)) there is power of amalgamation, not with companies, but "with any persons." Now, how can a company amalgamate with a person, in any reasonable sense of the term "amalgamate," unless you put upon it a wider meaning than Mr. Cozens-Hardy is willing to do? I think it is unnecessary to pursue that matter farther. I quite agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, and with Stirling, J.'s, judgment, that, having regard to clause (o)—and I do not reject clause (i)—this transaction is within the authority or power conferred by the memorandum.

Then as to the point turning upon the consideration. The consideration to be paid by the purchasing company consists of the shares and moneys and debentures mentioned in the agreement. In that clause there occurs the statement of how the consideration is to be distributed among the members of the selling company. In my opinion there was irregularity in putting in that clause. It forms no part of the bargain between the two companies, and I think that is a clause in which the purchasing company has no interest; it concerns only the selling company and its shareholders. Stirling, J., has reserved, and we propose to reserve, the question how far that clause can be given effect to. We cannot treat this as the trial, and therefore we cannot decide that question now. It may be that the vendor company will think fit to wind itself up. The undertaking given by the defendants in the court below, though it differs in form from that given in Griffith v. Paget, is substantially enough for the purpose.

As to the irregularities which Mr. Cozens-Hardy put to us very strongly, it appears to me that this court ought not to interfere in the internal affairs of this company upon any such grounds as these. As to the closure, if we laid it down that the chairman, supported by the majority, could not put a termination to the speeches of those who were desirous of addressing the meeting, I think we should be allowing a small minority, of even one or two members, to tyrannize over the majority. The case is put by Mr. Cozens-Hardy as the tyranny of a majority; but if we accepted the propositions he advanced we should be putting this weapon into the hands of the minority, that at these ordinary meetings, to which all shareholders may come, any one might delay business indefinitely, even after the mind of the meeting was really made up. That appears to me a perfectly extravagant result. In this particular case there appears to have been nothing arbitrary and nothing vexatious in the conduct of the majority. I am not saying, of course, that the majority must not listen for a reasonable time to reasonable arguments which are brought forward.

There is only one other point. Mr. Cozens-Hardy said that it was wrong of the chairman, at the meeting held for the confirmation of the original resolution, to refuse to put the amendment which the plaintiff then moved. I think he was quite right to refuse, because the meeting was called for one purpose only, to confirm or reject the original resolution, and any amendment moved upon such an occasion would, if objected to, be wholly irrelevant; the single purpose of that meeting being to say, Aye or No, is the original resolution to stand?

JORDESON v. SUTTON, SOUTHCOATES, AND DRYPOOL GAS CO. (a.)

Nuisance—Injunction—Gas company—Statutory powers—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15) s. 29—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41) s. 9.

A gas company was authorised by its Special Acts (which incorporated the Gasworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1871), to purchase certain land and to erect gasholders thereon; these Acts contained no provision for compensation to persons injuriously affected thereby.

Held, that the Gas Co. was not thereby entitled to erect works in such a way as to interfere with the rights of the owner of the adjoining land to light and support.

Action.

In excavating in order to erect a gasholder on the gas company's land a subsidence in the plaintiff's adjoining land and houses was caused, and the gasholder when erected to its full height would block the plaintiff's ancient lights.

The defendant gas company was, in 1867, by a special Act, registered and incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1846 and 1856, and the Companies Act, 1862. The Gas Works Clauses Act, 1847, was incorporated with these Acts.

By another special Act of the defendant company passed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. lxxv.), which by s. 3 incorporated the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1871, the company was authorized (section 4) to purchase the land where the gasholder was situate, and by section 6 it was empowered to erect, maintain, and from time to time alter and enlarge retorts, gasholders, receivers, etc.

Both the gas company and the contractors employed by the gas company were made defendants to the action; and the plaintiff claimed damages as against both defendants for the injury done to his land and buildings by subsidence; and as against the defendant gas company an injunction to restrain the company erecting a gasholder to such a height as to obstruct the plaintiff's ancient lights.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Dighton Pollock, for the plaintiff.—The main defence is that the defendant company had a statutory power, and a statutory duty to exercise that power, but there was no obligation to place the gasholder in the particular site selected by the company.

Rawlins, Q.C., and Bardswell, for the contractors.

Upjohn replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 4.—NORTH, J.—It was said first of all on behalf of the defendants that the construction of the tank and the erection of the gasholder are acts to do which the gas company has statutory powers with a statutory duty to exercise those powers, and that such powers cannot be released and no easement can be acquired in derogation of them. A number of railway cases were cited in support of this; but as Lord Halsbury points out in London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. v. Truman, the railway Acts are carefully distinguished from permissive legislation such as that authorizing the erection of a hospital. A railway may be made whether it is a nuisance or not, but not so a hospital, which can only be built and maintained if no nuisance will be thereby created.

If the defendants are right the plaintiff can get no compensation. [His lordship referred to Hammersmith and City Railway Co. v. Brand and the remarks of Bowen, L.J., in London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Evans, [1893] 1 Ch. 16, p. 28, and of Lord Herschell in Bradford Corporation v. Pickles, [1895] 1 Ch. 145 at p. 152; and to Normanton Gas Co. v. Pope; and Consett Waterworks Co. v. Bilson, 43 W. R. 122.]

Another argument strongly pressed by Mr. Haldane was that the gas company owed a duty to the public, and that the preambles of its Acts show that the powers given to it are for the public benefit. Private and individual interests should therefore, it is argued, give way. The above-mentioned observations of Bowen, L.J., and Lord Herschell answer this, as do those of Lord Cranworth and Lord Campbell in Broadbent v. Imperial Gas Co., 5 W. R. 272, 7 De. G. M. & G. 436 at p. 462, 7 H. L. Cas. 600 at p. 610, 8 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4. But there is a conclusive answer to the argument that the Acts confer a right and duty to perform these acts upon this particular site. The Act nowhere requires anything to be done which must necessarily injure the plaintiff. If the gasholder had been smaller and further from the plaintiff's land, it might not interfere with his right to light or support, and the gas company has not shown that it cannot carry out its duties without interfering with the plaintiff. The rights and powers conferred on the gas company, however, are strictly qualified, as is shown by section 29 of the Act of 1847, and section 9 of the Act of 1871. The interference with the plaintiff's land, in my opinion, amounts to a nuisance.

A further point was that no prescriptive right could be gained against the gas company, and Staffordshire and Worcestershire Canal Proprietors v. Birmingham Canal Proprietors, L. R. 1 H. L. 254, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 22; Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623, 32 W. R. Dig. 112; and Mulliner v. Midland Railway Co., 27 W. R. 330, 11 Ch. D. 611, were relied upon. But in the present case the houses had been standing more than thirty years when the gas works in question began to be erected, and, primâ facie, had gained by prescription a right to support founded upon an implied grant. The right to light depends upon section 3 of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71 (which creates an absolute right to access of light after an actual enjoyment of twenty years), and as Lord Westbury pointed out in Tapling v. Jones, 13 W. R. 617, 11 H. L. Cas. 290, such right does not rest on any presumption of grant or fiction of licence.

Then, as to the contractors. I fail to follow the argument that there can be no negligence unless there is a neglect of duty; and they owed no duty to the plaintiff. They excavated on the company's land, and the result of this excavation was wrongfully to remove part of the plaintiff's soil and to cause the land above to subside and damage his buildings.

As to the relief, I must grant an injunction to restrain the erection of a gasholder by the defendant gas company exceeding 68 feet in height—the evidence showing that the erection of a gasholder to the height of 68 feet would not materially affect the lights of the plaintiff; and as the trench is finished and no further subsidence has taken place, £340 damages in respect thereof, against all the defendants.

Further consideration and two summonses.

The above-named testator by his will dated in 1885 gave to each of his sons George Thomas Smith and Henry Doggett Smith and to each of his daughters Alice Florence Smith and Ada Maude Smith the sum of £100; and he gave to the said Henry Doggett Smith "my freehold house and garden with the meadow thereto adjoining situate at Harrow . . . freed and discharged from any mortgage there may be thereon at the time of my death"; and he devised unto and to the use of certain persons, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, thereinafter called his trustees, two leasehold houses in the City of London and also his leasehold house in Nichol-square, and also his freehold house at Haggerston freed and discharged from "any mortgage there may be on the said houses at the time of my death" upon trust for his daughter Annie L. Jones, her husband and children, appointees, and next-of-kin as therein mentioned; and gave to his trustees his leasehold houses, No. 61, Cheapside, and another house in the City of London (but free from any incumbrances that there might be thereon at the time of his death), upon trust for his daughters Alice F. Smith and Ada M. Smith, their husbands and children, appointees, and next-of-kin as therein mentioned. And the testator then declared as follows: "If I shall sell any of the said houses hereinbefore given to my trustees upon trust for my daughters, then my executors and trustees shall out of my residuary estate stand possessed of a sum equivalent to the price I may have sold such house for and on similar trusts to those declared concerning any such house as may have been sold." Then the testator by his will gave to his trustees "all other my real and personal estate . . . upon trust to pay to each of my sons George Thomas Smith and Henry Doggett Smith an annual sum of £250 . . . and out of the balance of the income of my said residuary estate to pay off the incumbrances upon my said estate, and upon trust as soon as all the incumbrances upon my estate shall have been paid off to assign my said residuary estate to my said sons G. T. Smith and H. D. Smith equally."

And by a codicil dated in 1887, after reciting the said gift of residue upon trust to pay the said annuities of £250 each, and out of the balance to pay off the incumbrances upon the testator's estate, and as soon as the incumbrances upon his estate had been paid off to assign his residuary estate to his said sons equally, the testator varied the said trust of the said G. T. Smith's annuity and share in particulars not material for this report.

The testator in his lifetime sold the said house, No. 61, Cheapside, given to his trustees in trust for his said daughters Alice Florence and Ada Maude as aforesaid, for the sum of £9,800.

The testator's estate proving insufficient for payment in full of the legacies bequeathed by his said will, questions arose as to the order of payment of the beneficiaries thereunder.

The pecuniary legacies given by the testator, other than annuities, with certain interest thereon, remained due, and it will be seen that the sums involved in the questions of priority, which now came up for decision, were the following — namely, (1) the pecuniary legacies; (2) the £9,800, proceeds of the house sold; (3) the mortgage debts; (4) the annuities.

Mulligan, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the plaintiffs, George Thomas Smith and others in same interest.—The testator merely excludes the application of Locke-King's Act, and the prior law, as settled since Lutkins v. Leigh, Cas. temp. Talb. 52, and Hamilton v. Worley, 2 Ves. jun. 62, consequently applies. Annuities are payable before incumbrances on real estate specifically devised, as against the specific devisees. The legacies have priority here, and the annuities come before the £9,800.

Levett, Q.C., and Rowden, for parties interested in the proceeds of house sold.—The £9,800 must be treated as a pecuniary legacy.

Neville, Q.C., and Church, for the defendant Mrs. Jones.—The point has nothing to do with Locke-King's Act. Smith v. Smith, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 89, on appeal 461, governs this case.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ball, for the defendant H. D. Smith.—The cases are given in White & Tudor's L. C., 7th ed., p. 33. Porcher v. Wilson, 14 W. R. 1011, governs this case.

They also cited Burley v. Armstrong, 12 Ir. Ch. Rep. 270.

Levett, Q.C., referred to Johnson v. Child, 4 Hare 87, p. 94, and argued that the Irish cases were wrong.

Mulligan, Q.C., cited Wythe v. Henniker, 2 My. & K. 635; Buckley v. Buckley, 19 L. R. Ir. 544, p. 565, 36 W. R. Dig. 4; and Greville v. Browne, 7 W. R. 673, 7 H. L. Cas. 689, p. 696.

Whinney, for another defendant.

ROMER, J.—The first question I will deal with concerns the four pecuniary legacies given at the beginning of the will. Greville v. Browne finally decided that where legacies are given generally, and there is a gift of the residue of the real and personal estate, the legacies are charged upon the entire residue. In the will before me the residuary devise takes the form of a gift of all other the testator's real and personal estate. In other cases, however, it has been held that a gift of the testator's real and personal estate not otherwise disposed of has the same effect as a gift of the residue. But, apart from these cases, in the will before me the testator has been his own interpreter, for in his codicil, after referring to his will, he says: "And whereas by my said will I have given to my trustees the residue of my real and personal estate," and then proceeds to make some alteration in the trusts. So that this case is, in my opinion, governed by Greville v. Browne, and the legacies are charged on the residue. It follows that all provisions made in the will for payments out of the residue proper are intended to be provided out of the testator's estate not specifically devised or bequeathed after satisfying the four legacies. Now, the mortgage debts on the specifically devised real estates are by the will expressly directed to be paid out of the residuary estate (see the clause immediately following the trusts of residue for the two sons). And by this direction, so far as it gave a beneficial interest in the residue to the devisees, I gather from the will the testator meant these debts to be paid out of the residuary estate proper—that is to say, the estate after satisfaction of the four legacies. Of course, the mortgagees as creditors would have a prior right to any beneficiaries to be paid, but, so far as they should exercise their rights and obtain payment out of residue, the four legacies would, on the doctrine of marshalling, with which I shall hereafter have more particularly to deal, be entitled to stand in their shoes. And the same remarks as to their being payable out of residue proper, apply to the sums which by the will have to be provided to take the place of the houses specifically devised in trust for his daughters in case the testator sold them in his lifetime. And even more strongly the remarks apply to the annual sums of £250 each directed to be paid to his two sons. In my opinion, therefore, the four legacies must be paid in priority to those mortgage debts, sums representing houses sold, and the two annual sums of £250 each.

I will next deal with the question as to the position of the two sons in respect of the two annual sums of £250. Now, nothing is said in the will expressly as to any order of payment out of the residue proper of the above-mentioned mortgage debts and sums representing houses sold. But on this will and codicil it appears to me to be assumed by the testator that these debts and sums will have been paid before anything goes to the two sons. The sons are made residuary legatees, and it appears to me that the two annual sums are only given to them in their capacity of residuary legatees, and as part of the machinery for allowing the true residue to be divided between them. After directing his trustees out of his residuary estate to pay the two annual sums, the testator proceeds to direct that "out of the balance of the income" of his residuary estate the trustees are to pay off the incumbrances on his residuary estate, and that when these incumbrances are paid off, then the residuary estate is to be divided between the two sons. Clearly the two annual sums would cease when the residue was divided, and in my judgment the two sums are only intended to be paid to them as residuary legatees. And this view is supported by the wording of the codicil, where, as regards the share of one of the two sons, the testator treats the £250 as being equivalent to the income of the residue up to the time that residue is divided. I think, therefore, the sons cannot claim to be paid anything in respect of the annual sums until the mortgage debts on the specifically devised realty, and the sums representing houses sold, are paid.

This brings me to the last question, which concerns the relative rights of the specific devisees of realty in respect of the mortgage debts and those claiming the sum equal to the price at which one of the testator's houses was sold by him in his lifetime. Now, in the first place I may say that in my opinion the last-mentioned sum is to be treated as an ordinary legacy made payable out of residue. I cannot see any sufficient reason for treating it differently merely because if the house had not been sold the devisee of it might have taken it subject to mortgages. I have therefore to consider what is the right of a devisee of real estate charged with a mortgage debt of the testator to have that debt paid off out of residue as against a pecuniary legatee. Now, after Lutkins v. Leigh, and before Locke-King's Act, it became a settled rule in equity that the pecuniary legatee had priority over the devisee, although the devisee was under the will entitled as against a residuary legatee to have the mortgage debt paid off out of residue. And if the mortgagee, by virtue and in exercise of his rights as creditor, obtained payment of his debt out of residue, it was held that on the doctrine of marshalling the legatee was entitled to stand in the shoes of the mortgage creditor as against the devised realty. It is difficult to justify this rule on principle. Seeing that the testator intended the mortgage debt to be paid off out of his residuary estate, it might have been supposed that the pecuniary legatees could not claim to be repaid by the devisee merely because the debt had been paid as contemplated out of the proper fund. Or the courts might have been expected to hold that the devisee to the extent of the mortgage debt and the pecuniary legatee to the extent of his legacy were equally objects of the testator's bounty, and that the mortgage debt and legacy should therefore abate rateably in case the residuary estate could not pay both in full. But the courts became bound by the rule above adverted to, however difficult it might be to justify it, and the time for questioning it has long since passed. See, for example, observations of Sir James Wigram when Vice-Chancellor in Johnson v. Child, 4 Hare, at p. 94, where he pointed out that he was bound by the authorities Of course a testator might by express provision in his will negative the application of the rule, but unless he did so the rule was applied. The effect of Locke-King's Act was to benefit the pecuniary legatee, and not to prejudice any rights he previously had in equity. So that if a testator by his will negatived the application of the Act without directing that the rule should not apply, then, of course, the rule had to be applied. Accordingly, in Porcher v. Wilson, where a testator provided expressly for payment of his debts out of his residuary personal estate (but without mentioning his mortgage debts), the rule was applied by Wood, V.C. In that case, as the law then stood, before the amending Act of 1877, the provision was held to negative the application of the Act, and the debts to be paid out of the residuary personal estate were held to include mortgage debts. And the decree in that case expressly provided that the mortgage debts were primarily payable out of the personal estate, but when the question of marshalling came before the court, it was declared that the devisees of the mortgaged estate were not entitled to have the mortgage satisfied out of the personal estate until the pecuniary legatees were satisfied. It seems to me impossible to distinguish the case now before me from the above authorities. All that the testator has really done by his will is to negative the application of Locke-King's Act and the amending Acts as to the mortgage debts, by expressly providing for payment of those debts out of his residuary estate. I cannot gather from the will that he has expressly or by necessary inference provided that the rule as to marshalling is not to apply, or that the mortgage debts are to be paid in priority to the pecuniary legatees, or that the devisees of the mortgaged realty are to be considered as legatees to the extent of the mortgages so as to share rateably with the pecuniary legatees in case of deficiency of the residuary estate. I ought to say a few words about the case of Smith v. Smith, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 89, 461. Speaking with all respect, I cannot follow the grounds on which that case was decided. It seems to have been decided, and especially on appeal, on the ground that the will there negatived (as it no doubt did as the law then stood) the application of Locke-King's Act. But the courts do not appear to have seen that, assuming Locke-King's Act did not apply, the question of marshalling then arose, and ought, on the authorities I have referred to, to have been decided in favour of the pecuniary legatees. That case seems to me inconsistent with the English authorities, and if it is to be supported at all must be taken as a decision on the wording of the will there in question that the testator had by necessary implication negatived the application of the rule as to marshalling. Speaking for myself, I can only say that I should not have gathered from the provisions of that will that the testator had negatived the application of the rule. It follows, summing up the results of this judgment, that the order of payment of the various sums I have been dealing with must, in my opinion, be as follows: (1) the four pecuniary legacies, (2) the sum representing the price of the house sold, (3) the mortgage debts, and (4) the annual sums given to the sons out of residue.

Appeal of the vendor, on a vendor and purchaser summons, from Kekewich, J.

By the summons, C. F. Massingberd Mundy, who was tenant for life of the Ormsby Estate, asked that trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts might be appointed of the compound settlement hereafter mentioned, and that it might be declared that a contract of sale into which he had entered relating to a part of the settled property was binding upon the jointress and portionists respectively under the said compound settlement, and that he could make a good title to the property without the concurrence of the jointress, portionists, and trustees of the respective terms.

The history of the settlement was as follows: By a settlement of the 15th of March, 1861, the Ormsby Estate was, in exercise of a power contained in a disentailing deed, appointed and conveyed to the use of C. J. H. Mundy during his life, with remainder to the use of trustees for a term of 500 years to secure to Elizabeth Susan Mundy, in case she should survive C. J. H. Mundy and M. J. Massingberd (as happened), the yearly rent-charge of £800 by way of jointure in bar of dower, with remainder to a trustee for the term of 1,000 years to secure payment of portions up to £8,000 (which were subsequently raised), and subject thereto to the use of C. F. Mundy for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male. The settlement also gave powers to C. F. Mundy to appoint to any woman whom he might thereafter marry a yearly rent-charge of £500 by way of jointure; to charge the estate with a sum of £8,000 for portions for his younger children; and to create terms of years to be vested in trustees upon the usual trusts for the purposes of securing and raising such jointure and portions respectively.

In 1863 C. J. H. Mundy assumed the surname of Massingberd Mundy.

By a settlement of the 7th of August, 1865, made upon the marriage of the said C. F. M. Mundy (formerly C. F. Mundy) with Louisa Charlotte Bigge, C. F. M. Mundy in exercise of the power reserved to him by the above-mentioned settlement, appointed an annual rent-charge of £500 by way of jointure to his said wife in case she survived him, and created a term of 300 years to commence from his death to secure the payment of said jointure; and he also charged the estate with the payment of £8,000 as portions for the younger children of the said marriage in such shares as he should by deed or will appoint, and created a term of 1,000 years to commence from his death to secure the raising of such portions.

C. J. H. M. Mundy died on the 19th of February, 1882.

By a disentailing assurance of the 28th of January, 1889, C. F. M. Mundy and C. D. M. Mundy, his eldest son, disentailed the Ormsby Estate.

By a settlement of the 30th of January, 1889, made in exercise of a general power of appointment in the last-mentioned disentailing assurance, C. F. M. Mundy and C. D. M. Mundy appointed the Ormsby Estate to the use of C. F. M. Mundy during his life with remainders over. The life estate so limited was not expressed to be in restoration or continuation of any estate in C. F. M. Mundy.

Elizabeth Susan M. Mundy died on the 1st of January, 1892.

By a deed-poll of the 16th of July, 1897, C. F. M. Mundy, in exercise of the power reserved to him in the settlement of the 7th of August, 1865, appointed the sum of £8,000 in certain proportions among his four younger children.

On the 6th of August, 1897, C. F. M. Mundy entered into the contract of sale above referred to.

On investigating the title the purchasers required the concurrence of the jointress and the younger children. The vendor then took out a summons under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, and the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for a declaration as above stated.

Kekewich, J., held that a new settlement had been created by the settlement of 1889, and that, therefore, there was not a "compound settlement," and the vendor could not sell under the Settled Land Acts free from the charges.

The vendor appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Martelli, for the appellant.—The settlements of 1861, 1865, and the two deeds of 1889 constitute one compound settlement. The decision of Stirling, J., in In re Marquis of Ailesbury and Lord Iveagh, 41 W. R. 644, [1893] 2 Ch. 345, was correct, and the tenant for life can sell this property free from the jointure of his wife and the portions of his younger children. The charges cannot come into operation until the life estate ends, and the latter is therefore not postponed to them. Mere absence of words of confirmation and restoration is not enough to negative our contention that there is here a compound settlement. The object of the Settled Land Act, 1882, was not, as the judge thought, to incorporate in a settlement usual and proper powers: Lord Macnaghten's speech in Lord Henry Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356, at p. 364.

They also referred to Hood and Challis' Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts (5th ed.), pp. 193, 225; Wolstenholme's Settled Land Acts (7th ed.), p. 289.

W. A. Peck, for the respondent.—The words at the end of the settlement of 1889 were necessary to provide for the possibility of the death of one of the parties to whom the power was given. In order to make a compound settlement available, the tenancy for life must be created by the first instrument, and if it has been dealt with it must be restored in the last. The words in section 20 (2) (i.) are "having priority to the settlement," and not to the life estate. In the Ailesbury case the Marquis Ernest had had a life estate created by the earliest deed and coming down through all the deeds, and Stirling, J., said once a compound settlement always a compound settlement; see also Davidson's Precedents in Conveyancing (3rd ed.), vol 3, introd. and pp. 394-6. Key & Elphinstone (5th ed.), vol. 1, p. 631, in a precedent of a disentailing deed of freeholds, insert the words "in restoration, continuation, and confirmation of the estate for his life limited to him," &c.; see note on that precedent, as to the old life estate being kept alive. There is no reported case in which the words about restoration, &c., are omitted. In this case the deed of 1889 settled the land and none of the previous deeds did. If the other side is correct, if a man seised in fee simple subject to a jointure dies having devised the land in strict settlement, the tenant for life can convey freed from the jointure; which the fee simple owner himself could not have done. The Settled Land Acts give much wider powers of dealing with settled land than the previous Settled Estates Acts did. The deed of 1889 constitutes the settlement, and if the machinery of the Acts had not been used it would have been only one of the instruments creating the settlement. Supposing the deed of 1889 had been a will instead of a deed, it could not have been suggested that the tenant for life under the will could override these priorities.

He referred to In re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract, 46 W. R. 523, [1898] 2 Ch. 96.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—The written judgment of Lindley, M.R., and Chitty, L.J., was delivered by CHITTY, L.J.—On this appeal there are two questions which hang together. The first is whether the vendor, who is tenant for life in possession, can, by his conveyance under the Settled Land Acts, discharge the land from the jointure limited to his wife if she should survive him, and from the portions charged on the land in favour of his younger children, but not raisable till after his death. The terms of years and other rights limited for the purpose of securing the jointure and portions are included in this question. The second is whether the deeds of 1861, 1865, and 1889 together constitute "the settlement" or "a settlement" within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882. The vendor contends that they do, and accordingly asks the court to appoint trustees of that settlement in order that they may receive and give a good discharge for the purchase-money. Kekewich, J., has decided both the questions against the vendor, and has consequently declined to appoint trustees.

The broad policy on which the Act is founded is laid down by the House of Lords in Lord Henry Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356. The object is to render land a marketable article, notwithstanding the settlement. Its main purpose is the welfare of the land itself and of all interested therein including the tenants, and not merely of the persons taking under the settlement. The Settled Land Act, 1882, has a much wider scope than the Settled Estates Acts. The scheme adopted is to facilitate the striking off from the land of the fetters imposed by settlement; and this is accomplished by conferring on tenants for life in possession, and others considered to stand in a like relation to the land, large powers of dealing with the land by way of sale, exchange, lease, and otherwise, and by jealously guarding those powers from attempts to defeat them or to transfer their exercise. At the same time the rights of persons claiming under the settlement are carefully preserved in the case of a sale by shifting the settlement from the land to the purchase-money which has to be paid into court or into the hands of trustees. The Act of 1882 and the subsequent Acts ought, then, to be construed by the court with regard to these broad principles, and in a spirit of wise and reasonable liberality.

I am free to confess that I am struck at the outset with the consideration that, if the judgment appealed against stands, there is a blot in the Acts. The purchaser required that the jointress and the younger children should join in the conveyance for the purpose of releasing their rights; but with this requisition it was impossible to comply. The portioners, or some of them, are infants. The result, then, is that if the requisition is upheld, the land is practically unmarketable. The 20th section of the Act of 1882 has been so often stated that it is unnecessary to set it forth again. The deed of conveyance by the tenant for life is effectual to pass the land conveyed, discharged from all the limitations, powers, and provisions of the settlement, and from all estates, interests, and charges subsisting or to arise thereunder, but subject to and with the exception of (1) all estates, interests, and charges having priority to the settlement; and (2) all such other, if any, estates, interests, and charges as have been conveyed or created for securing money actually raised at the date of the deed. The third exception is, for present purposes, altogether immaterial. The second is important as showing an express restriction on the power of the tenant for life. We find in it a principle. Mortgagees who have actually lent their money on the security of the land are regarded as strangers to the settlement, and are not to have the security which they bargained for on the land itself transferred to the purchase-money at the will of the tenant for life. The same principle is maintained in the 3rd sub-section of section 50 in favour of an assignee for value of the estate or interest of the tenant for life. The exception in sub-section 2 (ii.) of the 20th section has, however, no direct application to the present case, because no money has been raised under the jointure term or the portions. Indeed, as already intimated, no money is raisable under either of them till after the death of the vendor.

The first exception is important. If the settlement consists solely of the deed of 1889 then the jointure and the portions have priority to the settlement, and the vendor's conveyance will not discharge the land from them. If the settlement consists of the deeds of 1861, 1865, and 1889, the jointure and portions will not have priority to that settlement, and they will be discharged subject to compliance with the provisions of the Acts as to the appointment of trustees of that settlement and notice to them or waiver of notice. The purchaser raises no objection on the ground that there were no trustees for the purposes of the Act at the time of the sale. I turn now to the 2nd section of the Act of 1882, the 1st sub-section of which for the present purpose may be shortly stated thus: "Any deed . . . or other instrument or any number of instruments, whether made . . . before or after or partly before and partly after the commencement of this Act, under or by virtue of which instrument or instruments any land or any estate or interest in land stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates or is for the purposes of this Act a settlement and is in this Act referred to as a settlement or as the settlement as the case requires." The right interpretation of the words "stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession" is a critical point in this case. The words have no technical force. I see no sufficient reason for restricting their meaning. I think that according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words they include the case of a jointress and portions for younger children limited to arise on or after the death of a tenant for life and to the terms of years limited to trustees to secure them. The jointress and the portioners take an interest in the land and they succeed to their interests in the land on or after the death of the tenant for life. I state this proposition generally and without reference to the Acts imposing a duty on successions; but such Acts, if referred to, would support this proposition. It may be that conveyancers when they employ the phrase that the lands stand limited to uses often mention only the leading estates in the land—viz., the estates of freehold—and refer to jointures and portions as charges or incumbrances to which the freehold estates or some of them are subject. Such a mode of reciting title is often sufficient for the purpose which it is intended to serve. But it is quite correct in point of law to set out among the limitations to which the land stands limited the limitations in favour of the jointress and the portioners and the terms for securing them, and this is often done by conveyancers. There is an illustration of what I am saying in the deed of 1889. To the proposition that the words of the section "stands limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession" ought to be restricted to freehold estates there are two ready answers: First, the subject-matter of the settlement may be leaseholds for years. This is shown by the words of the definition itself, which speaks not of land but of "any estate or interest in land." And, secondly, by the 58th section, which in its enumeration of the persons having the powers of a tenant for life mentions (sub-section 4) "a tenant for years determinable on life not holding merely under a lease at a rent."

I proceed now to state the title shortly. The deed of 1861 was a settlement under which the vendor took a life estate with powers to jointure and charge portions in the usual way. The deed of 1865 was executed by the vendor on the occasion of his marriage, and he thereby executed his powers of jointuring and charging portions. The deeds of 1889 were a disentailing deed by the vendor and his eldest son, followed by a resettlement. The resettlement contains a correct recital showing how the lands "stood limited" immediately before the execution of the disentailing instrument. It will suffice to state the title from this recital following its main lines, but slightly abbreviating its language. According to the recital the lands then "stood limited (a) to the use that the vendor's mother, Elizabeth Susan Mundy, should receive during her life a yearly rent-charge of £800, with powers of distress and entry (she died in 1892); (b) to the use of trustees for a term (created by the deed of 1861) of 500 years to secure that rent-charge; and subject thereto (c) to the use of trustees for a term (created by the deed of 1861) of 1,000 years upon trust for raising £8,000 for the portions of the younger brother and three sisters of the vendor, all of whom had acquired vested interests in the £8,000; and subject thereto (d) to the use of a trustee named by the vendor for a term of 1,000 years to receive £10,000 by deed, dated the 5th of June, 1861, charged by the vendor in his own favour on the lands, pursuant to a power conferred upon him by the deed of settlement of 1861 already mentioned and which sum was subsequently raised by mortgage and was then repayable to the persons named; and, subject thereto (e) to the use of the vendor for his life; and subject thereto (f) to the use of trustees for a term of 300 years, to commence from the vendor's death, created by the marriage settlement of 1865 to secure to the vendor's wife a jointure rent-charge of £500 a year for her life in case she should survive the vendor (she is still living) and to commence from his death; and subject thereto (g) to the use of trustees for a term of 1,500 years to be computed from the vendor's death (created by the marriage settlement of 1865) to secure £8,000 for the portions of the vendor's younger children, no part of which had then become vested; and subject thereto (h) to the use of the vendor's eldest son in tail male, who was then living and of age. Such being the state of the title immediately before the execution of the disentailing deed and the resettlement of 1889, it is plain that the vendor as tenant for life in possession had, immediately upon the commencement of the Settled Land Act, 1882, become entitled, by virtue of that Act, to a power (which continued to subsist in 1889) to sell the land discharged from the jointure of his wife and the portions for his younger children, and for the terms to secure the same respectively. He had also the power of leasing and other powers conferred on a tenant for life by that statute. I may here mention that he had also extensive powers of leasing annexed to his life estate by the deed of 1861.

The resettlement of 1889 was executed to give effect to a general family arrangement. The parties to the deed were the vendor, his eldest son, the vendor's mother the jointress, the vendor's younger brother and three sisters, or the representatives of such of them as were dead, the vendor's wife, and trustees for the purposes of the resettlement. The nature of the family arrangement is stated in a recital to the following effect: (a) That the vendor's eldest son, with the consent of the vendor as protector, should bar his estate tail; (b) that they should concur in a resettlement in manner after expressed; (c) that the trustees of the resettlement should have power to pay off the existing mortgages for £16,000 and £10,000, and to borrow and secure the necessary money on a first mortgage of the lands; (d) that the vendor should have power to borrow not exceeding £5,000 on the lands; binding himself in that event to assign certain life policies; (e) that the vendor's mother and wife should postpone their respective jointures in favour of persons claiming under mortgages to be created under clauses (c) and (d); (f) that all persons legally or beneficially interested in the £8,000 portions of the vendor's younger brother and three sisters should concur in releasing the lands therefrom to the intent that the same and the term for securing the same might determine and in lieu thereof the rent-charges thereafter reserved should be secured to the two sisters then living for their lives and the life of the survivor; (g) that an immediate income of £150 should be provided for the vendor's eldest son in manner after expressed, to be increased to £200 in the events after mentioned; (h) that the lands should be limited to the several uses and subject to the several powers and in manner after expressed.

The disentailing deed was in the usual form. The vendor so far as related to his estate for life granted, and his son, with the vendor's consent as protector, granted and disposed of the lands to the grantee to uses for such uses as the vendor and his son should jointly appoint and subject thereto to the old uses, trusts, and powers so as to restore the same.

The resettlement of 1889 was so framed as to carry into effect the family arrangement recited. It is unnecessary to state further the operative part of the deed beyond saying that the power of joint appointment was executed and that subject to the other provisions indicated by the recital the lands were limited to the use of the vendor for life so that upon the execution of the deed he again became tenant for life in possession. But this life estate was not in terms limited to him in restoration of his old life estate. The object of this restoration is well known; it was to keep alive the old powers annexed to the life estate (see 3 Davidson's Precedents, 3rd ed., p. 594, et seq.). Regard being had to the limitation in the disentailing deed in default of appointment, it would appear to have been thought unnecessary to restore the old life estate because the powers to jointure and appoint portions had already been exercised by the vendor by the deed of 1865, and as to the leasing powers in the deed of 1861, it was thought unnecessary to keep them any longer on foot, seeing that the vendor as tenant for life under the resettlement had ample powers of leasing by virtue of the Settled Land Acts. But however this may be, the old life estate was not restored. The resettlement did not, and could not, affect the portions limited for the vendor's younger children and the term to secure them, nor, save as to the limited postponement agreed upon, did it affect the jointure of the vendor's wife or the term whereby it was secured.

The result thus far appears to me to be this: Treating the life estate of the vendor (as I think it must be treated) as a new life estate arising under the resettlement, the land now stands limited to the vendor for life, and after his death to the use of his wife for her rent-charge and for the portioners with their respective terms by way of succession within the meaning of the definition contained in section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1882; and the settlement consists of the deeds of 1861, 1865, and 1889. This result is in accordance with Stirling, J.'s, decision in In re Marquis of Ailesbury and Lord Iveagh. The judgment in that case has been criticized by some learned writers particularly in regard to the jointure of Maria the Dowager Marchioness. But I think the judgment was right and founded on the true view of statute. It was held that the settlement was made the up of the series of deeds beginning with the deed of 1796 and ending with the deed of 1885, and that, treating these deeds as the settlement, the vendor, who was tenant for life in possession under the deed of 1885 only, had power to bind the jointure of the Dowager Marchioness which arose under the earlier deeds of the series—viz., those of 1796, 1826, and 1833, and also to bind the jointure of Lady Evelyn Riddell which arose under the intermediate deed of 1863. It was no doubt a circumstance in that case that by the deed of 1885 the life estate of the Marquis Ernest under the deed of 1863 was restored to him; and this circumstance in connection with sub-section 4 of section 2 relating to the time of the settlement taking effect was relied upon by the learned judge. But this circumstance would not have carried the compound settlement further back than the deed of 1863. He held, however, that the Savernake Estate stood limited to uses in favour of various persons by way of succession under or by virtue of the series of deeds, and that the Marchioness Maria was one of the persons taking under the series of deeds, although she did not take by way of succession to the vendor. This was a broad view of the Act; but I repeat that in my opinion it was the right view.

Holding however, as I do, that there is a settlement consisting of the four deeds, within the definition, there is a point which ought not to be overlooked. The resettlement of 1889 expressly appoints trustees of the settlement thereby made for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts. I think that the vendor could have sold the land and discharged it from the limitations thereby made, but, of course, subject to the jointure and portions of his wife and younger children which upon such a sale would stand in priority to that settlement; and that the trustees thereby appointed could have given a valid discharge for such purchase-money. I see no inconsistency in holding that there may be at the same time a more comprehensive settlement consisting of several deeds or a less comprehensive settlement constituted by one of the deeds only. The language of the 2nd section, sub-section 1, "any instrument or any number of instruments" whereby the land "stands for the time being limited" justifies this conclusion. Had I been of a different opinion on this point I might have found some difficulty on the main questions involved in our present decision. The point, however, was decided by Stirling, J., in In re DuCane and Nettlefold's Contract, 46 W. R. 523, [1898] 2 Ch. 96. In his judgment in that case, he said (at p. 105) that it is quite plain that one instrument may constitute a settlement, although it is to be admitted that several instruments may under the same definition also constitute a settlement. I agree with his reasoning and with his decision on this point.

There is also another but quite distinct point which arises on this title. As already stated the vendor being tenant for life under the settlement of 1861 became entitled on the commencement of the Act of 1882 to sell the land discharged from the jointure and portions of his wife and younger children, and this statutory power remained vested in him beyond all question down to the date of the execution of the disentailing deed. How and by what means has this power been divested? It seems to me clear that the statutory power is not a power annexed to the estate of a tenant for life in any such sense as that in which powers were considered to be annexed to an estate by any method of conveyancing arising out of the private deeds of the parties. It is a power vested by the Act once for all in a tenant for life, which remains vested in him, is incapable of being assigned or released and continues exercisable by him notwithstanding any assignment by him of his estate. This is the effect of the 50th section of the Act of 1882, which runs thus: "(1) The powers under this Act of a tenant for life are not capable of assignment or release, and do not pass to a person as being, by operation of law or otherwise, an assignee of a tenant for life, and remain exercisable by the tenant for life after and notwithstanding any assignment, by operation of law or otherwise, of his estate or interest under the settlement. (2) A contract by a tenant for life not to exercise any of his powers under this Act is void."

It may be that if the settlement consists merely of a life estate in A. with remainder to B. in fee and A. surrenders his life estate to B. the power is gone under the doctrine of merger—and that such a case is not within the section because where the settlement is thus brought to an end and exhausted there is no reason why such a power should continue after the absolute fee simple is vested in possession. I say may be, because it is not necessary to consider such a case which does not arise upon the facts before us.

Reading the declaration of uses declared by the resettlement with the disentailing deed according to the settled law on that subject, how does the present case stand? By virtue of the grant made by the vendor and his son by the disentailing deed the common law estate passed to the grantee to uses; and by virtue of the declaration of uses in the resettlement the grantee to uses stood seised to the use of the vendor for life. The old life estate of the vendor alone was sufficient to support the use in favour of the vendor. But apart from these technical points I still ask the question how, upon such a transaction as that manifested by the disentailing deed and resettlement of 1889, can it be said in the face of the 50th section that the statutory power of sale which the vendor had at the time when he executed those deeds is gone or extinguished? In my opinion the 50th section applies, and the statutory power of sale remains unaffected.

The order will be: (1) Discharge Kekewich, J.'s, judgment; (2) declare the vendor has power to discharge the land from the jointure portions, &c., as in In re Marquis of Ailesbury and Lord Iveagh, but retain that part of Kekewich, J.'s, declaration which relates to the vendor's sisters; (3) appoint trustees of the compound settlement constituted by the deeds of 1861, 1865, and 1889. Take trustees of 1889 deed, unless some objection.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree, but I confess, with great hesitation, for in a case in which an estate in fee simple is settled in the ordinary way with a succession of limitations consisting of a life estate, estate tail, &c., with the ordinary power of creating terms to secure a jointure and portions for younger children, I doubt very much whether the terms to secure jointure or portions or the interest thereby secured, are limitations by way of succession within the meaning of section 2 of the Settled Land Act. This doubt is not based upon any question of the applicability of the words "stand limited" to the estate created by a term of years, but is based upon the consideration that such a term does not come into operation in succession in relation to the freehold limitations, estate tail, and estates in remainder and reversion which exhaust the whole fee. Such terms are in fact mere charges overriding the successive limitations and coming into operation contemporaneously with those limitations. Or to express this doubt by another example, I doubt whether land would continue to stand limited by way of succession in a case where a settlement created a life estate with remainder in fee, with power to the tenant for life to jointure and create terms to secure jointures and portions, and the tenant for life died after creating such terms and the remainderman became tenant in fee in possession subject to the terms. I mean that I doubt if in such case the terms and the reversion which has become vested in the remainderman as an estate in possession constitute a limitation by way of succession. But having regard to what was said in the House of Lords as to the policy of the Act, Chitty, L.J.'s, judgment has persuaded me that we ought to construe section 2 of the Act in the way he has done although we may be putting a somewhat unnatural meaning on the words. I am not, however, influenced in this by the presence in section 58, sub-section 1, of clause iv., because I think that clause was inserted merely to prevent an old conveyancing device to render difficult the suffering of a recovery to bar an entail being effective to avoid the application of the Settled Land Act by the absence of a life estate.

GREENWOOD AND ANOTHER v. FRANCIS. (a.)

Principal and surety—Co-sureties—Co-sureties constituted principal debtors—Giving time by one co-surety—Contribution.

The plaintiffs and the defendant gave a joint and several bond to secure the repayment of an advance made to a company upon a second mortgage, and by the bond it was agreed that the plaintiffs and defendant, as between themselves and the mortgagee, should be taken to be principal debtors, and that they should not, nor should either of them, be released by reason of time being given to the company, or by any forbearance, act, or omission of the mortgagee or his assigns. The company was subsequently wound up and a new company formed to take over the business, subject to the mortgages, and the plaintiffs, without the assent of the defendant, paid off the mortgage debt due under the bond to the mortgagee, who was pressing for payment, obtained a transfer of the second mortgage to themselves, the new company covenanting to pay to them the principal sum thereby secured, and entered into an agreement with the new company that the mortgage should not be enforced or the mortgage money called in for six months. The course adopted by the plaintiffs in dealing with the mortgage security was in the best interests of all concerned. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant his proportion of the amount so paid by them under the bond,

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Appeal of the defendant from the judgment of Day, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an action by the plaintiffs Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine to recover from the defendant Captain Francis a third part of the sum of £5,000 and interest thereon, which the three had jointly and severally guaranteed to the firm of Ind, Coope, & Co. (Limited), and which sum the plaintiffs have had to pay to that firm. When the facts of the case are ascertained, in my judgment it is by no means so complex a case as for some time during the arguments it appeared to be.

In the month of February, 1897, the Victoria Mansions Restaurant Co. (Limited), of which company the plaintiffs and the defendant were directors, were desirous of raising a loan upon second mortgage of its premises, there being at the time a first mortgage thereon of £12,000. Ind, Coope, & Co. were willing to make an advance of £5,500 provided the company would give a second mortgage for that amount and that the three directors, the two plaintiffs and the defendant, would jointly and severally guarantee the repayment upon the 5th of July, 1897, to them by the Restaurant Co. of the sum of £5,000, being part of the proposed loan, with interest at 5 per cent. thereon. Accordingly, upon the 6th of February, 1897, this second mortgage was given by the Restaurant Co. to Ind, Coope, & Co., and a joint and several bond of the plaintiffs and defendant was also given by them to Messrs. Ind, Coope, & Co. to further secure the repayment of their loan, and by this bond it was expressly agreed and declared that as between the Restaurant Co. and the three obligors the latter were only sureties for the Restaurant Co., but as between the three obligors and Ind, Coope, & Co., the former should be taken to be principal debtors, and that they should not, nor should either of them, be released from their or his liability under the bond by reason of time being given to the Restaurant Co. or their assigns, or by reason of any collateral securities for moneys intended to be thereby secured, or by any forbearance, act, or omission of Ind, Coope, & Co. (Limited) or their assigns, or by any other matter or thing whereby the three obligors, or either of them, would be so released but for this provision. This bond having been thus given, matters rested until the month of July in that year. By this time the Restaurant Co. were in difficulties, and upon the 17th of July, 1897, a resolution was passed to voluntarily wind up the company, the defendant Captain Francis being in the chair upon that occasion, and upon the 9th of August, 1897, a supervision order was made by Byrne, J. At this date Ind, Coope, & Co. were pressing for repayment of their loan, and had instructed their solicitors to commence an action against Messrs. Greenwood, de la Fontaine, and Francis for the recovery of the £5,000 and interest guaranteed by them unless they (Ind, Coope, & Co.) received payment of their open account, which then amounted to about £1,000. That the position of the Restaurant Co. was at this time critical, as was also the position of the three obligors of the bond, no one can doubt, and what next happened was this. The Restaurant Co. (Limited) (which I shall hereafter call the old company) by its liquidator, upon the 24th of August, 1897, entered into a contract with a Mr. Carter for and on behalf of an intended company (which I shall call the new company), whereby it was contracted that the old company should sell to the new company its goodwill, lease, and benefit of contracts for the sum of £2,000, and also its stock-in-trade for a sum not exceeding £1,200, subject to the two mortgages of £12,000 and £5,500 respectively. By this contract it was agreed between the old company, through its liquidator, and Mr. Carter, for the intended new company, that before the date of the completion of the purchase the old company should pay off and obtain a transfer to Messrs. Greenwood, de la Fontaine, and Francis, directors of the old company, or some of them, of Ind, Coope, & Co.'s second mortgage, and should also obtain an agreement by such directors with the new company that they would not require the payment of the principal moneys due upon the second mortgage for the space of twelve months from the date of completion. It appears to me upon the evidence that the contract of the 24th of August, 1897, was a contract made between the old company, through its liquidator, and Mr. Carter, on behalf of the new company, and was not a contract made by Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine, as suggested by Mr. Neville for Captain Francis when he opened the appeal. This contract did not bind Mr. Greenwood nor Mr. de la Fontaine unless they afterwards should agree to be so bound. The evidence shows that the only agreement Mr. Greenwood entered into was a subsequent agreement of the 29th of September, 1897, with the new company, and there is evidence that Mr. de la Fontaine concurred in this last agreement. Captain Francis undoubtedly did not agree thereto, for he was of opinion that, as Messrs. Greenwood and de la Fontaine were simple contract creditors of the old company, which he (Captain Francis) was not, they would obtain an advantage over him by participating in any balance there might be left in the hands of the liquidator of the £2,000 paid by the new company after payment thereout of the overriding charges due by the old company, and he desired that Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine should pool what they might receive thereout so that he (Captain Francis) might participate therein, and this Messrs. Greenwood and de la Fontaine refused to do. What Mr. Greenwood did agree to, and the evidence shows that Mr. de la Fontaine concurred therein, was as follows: The agreement is in writing, and is addressed to "The New Victoria Mansions Restaurant Company (Limited) and Mr. F. H. Carter," and is dated the 29th of September, 1897. It runs thus: "Gentlemen,—On completion of the purchase this day of the lease, goodwill, &c., of the Victoria Mansions Restaurant (Limited), I have seen the contract dated the 24th of August, 1897, as entered into by the liquidator with Mr. Carter, and in consideration of your consenting to allow the completion to proceed before the transfer of the Ind, Coope mortgage as agreed has actually taken place, I hereby undertake with you and each of you that the transfer of the said mortgage to Messrs. Ind, Coope, & Co. shall be carried out within one calendar month from this date and Messrs. Ind, Coope, & Co. discharged. Also, I agree that the said mortgage when so transferred shall not be enforced or the mortgage money called in before the expiry of six calendar months from the date of such transfer, and I hereby keep you and each of you indemnified against any enforcement of the said mortgage by Messrs. Ind, Coope, & Co. until such transfer, saving as to the covenant that spirits, &c., be purchased from them.—HUBERT J. GREENWOOD." Besides the payment of £2,000 to the liquidator of the old company by the new company, a further condition upon which the new company became purchasers was that it should undertake to reduce the amount due upon the first mortgage by £1,000, which was done. Upon the 18th of October, 1897, Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine were called upon to pay to Ind, Coope, & Co. the £5,000 and interest due under their bond of guarantee, and they did so, and by deed of that date made between Ind, Coope, & Co., the new company, Mr. Greenwood, and Mr. de la Fontaine, Ind, Coope, & Co. transferred to Messrs. Greenwood and de la Fontaine the second mortgage for £5,500, and the new company therein covenanted with Messrs. Greenwood and de la Fontaine to pay to them the principal sum of £5,500 on the 5th of January, 1898, together with the sum of £135 7s. 4d., and by this deed it is expressly provided that "nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to release, or give any time or indulgence to the old company, or Captain Francis, or prejudice any right or remedy of the transferee Greenwood or de la Fontaine against them or either of them, or against the mortgaged premises, the covenant by the new company being intended as an additional security only for the mortgage debt and interest." On the same day, the 18th of October, 1897, Ind, Coope, & Co. assigned and transferred to Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine the principal sum of £5,000 secured by the bond of the 6th of Febuary, 1897, and the said bond, and the full benefit and advantage thereof. Such are the somewhat long facts of this case.

Before I deal with the law applicable thereto, I will say that I do not doubt that what was done by the liquidator, by Mr. Greenwood, and by Mr. de la Fontaine was in the best interest of all concerned, and in my judgment Day, J., was well warranted in finding, as he did, that this was so, and the evidence as to this is all one way. The evidence of Mr. Ellis as to the advisability of doing what was done is cogent, and in particular his statement that to sell the property out and out to some other purchaser in September, 1897, as is now suggested on behalf of Captain Francis should have been done, would in the circumstances which then existed have been disastrous. The evidence of Mr. Ellis is wholly uncontradicted by any evidence whatever, and it is left to counsel for Captain Francis to suggest in argument what ought to have been done and to say that what Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine did was done for their own private purposes and not in the interests of all. Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine having paid to Ind, Coope, & Co. the £5,000 and interest covered by the joint and several bond of themselves and Captain Francis, now ask Captain Francis to pay to them his share of the loss thus sustained—that is, one-third of the £5,000 and interest so paid; and what is his answer? Now as to the law, Captain Francis first of all says that he and the plaintiffs were co-sureties together to secure to Ind, Coope, & Co. repayment by the old company of the £5,000 and interest advanced to it by them, and that by a binding contract time has been given to the principal debtor for the payment off of this £5,000 and interest, and that he is thereby released from the payment of the one-third of this £5,000 and interest; and this is how the case is first presented to us, which certainly requires investigation.

Now, assuming that this had been a case of a principal creditor suing a surety upon default made by the principal debtor, by whom and to whom must time by binding contract be given so as to discharge the surety? It is obvious that it must be by the principal creditor to the principal debtor, for who apart from the principal creditor could make such a contract? The principles upon which a binding contract to give time by the principal creditor to the principal debtor without the consent of the surety discharges the surety are familiar to all lawyers, but as to this I will read the well-known passage in the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Polak v. Everett, 24 W. R. 365, at p. 366, 1 Q. B. D. 669, at pp. 673, 674. That learned judge says: "It has been established for a very long time, beginning with Rees v. Berrington, 2 Ves. Jun. 540, to the present day, without a single case going to the contrary, that, on the principles of equity a surety is discharged when the creditor, without his assent, gives time to the principal debtor, because by so doing, he deprives the surety of part of the right he would have had from the mere fact of entering into the suretyship—namely, to use the name of the creditor to sue the principal debtor, and if this right be suspended for a day or an hour, not injuring the surety to the value of one farthing, and even positively benefiting him, nevertheless, by the principles of equity it is established that this discharges the surety altogether." I have never before heard of defences which would be defences by a surety against a principal creditor being attempted to be set up in a case of sureties suing a co-surety for contribution, and no authority has been cited to show that this can be done. What principles of equity are there to intervene to prevent one surety suing his co-surety at law to indemnify him from that part of the loss which the latter was bound to participate in and which the former has been compelled to pay? What defences a surety has against his co-surety when sued for contribution are no more and no less than the defences one principal may have against another principal, and this alone would, I think, suffice to determine this case against Captain Francis apart from points made by his learned counsel which I must deal with. It cannot be said upon the facts of this case that Ind, Coope, & Co., the principal creditors, have given time to the old company, the principal debtors. Then how do the principles of equity relating to the discharge of a surety by the giving of time arise? It is said that Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine were assignees of Ind, Coope, & Co., and that, though sureties, they thus became the principal creditors and had given time by the agreement of the 29th of September, 1897, to the assignees of the old company—that is, to the new company, who had thus become the principal debtors. Whether this suggestion is well founded or not I do not stop to discuss nor to decide, for it is not necessary to do so, for there is this clear answer to it. By the bond under which Mr. Greenwood, Mr. de la Fontaine, and Captain Francis became, as Captain Francis says, sureties, though in reality they became principals between themselves, Ind, Coope, & Co. were expressly empowered by Captain Francis, as well as by his co-obligors, to give time to the old company, and if Mr. Greenwood and Mr. de la Fontaine are to be taken as being assignees of Ind, Coope, & Co., and thus had become principal creditors, they would have the same rights as Ind, Coope, & Co., one of which was to give time to the old company, and this is what Captain Francis himself, under his own hand and seal, has agreed might be done without affecting his liability under the bond to either Ind, Coope, & Co. or their assigns. Again, if it be said that the new company is assignee of the old company, still, if giving time to the new company is giving time to the old company, which I do not decide, the observations I have above made about the giving of time in this case being expressly permitted by the bond without discharging the surety apply. Again, to meet a further suggestion of counsel for Captain Francis, I agree that, if this had been an action by a principal creditor against a surety, and the surety could have shown that the contract of the surety with the principal creditor without his assent had been altered by the principal creditor, that would have wholly discharged the surety in such an action upon the plain ground, as Lord Watson tersely puts it in Taylor v. Bank of New South Wales, 11 App. Cas. 596, at p. 603, 35 W. R. Dig. 167, that the surety could not be made liable for default in the performance of a contract which he had not guaranteed. But this defence has no application to a case where one surety is suing another for contribution, the one having been compelled to pay the whole amount guaranteed to the principal creditor. One last word. It is said for Francis that the plaintiffs have wasted his security. In my opinion, this is not established in fact, and, if it had been, it would only have given Captain Francis, as one principal against another principal, a right to recover what damages he could establish he had sustained by the wrongful act of the other; it gives him no right to be released in toto from contributing the one-third of the £5,000, which is the defence he sets up in this action. In my judgment, Captain Francis's defences entirely fail. There is a small matter about a small item which the parties must settle between themselves, for it is really no part of this appeal. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment: The plaintiffs in this case, being sureties for the debt to Ind, Coope, & Co. (Limited), secured by the bond of themselves, and the defendant, their co-surety, have paid that debt, and upon such payment became entitled to and have actually had executed to them an assignment of the bond. This assignment, whether the bond debt is or is not to be deemed at law to have been satisfied by the payment of the debt, entitles them to stand in the place of Ind, Coope, & Co., and to use all their remedies in order to obtain from their co-surety, the defendant, indemnification for the advance made by them. It is not now necessary to use the name of Ind, Coope, & Co., but the remedies in this action are those of Ind, Coope, & Co., subject to the proviso that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover from the defendant more than the just proportion—in this case one-third of the whole debt paid with interest and expenses—to which, as between the plaintiffs and defendant, the defandant is liable: see the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 5. Now under the bond Ind, Coope, & Co. were entitled to treat the plaintiffs and defendant as principal debtors. The right of action is, therefore, independent of any questions which might otherwise arise between Ind, Coope, & Co. as principal creditors and the plaintiffs and defendant as sureties. There might, of course, be a counter-claim for any loss actually occasioned to the defendant by any wrongful action of the plaintiffs. The only ground upon which such a claim could be based would be that the plaintiffs have wrongfully depreciated their mortgage security so as to injure the defendant. This being so, I do not think it necessary to go into the other questions raised in the action beyond saying that I am of opinion that it is not established by the defendant that the plaintiffs by their dealing with the mortgage security have in any way depreciated the value of that security so as to give the defendant a right of action against them. I think, indeed, that they took a reasonable and proper course with reference to the mortgage security.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: The plaintiffs in this case are suing their co-surety on a claim for contribution of his share of the sum which they have paid to the creditor in satisfaction of the guaranteed debt. They are also suing as assignees of the creditor on the bond by which they and the defendant became co-sureties for the old company. This is not a case where the sureties acting together have agreed to pay off the creditor and take an assignment of his securities for the common benefit. The action of the plaintiffs was taken in their own interest and against the protest of the defendant, and in view of this fact I think that questions of some nicety might have arisen when their rights as assignees of the creditor on the contract of guarantee came to be considered but for the fact that that instrument constitutes the co-sureties in all respects principal debtors as between themselves and the creditor, and debars them from relying on defences, such as giving time to the principal debtor, &c., which in ordinary cases might suffice to discharge a surety. It is unnecessary to consider, therefore, whether they in fact placed themselves in such a relation towards their co-surety as to enable him to set up against them acts which, if done by the principal creditor under an ordinary contract, might have released the surety; nor whether, if they did stand in such relation, their dealings with the two companies, the old and the new, were such as to amount to a giving of time to the principal debtor or variation of the terms of the guaranteed contract such as might discharge a surety; nor whether, if a defence on such grounds would have defeated their claim as assignees of the bond, they nevertheless could have set up their claim for contribution. None of these points arise for determination, and I desire to give no opinion upon any of them. When these matters are eliminated their rights are to be determined simply in view of the fact that they are liable to contribute equally to the discharge of the obligation assumed, and are all equally entitled to the benefit of any securities held for the same. There cannot, therefore, I think, be any higher duty on the plaintiffs than that they should bring into account such sum as they ought with reasonable care to have realized out of the securities which they held for the common benefit. I quite agree that the course they did take was the most prudent they could have adopted and has had the effect of mitigating the loss which was otherwise inevitable. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Day, J., was perfectly right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Company — Winding up — Official receiver's report — "Further report" — Allegation of fraud — Order for public examination — Jurisdiction — Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 8, sub-sections 2, 3, 7.

In the winding up of a company the further report of the official receiver, made under section 8, sub-section 2, of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, must allege that fraud has been committed by some specified person or persons in the promotion or formation of the company, and must set out such facts as the basis of his opinion as will warrant the judge in calling upon such person or persons to undergo public examination.

Ex parte Barnes, 44 W. R. 433, [1896] A. C. 146, discussed and explained.

Appeal from Wright, J.

By section 8 (1) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, where the court has made an order for winding up a company, the official receiver shall submit a preliminary report to the court as to the position of the company.

By sub-section 2, "The official receiver may also, if he thinks fit, make a further report, or further reports, stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether in his opinion any fraud has been committed by any person in the promotion or formation of the company, or by any director or other officer of the company, in relation to the company since the formation thereof, and any other matters which in his opinion it is desirable to bring to the notice of the court."

By sub-section 3 the court may direct any person who has taken any part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has been a director or officer of the company, to attend before the court to be publicly examined.

In the winding up of the above-named company the official receiver made a further report on the 16th of July, 1898, and found that fraud had been committed by the persons named in the schedule in the promotion or formation of the company, or in relation to the company, since the formation thereof. The appellant, H. P. Long, and ten other persons were named in the schedule, and Long was described as a promoter of the company.

After consideration of the further report an order was made in chambers for the attendance of Long before the court for public examination as to his dealings with the company.

The other material facts sufficiently appear from the judgments.

On appeal to the judge, Wright, J., affirmed the order.

H. P. Long appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Cabubé, for the appellant.—If the official receiver does not know the facts, he may examine as to them by virtue of section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, first of all. A vendor to a company, who is concerned in or "interested in" the promotion of the company, does not necessarily "take part in" the promotion—following the words of the statute.

They referred to Ex parte Barnes, 44 W. R. 433, [1896] A. C. 146.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the official receiver.—In Ex parte Barnes the Court of Appeal held that it was necessary that there should be a charge of fraud, and the House of Lords held that it was necessary that the person charged should be concerned in the promotion of the company: these two conditions are fulfilled in the present report. All the conditions imposed by the Legislature for the validity of such an order as this have been fulfilled in this report.

They referred to In re New Travellers' Chambers (Limited), 43 W. R. 282, [1895] 1 Ch. 395.

Reed, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think there is any difficulty in coming to a proper conclusion in this case. The appeal is against an order made by Wright, J., refusing to discharge an order made ex parte for the examination of Mr. Long under section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. That section has been read and commented upon so often that I need not read it at length. It has been the subject of a great deal of litigation in this court, and even in the House of Lords; and in the case of Ex parte Barnes, to which we have been referred, a construction has been put upon the section which of course we all accept. Now, there are two questions which have to be determined on this section. Ex parte Barnes has removed one point in controversy, which was, what is the "report" referred to in clause 2 of the section, where it says "The official receiver may also if he thinks fit make a further report," and "the court may," in clause 3, "after consideration of any such report direct," and so on. Ex parte Barnes has made it plain that the report referred to is what is called the further report, and not what is called the preliminary report. That was a struggle that had to be settled. Now we have the further report, and clause 2 says what the official receiver may state in such further report. [His lordship read sub-sections 2 and 3, and continued:] Then clause 7, which is very important, must be read in connection with those two; and the great advantage of the decision in Ex parte Barnes in the House of Lords is this: that it has shown how those three clauses are to be woven together so as to produce one harmonious whole, and make the Act work, and work justly. On the one hand this section is one of the most beneficial sections to be found in the whole of the Companies Acts; and it is so beneficial that attempts were made to stretch it to lengths which were hardly just to the person who had to undergo the ordeal of a public examination; and attempts were made to extend this section so as to give the judge jurisdiction to order examinations upon reports which, in the judgment of every court to whom the question had been submitted, were insufficient for the purpose. That was the kind of report the House of Lords had before it in Ex parte Barnes.

The result of Ex parte Barnes appears to me tolerably plain. There must be a report stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether, in the opinion of the official receiver, fraud has been committed by any person proposed to be examined. That is not found in the Act; it is put in by the House of Lords in Ex parte Barnes. And the House of Lords were led to put it in by construing clause 3 in connection with clauses 2 and 7. Now, if a report were in such a shape as to comply literally and textually with the language I have just read, stating the manner in which the company was formed, and that, in the opinion of the official receiver, a fraud had been committed by A., B., or C., and there could not be seen from the report any connection between A., B., and C. and the manner in which the company was formed, although the textual and literal language of the section might be complied with, I should hesitate very long before I said that such a report as that was the kind of report mentioned in the section. I doubt whether any judge could judicially and properly act on such a report as that. But, on the other hand, if the official receiver reports that A., B., or C. have been guilty of fraud in connection with the formation of the company, and you look back into his report and see, not whether the charge against him is proved—that is not the function of the report at all—but whether there is such a basis for that opinion as, in the opinion of the judge, warrants him in calling upon the man to undergo examination—to my mind that is all the report need do. That appears to me to be the fair and true outcome of the language of the Act and the decision in Ex parte Barnes.

At the end of this report the official receiver says this: He is of opinion "that fraud has been committed by the persons named in the schedule hereto in the promotion or formation of the company or in relation to the company since the formation thereof"; and then in the schedule occurs the name of Mr. Long, who is described as one of the promoters. So that you have here, as I read it, that the official receiver is of opinion that fraud has been committed by Mr. Long in the promotion or formation of the company or in relation to the company since the formation thereof. The last part I do not myself attach much importance to. Now, is Mr. Long so connected in the narrative relating to the formation of this company as to afford a basis for that opinion?

In my opinion there is ample basis for it, and it is to be found in paragraphs 2, 4, 5, 15, and 18. I am not going to say that this report is in a form in which I should like to see it. It is not. A very little trouble would have made it plainer. In the first place, I think the language of paragraph 2 is objectionable. It says: "The promoters of the company were the contract company." When you read the whole of the report you see what that means. The contract company brought out this particular company. Then it goes on: "The persons concerned in the promotion of the company" were several people, among them being Mr. Long. What does "concerned" mean? It is not found as a fact that he "took part in the promotion of the company"—which is the language of the Act of Parliament. Of course there was a discussion at once about the meaning of the word "concerned." It was said that he was concerned in some other way, and was not taking part. I do not so understand it. I understand the finding is that he was concerned in taking part in the definite formation of the company. Then it goes on to say that the contract corporation obtained an option of taking over the assets of the Cater Co., which is what Mr. Long had to sell, for the sum of £35,000. Then it sets out that with regard to Cater & Co. (this is paragraph 5), it has transpired that the contract company were introduced by Mr. Rhys, who afterwards became a director of the company, to Mr. Harry Long, and as commission or remuneration for the introduction Mr. Rhys was to be entitled to one-half of the net profits made by Mr. Long in the sale to the company. Now put those two facts together. Mr. Long was going to sell these assets to the Civil and Military Co. for £35,000, and he is going to give Mr. Rhys half for the introduction. What is the value of what he is going to sell? £35,000? The thing is absurd on the face of it. Then from paragraph 16 it appears that in 1895 these precious assets were sold at a valuation under the sanction of the court for £8,554. I do not say that nothing had taken place in the interval; I daresay there had. This report does not state minutely what the effect of the trading in this precious company was from the time when the assets were bought for £8,554, and sold for £35,000, of which half was to go to Mr. Long and half was to go to the gentleman I have named. But I will go on. It is stated in paragraph 18 that there were separate agreements between the original vendors and the promoters—by which I understand as regards this matter Mr. Long and the contract company—which provided for the Civil, Naval, and Military Outfitters (Limited) acquiring the businesses. Now put those facts together, and consider whether there is not some basis for the opinion of the official receiver that fraud has been committed by Mr. Long in the promotion or formation of this company. I do not say that it is a charge which, if proved in this way, would authorize a court of civil jurisdiction to compel Mr. Long to make good the profits which he has made; still less do I say that there is such a charge as Mr. Long should be called upon to meet in a court of criminal jurisdiction. The question we have to consider is whether this report is so flimsy, so sketchy, and so unfair, that Wright, J., exceeded his jurisdiction, or exercised a wrong discretion in saying that Mr. Long was a proper person to be publicly examined under the Act of Parliament.

In my judgment, although the report might be plainer, it did give Wright, J., ample jurisdiction to make the order, and he exercised his discretion in the way in which I myself should have exercised it. I therefore think that this appeal wholly fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will add but little after what has fallen from the Master of the Rolls, with whose reasons I agree.

The first question is whether there was jurisdiction to make the order. The report is in the narrative form, stating the facts and matters which the official receiver desires to bring to the notice of the court, and his opinion, as required by section 8 of the Companies Act in conformity with the 69th rule of the rules made under the Winding-up Act of 1890. What the statute requires in this further report is that he should state the manner in which the company was formed. That he has done. Then he is to state his opinion, which he has done, that fraud has been committed by some persons in the promotion or formation of the company. I stop there, because that is sufficient for the present purpose. I agree that if there was a report by the official receiver merely stating the manner in which the company had been formed, and then, without there being any connection between the facts as stated, and the opinion, which came, as it were, suddenly at the end of his report, that A. B. had been guilty of fraud in the promotion, I should say that that report, though it might, in words, comply with the requisitions of the statute, would not be such a report upon which any judge would act, when he came under the 3rd sub-section to take the report into consideration. It is the judge who has to direct that the public examination shall take place. Now what is this report? It has been very fully described by the Master of the Rolls, and it appears to me that it does contain a substantial basis for the opinion which is expressed at the end of it. The official receiver gives his opinion in the last paragraph, "that fraud has been committed by the persons named in the schedule in the promotion or formation of the company, or in relation to the company since the formation thereof"; and then there is a schedule which puts down the names of many gentlemen, with remarks in one column showing "their connection with the company." I am not saying—nor did the Master of the Rolls say—that this report was drawn in as good a form as it might have been. I think it might have been in several respects more particular, especially in the matter which I am now going to mention; but putting the introductory statement of the official receiver's opinion, that fraud has been committed by the persons named, and then coming down to Mr. Long, I find that he, under the heading "Connection with company," is said to be one of the promoters. It may be that charge, as it is, is a little too wide, so that it might be suggested, as it has been suggested, that there is a charge against him subsequent to the formation of the company for acts not done by him as promoter. But the answer to this part of the case appears to me to be, that the report is not to be an indictment, and it is not to be a statement of claim, to charge a man with fraud. The object of the statement is to show a general primâ facie case—not that the man has to answer whether he has committed a fraud or not—upon which he is to undergo the public examination, and all that is done on the public examination, after it has taken place, is, as the end of the 7th section says, that it may be used in evidence against him. Then I do not see that the Act requires that the charge should be formulated against him in any strict and precise manner. I think it is only fair—and the official receiver probably in any future report will bear this in mind—that he should endeavour to reduce to as precise a point as he can the nature of the charge. But, as the House of Lords has said, all these sub-sections are to be read together and reconciled; and I find in the 7th sub-section, not that it is a charge made, but a charge suggested from which he can exculpate himself. So that in the report, according to the language which the Legislature has used in section 8, which has been so much referred to in the House of Lords, the suggestion of fraud may be made against the persons whom the judge directs to be examined. Then there are the other parts of the report. The report states who the promoters were, and it mentions a company, which is called the contract company, and immediately after that it mentions Mr. Long and other persons as being concerned in the promotion of the company. I think that it would have been much more happy to use the term that is found in the Act itself, "taking part." But I do not hesitate for a moment to say that the meaning of this paragraph in the report is intended to point out that Mr. Long did take part in the promotion of the company, and it is in respect of that taking part in the promotion of the company that Mr. Long is charged.

There is one other point which I think just worthy of mention, and that is that in this narrative there is a statement of Long's agreement to sell to the company which is called for shortness the contract company. What was that company? It was a company that never had a greater subscribed capital than £35, and yet Mr. Long, who had some option, which has not been stated upon the report, to buy Cater's business, which had gone through a series of disasters, sells to that company the Cater business for £35,000, of which £25,000 is to be paid in cash, and £10,000 is to be paid in shares of any company which was to be formed by the contract company, and which is this company now in liquidation. That is one of the facts (the Master of the Rolls has called attention to many others) which present a very serious aspect. All I say is that it forms a part of what I consider to be a substantial basis that is made by this report for the judge directing that the public examination of Mr. Long shall take place.

I do not pursue the history of the Cater business; that has already been, I think, sufficiently dealt with. But here you have Mr. Long—I mean on the report, I am not saying a word against him in any other respect—endeavouring to pass off upon the public a business which is of little value through the medium of a contract with the promoting company, which promoting company had only got £35 in sovereigns, and never had any more. I think that that is a case that requires inquiry. I think that is a case in which Mr. Long probably, if he had not been advised to contest this, would say willingly: "I will face any public inquiry in regard to such a matter as this, and I can explain it all."

As to the decision in Ex parte Barnes I have nothing to add to what the Master of the Rolls has said except that in that case there was no charge of fraud made in the report, nor was there any statement of fact from which fraud could be inferred against the persons who were named as persons to be examined. For these reasons I agree with the Master of the Rolls.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case two questions have been raised. One is a question as to whether there was jurisdiction in the learned judge to make this order, and the second is whether the learned judge exercised a proper judicial discretion in making the order for the examination. Now, whatever may have been the view taken as to the conditions precedent to jurisdiction before the decision of the House of Lords in Ex parte Barnes, there can be no doubt that since that decision there are certain conditions precedent to the exercise of the jurisdiction which have been placed beyond the possibility of doubt. In the first place it is not sufficient that there should be the general report; there must be the further report; in the next place there can be no doubt that the further report must find fraud as against the persons against whom the order for public examination is asked; and lastly, there can be no doubt but that these persons against whom the order for public examination is to be made must fall within the categories mentioned in the beginning of sub-section 3 of section 8. I will just read that. [His lordship read the sub-section, and continued:] That does not mean that it is to be proved as a matter of fact that he does come within that category; but it does mean that the report must state that he comes within that category. Now, as to those conditions precedent there is no doubt at all. But there may be more questions as to what the nature of the finding of fraud against the individual must be before jurisdiction arises, and to a certain extent one has to look at sub-section 7 in order to get guidance as to this. Now, speaking for myself, I should hesitate very much to say that a mere narration as to the manner (to use the very words of the section) of the formation of the company, coupled with a statement that in the opinion of the official receiver fraud had been committed by A. B., would be sufficient to justify an order for the examination of A. B. I do not say that the judgment of the House of Lords in Ex parte Barnes is at all conclusive as to this point. But it does suggest that the statement of that opinion by the official receiver must be in such a shape that it can be said that there is a charge made against the person sought to be examined of such a kind that he can either exculpate himself or be incriminated. In my judgment that is essential to the exercise of the jurisdiction. I do not say that the decision in the House of Lords says so in so many words. It does not; but in my view that is necessary. The spirit of the decision of the House of Lords is that you are not to make an order for the examination of anyone unless he falls within those categories, and unless the judge is satisfied on the report that the report does make such a charge against the person sought to be examined, that he can know what it is that he must exculpate himself from, or if he fail, be incriminated with. In my judgment this report is on the borderline in both respects, so far as jurisdiction is concerned.

I think myself it is a great pity that this report not only does not use the words "take part in the promotion" (although I never think that much stress should be laid on using the very words of the section), but also carefully avoids from the beginning to the end of the report stating those facts from which it may be inferred that the person sought to be examined, in this case Mr. Long, took part in the promotion. Now, just let us see what the facts stated here are. They are stated a little in inverse order. Paragraph 3 in the report, which I think, in order to follow the chronology, should be read before paragraph 2, says: "Early in the year 1897 the contract company, with the assistance of Mr. Charles James Fox and Mr. Power, was engaged in promoting a scheme for amalgamating a number of army tailors and outfitters businesses, with the object of transferring the same to a company to be formed for the purpose of acquiring and carrying them on." So that one has got the contract company in existence who had this object. And paragraph 5 says, "With regard to W. Cater & Co. (Limited) it has transpired that the contract company"—that is, the company who were amalgamating these businesses—"were introduced by Mr. Cordeux Rhys (who afterwards became a director of the company) to Mr. Harry V. Long, of 8, Adam-street, Adelphi, who at that date was entitled by agreement to acquire the assets of W. Cater & Co. (Limited). As commission or remuneration for the introduction, Mr. Cordeux Rhys was to be entitled to one-half of the net profits made by Mr. Long on the sale to the company." That being the state of things, paragraph 2 says, "The promoters of the company were the Home, Foreign, and Colonial Contract Co. (Limited)," which we have called the contract company, "a company which was registered on the 10th of December, 1887, with a nominal capital of £1,000 in 200 shares of £5 each, but which has never had a larger subscribed capital than £35." It was not, therefore, a mushroom company, formed ad hoc, but it was a company that had been in existence many years. "The persons concerned in the promotion of the company"—by which I understand is meant the company which is in liquidation and which was formed for the purpose of amalgamating these businesses—that is, the contract company—"were Mr. Charles James Fox, Mr. John Power, Mr. H. L. Fox, Mr. C. T. Fox, Mr. H. V. Long, Mr. F. C. Westoby, Mr. Albert King, Mr. Cordeux Rhys, and Mr. Arthur Firmin." Thus far no fact is stated to show that Mr. Long took any part in the promotion, or that he was concerned in the promotion in any other respect than that he had done the things mentioned in paragraph 5—that is, having an option of buying the business of Cater & Co. (Limited), he, being introduced to this financing company by Mr. Rhys, agreed to pay Mr. Rhys a commission for having obtained a purchaser of his option. Now, there is not another syllable, as far as I know, from the beginning to the end of this report showing that Mr. Long took any part or did anything in respect to the promotion. There are statements which lead one to see that Mr. Long would have derived a very large profit from the sale to this company which is now in liquidation, because it is plain that the contract corporation, to whom Mr. Rhys introduced Mr. Long, could not have paid out of their own means, and that they were only a promoting company who expected to pay out of the profit they made from the company that they were forming to purchase. There is not any statement of anything that Mr. Long did in the course of the promotion of this purchasing company which is now in liquidation. It also appears upon the facts stated here that in 1895 an order was obtained putting a reserve, apparently on the occasion of an attempted sale to this company, of something between £8,000 and £9,000, and there are statements as to the moneys earned by Cater & Co. and they do not seem to have exceeded, to put them at the highest sum, more than £8,000. So it is perfectly plain upon the face of the report that Mr. Long was going to get a very handsome price for that which he was selling to the contract company and through the contract company to this purchasing company which was to be formed by it. Now, I can only say that, in my judgment, it is highly undesirable that a report should be drawn in this form, and although I cannot take upon myself to say that the exercise of Wright, J.'s, discretion was wrong in the matter, I confess that I should have had considerable hesitation before I drew the inference that the report sufficiently stated that Mr. Long took part in the promotion.

Then one comes to the form of the charge that appears in the final clause, which comes in between clause 26 and the beginning of the schedule, "the official receiver is of opinion that fraud has been committed by the persons named in the schedule hereto in the promotion or formation of the company, or in relation to the company since the formation thereof"; that is to say, it is a writing out of the section of each possible matter as to which a charge could be made. Then follow the names of the people in the schedule. As to Mr. Long it is said that he is one of the promoters. It is said that although this finding of the official receiver is in form so vague that it only amounts to saying that the persons respectively—I suppose it means—named in the schedule had been guilty of one or other of the offences mentioned in the section, yet that this means that Mr. Long was guilty of the offence that he promoted the purchasing company to purchase a business which was worthless, and worthless to his knowledge. I think myself that it is straining the language of the report a good deal to say that you can find in the report itself either such a definite charge against Mr. Long, or the facts upon which such a charge could be substantially based. But here again there is a question of fact, and Wright, J., is satisfied as to both matters. He is satisfied that the report sufficiently states that Mr. Long did take part in the promotion, and he is satisfied that the report sufficiently finds fraud against Mr. Long. I cannot say that, with regard to either of those matters, there is nothing in the report to support the finding, and I do not feel justified under those circumstances in differing from Wright, J., whose duty it was to deal with this matter. But I cannot help saying that I think that to be satisfied with the meagre statements that are made here on either of those two questions—that is to say, as to Mr. Long taking part in the promotion, or as to there being any charge against him of fraud in the promotion, is not to act in accordance with the spirit of the decision in the House of Lords. The spirit of the decision in the House of Lords, to my mind, is that in dealing with this section you must not consider only the interests of the company, the shareholders, and the public in getting all the information they can in a case where the facts show that somebody or other has been guilty of gross fraud; but you must take care that you do not subject any person to public examination merely because you are satisfied, or merely because the official receiver is satisfied, that somebody or other has been guilty of fraud against the company. The spirit of that decision is that you are not to subject anyone to this public examination unless you are satisfied on the report that the official receiver has come to the conclusion, and come to the conclusion upon some substantial grounds, that there is a charge disclosed by the facts against the person sought to be examined, and such a charge that he may know what it is from which he will have to exculpate himself, and with which he may know that it will be sought to incriminate him.

I cannot, I think, usefully say any more in this case, excepting to express my earnest hope that our decision in this case may not be considered a precedent for reports of this character by the official receiver; that in future when reports are made by the official receiver, if he means to say that a particular person ought to be examined because he took part in the promotion, he will either say so in so many words, or will make statements of fact from which it can be inferred; and if he means to say that he not only took part in the promotion, but that he took part in a fraud, which is suggested to have been committed by some persons in the promotion, that he will definitely say so.

Petition.

Under the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, a husband had effected a policy in favour of his widow. The husband having lately died, the widow now applied for the appointment of trustees to receive the sum secured by the policy. The petition was headed in the matter of the Act, 1870, and the policy trusts.

On the petition coming on a question arose as to whether the petition ought not also to be entitled in the matter of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

Sprake v. Day. (a.)

Will—Contract entered into by testator—Devise—Non-completion of contract at time of testator's death—Right of devisee.

Where a testator devised land by his will and entered into a contract for the building of cottages on such land, which contract was unfinished at the time of his death.

Held (following Cooper v. Jarman, 15 W. R. 142, L. R. 3 Eq. 98), that the devisee was entitled to have the contract completed at the cost of the estate.

But this principle does not apply to land already conveyed to devisee before testator's death.

Summons.

This was a summons taken out in an administration action asking that the following supplemental inquiry might be directed—viz., "Whether the testator at the time of his death had entered into any and what building contracts still remaining uncompleted, and whether the estate of the testator is under any liability in respect thereof, and what sums of money would have to be provided in order to have the contracts completed."

The testator had by his will devised his dwelling-house and appurtenances to the defendant Mrs. Sprake-Day during her life and after her death to her daughter, and after the death of the survivor the testator directed that the said premises should fall into his residuary estate. Some time before the testator's death he had entered into contracts to have cottages built on the estate devised to Mrs. Sprake-Day and also on certain other land situate at Misterton, which, though originally belonging to the testator, had some time before been conveyed by him to Mrs. Sprake-Day. These contracts were not finished when the testator died, and Mrs. Sprake-Day claimed to have them finished and have the costs thrown on the personal estate left by the testator.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and Romer, for Mrs. Sprake-Day, relied on Holt v. Holt, 2 Vern. 322, and Cooper v. Jarman, 15 W. R. 142, L. R. 3 Eq. 98, as covering the case of the land devised, and argued that the principle extended to the land which had been conveyed.

E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and T. H. Carson, for the executors.—The case of Cooper v. Jarman stands by itself, and was decided on the ground that the heir-at-law had himself carried out the contract, and he was allowed the cost of so doing, but here the executors refuse to go on with the contract. In any event that case does not cover the Misterton property.

Romer replied.

North, J., held that as regards the property devised he would follow Cooper v. Jarman, which, although it had never been followed, had yet stood for a number of years without being reversed or commented on. But as regards the Misterton property he held that as there was no consideration passing from Mrs. Sprake-Day she could not claim to have the contract completed, for as regards this property she was in the position of a stranger, and could not ask for a contract entered into by the testator to be completed for her benefit.

in respect of a sale of the defendant's business to the plaintiff company. The facts of the case so far as the same call for a report were as follow: Under an agreement bearing date the 5th of April, 1888, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs the business as existing on the 31st of December, 1887, with the goodwill thereof, trade-marks, patent rights, &c., also the stock-in-trade, plant, and effects, and all book and other debts due to the vendor in connection with the said business, and the full benefit of all securities for such debts, and of all engagements, rights, and privileges of the vendor in relation to the said business. At the trial Byrne, J., dismissed the action so far as related to the claim for damages, but directed an inquiry as to whether the defendant had received any debts, &c., belonging to the business since the 1st of January, 1888. On the inquiry, the defendant admitted that on the 31st of December, 1887, he was in possession of cheques and bills received by him in respect of debts belonging to the business, but which he had not cashed until after that date. The matter, therefore, again came before the court.

Astbury, Q.C., and Kirby, for the plaintiffs.—The matter may be put in two ways. It may be said that the sums in respect of which the uncashed cheques were given were debts. In that case as these debts were not paid on the 31st of December, 1887, they passed to the purchasers. Or the cheques and bills may be regarded as securities for debts, in which case also they passed to the purchasers under the agreement.

They referred to Currie v. Misa, 23 W. R. 450, L. R. 10, Ex. 153; M'Lean v. Clydesdale Banking Co., 9 App. Cas. 95, 32 W. R. Dig. 35.

Ere, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the defendant.—A payment by cheque of a debt is a good conditional payment. It is distinctly a conditional payment, and the debt revives only if the cheque is dishonoured: Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191.

They referred to the observations of Lord Blackburn in M'Lean v. Clydesdale Banking Co.

Astbury, Q.C., replied.

BYRNE, J.—The point that I have to decide here turns upon the proper construction to be put upon the agreement of the 5th of April, 1888. [His lordship proceeded to state the terms of the agreement, and continued:] The sale was therefore to include all book and other debts due to the vendor in connection with the said business, the full benefit of all securities for such debts and of all contracts, engagements, rights, and privileges of the vendor in relation to the said business. On or before the 31st of December, 1887, the vendor received cheques and bills in payment of debts due to him. Such bills or cheques were not met or honoured on that day, and it is said that these debts therefore are debts included within this clause of the contract. I do not think that this is the true view to take of it. I think that the true view is that when debts were paid conditionally or unconditionally, such debts were not meant to pass to the purchasers. In this case I think that what took place amounted to a conditional payment of the debts, the condition being that the cheque or bill should be duly met or honoured at the proper date. If that be the true view, then I think that the position is exactly as if an agreement had been expressly made that bills or cheques should operate as payment unless defeated by dishonour by not being met, and I think that that agreement is implied from the giving and taking the cheques and bills in question. Then with regard to the words "Full benefit of all securities for such debts." Those words mean all running securities for such debts as have not conditionally or unconditionally been paid upon that date. If these bills or cheques had not been duly met the debts would have revived; but inasmuch as they have been duly met, I consider that, the condition having been observed, there was payment as from the date of giving the bills and cheques.

JONES v. BEIRNSTEIN. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distress—Pound breach—Possession—Abandonment—11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 10.

To maintain an action for pound breach or rescue of goods distrained for rent it is not necessary, even as against the true owner thereof, that the plaintiff should retain actual possession of the goods.

Appeal from the Southwark County Court.

The plaintiff levied a distress upon the premises of Morrisey, his tenant, for £12 10s. arrears of rent. A man, Kay, was put into possession of the goods upon the premises. A large part of the goods belonged to the defendant, who had let them to Morrisey on a hire-purchase agreement. Kay went home every night, returning the following morning. On Saturday, the 16th of July, he left the premises at 8.30 p.m., intending to return on Monday morning. Shortly after his departure the defendant removed the goods from the premises. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action in the county court for treble damages for pound breach.

The learned county court judge found that Kay abandoned possession of the goods, there being no reasonable necessity for his absence, but that he did not abandon the distress, and upon these findings he gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that real possession was required, allowing for absences reasonably necessary.

J. D. Crawford, for the plaintiff.—Actual possession of goods impounded under a distress is not necessary even against the true owner: Bagshawes (Limited) v. Deacon, 46 W. R. 618, [1898] 2 Q. B. 173, which was founded on Ackland v. Paynter, 8 Price, 95, does not apply. The goods were there taken under an execution, and the law with regard to distress is different. Prior to 1737 it is clear that no possession was necessary. The goods or cattle distrained were put into a public pound. The law is thus stated in Co. Litt. at p. 476: "If the distress be taken of goods without cause, the owner may recover; but if they be distrained without cause and impounded, the owner cannot break the pound and take them out, because they are in the custody of the law." This passage is cited in Parret Navigation Co. v. Stower, 6 M. & W. 564. Section 10 of the Act 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, passed in the interest as well of the tenant as of the landlord, provides as follows: ". . . it shall and may be lawful to and for any person or persons lawfully taking any distress for any kind of rent, to impound or otherwise secure the distress, of what nature or kind soever it may be, in such place or on such part of the premises chargeable with the rent as shall be most convenient for impounding and securing such distress. . . ." To impound goods under this provision in a private house nothing more was required than what was formerly required in impounding goods in a public pound: Washborn v. Black, 11 East, 405 (note); Swan v. Falmouth (Earl of), 8 B. & C. 456; Firth v. Purvis, 5 T. R. 432; Kemp v. Christmas, 79 L. T. 233; Clerk and Lindsell on Torts (2nd ed.), p. 261.

Green, Q.C. (Schwabe with him).—In 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 10, a distinction is drawn between "impounding" and "otherwise securing." The goods here were "otherwise secured," and the presence of the man in possession was necessary to indicate which of the goods were in the custody of the law. The goods were distrained, but there was no impounding. In order to properly impound the goods it is necessary to collect the goods so impounded into one or more rooms: see Bullen's Law of Distress, p. 147. The goods having been only otherwise secured and not impounded, as soon as the possession ceased they were free. No action for tresspass would lie by the distrainer and a fortiori no action for pound breach: Tennant v. Field, 6 W. R. 11, 8 E. & B. 336; Thomas v. Harries, 1 Man. & Gr. 695.

LAWRANCE, J.—The question is whether as against the true owner of goods taken in distress real possession is necessary on the part of the distrainer. I think the county court judge was wrong. I cannot see that the true owner is in any better position than the tenant of the property on which the distress is made. It is clear from the case of Bannister v. Hyde, 2 El. & El. 627, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 26, that there is ample authority that it is not necessary to have anyone on the premises. For these reasons, without deciding what is necessary to be done in every case, I think the learned county court judge was wrong.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to maintain an action for pound breach it is necessary to show that the goods are in the custody of the law. It is said that it is necessary in order to keep them in the custody of the law that the party distraining them should retain actual posession. It seems, however, that if once they are in the custody of the law retention of possession is not necessary. If the distrainer goes out with the intention of abandoning the distress, the goods are then out of the custody of the law, but it is not necessary that he should remain in actual possession. That was decided in Bannister v. Hyde. It makes no difference whether you assume the goods were impounded or not—whatever does constitute impounding. Probably simply taking possession is sufficient to constitute impounding. The action for pound breach therefore lies in this case, and the learned county court judge was wrong. In Kemp v. Christmas the point raised here was assumed.

MELLOR v. TOMKINSON. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries — Building — Building over thirty feet in height — Building on which machinery is used—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 1.

According to the true construction of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, employment on a building on which machinery is used for the purpose of the construction, repair, or demolition thereof, is within the Act, although the building does not exceed thirty feet in height.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Liverpool County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

This was a claim by a workman to recover from his employers compensation for accidental injuries suffered by him in the course of his employment. At the time of the accident the workman was engaged in the construction of a building which did not exceed thirty feet in height, but on which machinery driven by mechanical power was being used for the purpose of the construction thereof.

By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "This Act shall apply . . . to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished, or on which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is being used for the purpose of the construction, repair, or demolition thereof."

The county court judge held that the case came within the statute, and made an award in favour of the workman.

The employers appealed.

Clavell Salter, for the appellants.—No building is within the statute, unless it is over thirty feet high. The words "which exceeds thirty feet in height" govern all the remaining words down to the end of the sub-section. In order to bring a building within the statute it must be shown, in the first place, that it is over thirty feet high, and, in the second place, either that it is being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or that it is being demolished, or that machinery driven by mechanical power is being used on it.

Pickford, Q.C., and Segar, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is as to the construction of that part of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act which relates to buildings. I read the sub-section as meaning this: the Act is to apply to any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and which is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or is being demolished. There the sub-section pauses. The words "which exceeds thirty feet in height" are only coupled with the words "and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished." Then the sub-section proceeds: "or on which"—that is to say, the Act is to apply to any building on which—"machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is being used for the purpose of the construction, repair, or demolition thereof." Therefore, if a workman sustains injuries by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, while he is engaged on a building on which machinery driven by mechanical power is being used for the purposes of construction, repair, or demolition, he is within the Act, and it is not necessary that the building should be thirty feet high. The appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. According to the natural grammatical construction of the sub-section, the antecedent to the word "which" in the clause "or on which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is being used," is "any building," not "any building which exceeds thirty feet in height." The Legislature evidently considered employment on a building on which machinery driven by mechanical power is used as being a distinct class of dangerous employment apart from employment on a building over thirty feet high.

COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

HODSON AND WIFE v. PARE. (a.)

Libel—Defamation—Absolute privilege—Lunacy proceedings — Petition for reception order — Judicial proceedings—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), ss. 4, 5, 6, 9, 28.

Proceedings instituted by petition under the Lunacy Act, 1890, ss. 4 and 5, for a reception order are judicial proceedings, and therefore a defamatory statement made in the statement of particulars accompanying the petition is absolutely privileged.

Appeal from the refusal of Grantham, J., at chambers to order the statement of claim to be struck out as disclosing no cause of action, and the action to be dismissed as vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court.

The statement of claim was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are the father and mother of the defendant's wife and of two other daughters who are unmarried and of five sons.

2. On or about the 16th of August, 1898, the defendant presented a petition for a reception order in respect of his said wife pursuant to the provisions of the Lunacy Act, 1890, ss. 4 and 5, and signed a statement of particulars by which such petition was accompanied, and caused the said petition and statement of particulars to be delivered and presented to Richard Gleed as a justice of the peace for the parts of Holland, Lincolnshire, having jurisdiction in the place where the defendant's said wife was then alleged by him to be.

3. The defendant in the said statement of particulars falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the female plaintiff in the form of an answer to the question "whether any near relative has been afflicted with insanity," the words following, that is to say: "Yes" (meaning thereby that some near relative of his said wife had been afflicted with insanity), "her mother with puerperal mania" (meaning thereby that the female plaintiff had been afflicted with that form of insanity).

4. The defendant further meant by the said words that the plaintiffs' children had an hereditary predisposition to insanity, and that his said wife, as one of them, was then insane in consequence of such predisposition.

5. By reason of the premises the plaintiffs have respectively been brought into contempt and disrepute, both personally and in respect of their children, and have suffered great annoyance and been injured in their social reputation and character as a family.

Each of the plaintiffs claims £1,000.

The master having ordered the statement of claim to be struck out as disclosing no cause of action, and the action to be dismissed as vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court, Grantham, J., discharged this order upon the ground that the case was not one to be dealt with on a summary application.

The defendant appealed.

R. M. Bray, Q.C., and Willoughby Williams, for the defendant.—The statement of claim discloses no cause of action. The proceedings before the justice as described in the statement of claim were judicial proceedings, and any statement made in the course thereof is absolutely privileged. By section 4, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, a person, not being a pauper or a lunatic so found by inquisition, shall not be received and detained as a lunatic unless under a reception order made by the judicial authority thereinafter mentioned; and by sub-section 2 the order must be obtained upon a private application by petition, accompanied by a statement of particulars and by two medical certificates on separate sheets of paper. By section 5, sub-section 4, the petition has to be signed by the petitioner and the statement of particulars by the person making it. The form of the statement of particulars is given in Form 2, Schedule II., of the Act, and the statement complained of as defamatory was given in answer to a question specified in that form, "whether any near relative has been afflicted with insanity." By section 6 the judicial authority, before making the order, shall consider the allegations in the petition and statement of particulars and the evidance of lunacy appearing by the medical certificates. By section 9, sub-section 1, the "judicial authority" is defined to mean a justice of the peace specially appointed, a county court judge, or a stipendiary magistrate. These provisions of the Act show that the proceedings are judicial, and therefore the statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action, and as a demurrer would formerly have succeeded, the court may now order the action to be dismissed: per Lord Selborne, L.C., in Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, at p. 710, 10 App. Cas. 210, at p. 215. [They also referred to Lilley v. Roney, 61 L. J. Q. B. 727, 41 W. R. Dig. 64.] Secondly, the words complained of are not capable of a defamatory meaning, and upon this ground also the learned judge was wrong.

Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Etherington Smith, for the plaintiffs.—These proceedings are not judicial proceedings either in their nature or in their result. They are administrative proceedings. The evidence is not given on oath. The judicial authority merely reads the documents and makes or refuses to make the order, though by section 9, sub-section 2, he has power to summon witnesses and examine them on oath. Further, no notice is given to the alleged lunatic or to the relatives to appear and contest the matter, or to cross-examine. The alleged lunatic has no right to call evidence as to her sanity. Nor are the proceedings heard in public. These facts show that the proceedings are not judicial. The order does not decide anything, nor does it affect the status of the alleged lunatic: section 72, sub-section 1. It is a mere temporary disposal of the alleged lunatic for a few hours: section 8. The operative words in the order (Form 3) are the same as those in an urgency order (Form 4), which, by section 11, sub-section 1, must be signed, if possible, by the husband or wife or a relative of the alleged lunatic, and which is clearly not an order made in a judicial proceeding. The phrase "judicial authority" does not show that the proceedings are judicial, because a judicial authority frequently acts in merely administrative matters. Part I. of the Act, which deals with reception orders, is not judicial in its character; whereas Part III., which is headed "Judicial Inquisition as to Lunacy," is clearly judicial. The statements complained of, therefore, are not absolutely privileged. At any rate, this is not a case for the application of the summary powers conferred by ord. 25, r. 4.

They referred to Royal Aquarium, &c., Society v. Parkinson, 40 W. R. 450, [1892] 1 Q. B. 431.

Willoughby Williams, in reply.—As regards the objection that the evidence is not given on oath, the medical certificates are, by section 28, sub-section 4, made evidence of the facts therein appearing, and of the judgment therein stated to have been formed, as if the matters therein appearing had been verified on oath. The Act makes the statements in the petition, in the statement of particulars, and in the medical certificates evidence; and by section 317 any person making a wilful misstatement of any material fact therein shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an application under ord. 25, r. 4, to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no cause of action, and to dismiss the action as vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court. The statement of claim is drawn so that it raises in a neat form the question whether proceedings instituted under sections 4 and 5 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, are judicial or administrative. If the former, the statement complained of is absolutely privileged; if the latter, it is not. Therefore we must see whether the statement was made in the course of judicial proceedings. The statement was made to a justice of the peace in the course of proceedings instituted for the purpose of obtaining a reception order authorizing the detention of a lady under the provisions of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Section 4, sub-section 1, of the Act, dealing with reception orders, provides that "subject to the exceptions in this Act mentioned, a person, not being a pauper or a lunatic so found by inquisition, shall not be received and detained as a lunatic in an institution for lunatics, or as a single patient, unless under a reception order made by the judicial authority hereinafter mentioned. . . ." To see what is the "judicial authority," I turn to section 9, which by sub-section 1 provides that "the powers of the judicial authority under this Act shall be exercised by a justice of the peace specially appointed as hereinafter provided, or a judge of county courts, or magistrate," the word magistrate being defined, by section 341, to mean a stipendiary or metropolitan police magistrate. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs is that the judicial authority in hearing an application for a reception order merely exercises administrative duties, just as in the case of Royal Aquarium, &c., Society v. Parkinson it was held that the London County Council, when engaged in hearing applications for music and dancing licences, act administratively. It seems to me to be clear, reading the various sections of the Act, that the judicial authority, in the exercise of lunacy jurisdiction under this part of the Act, is exercising judicial as distinguished from administrative functions. In opposition to this view it is first of all said that the judicial authority does not take evidence on oath. The answer to that contention seems to me to be this, that the statements in the petition, in the statement of particulars, and in the medical certificates are made evidence by the Act: section 6, section 1; and by section 28, sub-section 4, every medical certificate is made evidence of the facts therein appearing, and of the judgment therein stated to have been formed by the medical practitioners on such facts, as if the matters therein appearing had been verified on oath; and as a protection, section 317 enacts that any person who makes a wilful misstatement in any of these documents shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. It is next said that the alleged lunatic is not heard before the judicial authority, nor given the opportunity of appearing or being represented, and that this shows that the proceedings are not judicial. To my mind that cannot affect the question of absolute privilege. It has been held* that a statement made on an ex parte application to justices sitting in court is absolutely privileged. It is then said that the reception order does not affect the status of the alleged lunatic. I cannot agree with that view. So long as the order stands the alleged lunatic is not entitled to go free. I have therefore come to the conclusion, upon the true construction of the Act, that the justice of the peace, in exercising his jurisdiction in regard to lunacy matters as set out in the statement of claim, was exercising judicial as distinct from administrative functions, and that anything said in the course of those proceedings before him is absolutely privileged. The order, therefore, of the master must be restored.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is a short one. If these proceedings are administrative, the privilege is not absolute; if they are judicial, the privilege is absolute. To my mind the answer to the question can only be that the proceedings are judicial according to the statute. The proceedings commence with a petition accompanied by a statement of particulars and two medical certificates: section 4, sub-section 2; and by section 5, sub-section 4, the petition is to be signed by the petitioner, and the statement of particulars by the person making it. The statement of particulars required is given in Form 2 in Schedule II. of the Act, and the statement alleged to be defamatory in the present case was made in answer to a question set out in the form, namely, "whether any near relative has been afflicted with insanity." It is said that the evidence is not given on oath. But the Act says what shall be sufficient evidence: section 6, sub-section 1, and section 28, sub-section 4; and by section 317 any person who makes a wilful misstatement shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. The Act has thus safeguarded the proceedings by making the petitioner, the person signing the statement of particulars, and the medical men subject to punishment if they make a wilful misstatement. Then there come the sections (section 6, sub-section 4; section 9, sub-section which empower the judicial authority to summon any persons before him and to administer an oath. I therefore come to the conclusion that this statement of claim discloses no cause of action, and in my opinion the second part of ord. 25, r. 4, should be applied, and the action dismissed.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This is a case which has taken some considerable time, and which is of enormous practical importance; for, covered with a multitude of technicalities, there is, behind, a question of the utmost possible importance to people who promote and form these public companies.

There was, it appears, a person of the name of Carl Hirth, who was a trader. There was an action, or several actions, pending against him, and he thought that he would turn his business into a limited company, and so he did. The company was formed for the purpose (according to its memorandum of association) of taking over his business for a sum of £3,000. The capital of the company was to consist of 3,000 shares of £1 each. Of course—to use, not accurate legal language, but colloquial language—Hirth was the company. Of course there were seven members; the requirements of the Companies Acts were in form carefully complied with. But Hirth was the managing director, he was the secretary, he was everything. He could, and did, draw cheques as he liked, and nearly all the cheques he drew were payable to himself. He has now become bankrupt, and the company to which he sold his business is being wound up; and in consequence there is a struggle between Hirth's trustee in bankruptcy, who represents Hirth's personal creditors, and the liquidator of Hirth & Co. (Limited), who, of course, represented the creditors of the company. The question between those parties is, which set of creditors is to get the assets which Hirth sold—as he calls it—to this company. If the decision of this court should now be in favour of the company the practical result would be that much greater frauds could be perpetrated by traders in difficulties than can be perpetrated even now. Though, to a certain extent, these bubble companies have been declared by the House of Lords to be legal, yet nothing in the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (Limited), to which, of course, we all bow, touches the point which we have now to decide. Salomon v. Salomon was, of course, a decision of the utmost importance. It decided that a company can be legitimately formed under the Companies Acts by one man, or by one or two men, all the rest of the subscribers to the memorandum being mere men of straw. Such companies are now ascertained to be legal, and there is, in the present state of the law, no machinery by which they can be extinguished. The question in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. was whether the company can first of all present a petition for winding itself up, and then get out of the bargain it had made with its founder. But in that case the question was never raised whether the creditors of the sole trader can impeach the transaction as a fraud upon his creditors under the statute of Queen Elizabeth, or as an act of bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The point now raised is new to all of us, and, as will be obvious to all who have followed me in what I have just said, is one of enormous practical importance to all those concerned in the formation of such companies. I have come to the conclusion that this appeal ought to succeed. I think the view taken by the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. Hirth is the right one, and that the difficulty felt by Wright, J., in giving effect to that view can be got over. It seems to me plain that the transaction carried out by the agreement of the 7th of March, 1898, was a juggle and a fraud. That, I think, admits of no doubt at all to anybody who has attended to the evidence. There may be a difficulty—I think there is a difficulty—in saying whether that transaction can be reached under the statute of Elizabeth as a fraud upon creditors. Perhaps it can be more easily reached under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. To enable it to be reached under the statute of Elizabeth, it must be shown that the transfer included all, or substantially all, of Hirth's property, and that the transferee knew that the transferor was cheating his creditors. I do not say that we have evidence which ought to satisfy us judicially that the company did know that. I have a very strong opinion upon that point, but I think it is safer not to go the length of saying that the company was a party to the fraud. But this case appears to me to fall within the 4th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. [His lordship read sub-section 1 (b) of that section, and proceeded:] This enactment enormously extends that contained in the statute of Elizabeth. You have not now to consider whether the person who takes the debtor's property knows anything about the fraud which the debtor is committing upon his creditors, and you have not to consider whether that which is transferred is the whole, or substantially the whole, of the debtor's property. You have simply to consider the debtor's own position, and to see what he has done; and if you find that he has made "a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer," then he has committed an act of bankruptcy. That is what this section says: it says nothing at all about a void or voidable transaction, or about anything else except a fraudulent conveyance.

Now, without going through the evidence, I think there can be no doubt, so far as Hirth is concerned, that the purpose of the transaction with the company, Hirth & Co. (Limited), was to defeat the persons who, at the time of the formation of the company, were bringing actions against the debtor. That, I think, is as plain as the nose on a man's face. The company was formed on the 7th of March, 1898, and at that time there were several actions pending against Hirth. An agreement was entered into between Hirth and the company for the sale to the company of Hirth's property for a sum of £3,000, and so on. The company continued to carry on business, more or less, for some time. In May, 1898, not very long afterwards, the costs which were being incurred against Hirth, and which he wished to escape paying, were taxed and ascertained. On the 3rd of May a bankruptcy notice was issued against him in respect of those costs, and afterwards, that notice not being complied with, a bankruptcy petition was presented against him, and a receiving order was made on that petition on the 27th of May, 1898. On the 2nd of August, 1898, the trustee subsequently appointed in Hirth's bankruptcy elected to treat, or determined to treat, the transaction of the 7th of March, 1898, as invalid as against Hirth's creditors, and applied to have that transaction set aside. Of course, if the trustee in bankruptcy is right, the liquidator of the company must hand over to him such assets belonging to Hirth as have come into the liquidator's possession in the liquidation. We have heard to-day a long discussion about void and voidable transactions; about which discussion, as it seems to me, it is necessary for us to say very little indeed. I have already called attention to the important fact that section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—the section which lies at the very foundation of the law on this subject—says nothing at all about void and voidable transactions, but simply provides that certain acts therein mentioned shall be acts of bankruptcy. Pausing there for a moment, it is impossible to say that, because a sale or conveyance is by that section made an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of that Act, it is therefore void, and of no effect. That that is an impossible view is obvious, because although a man may commit an act of bankruptcy he may yet never be adjudicated bankrupt; and, of course, if he is not, all this talk about void and voidable transactions is beside the mark.

Then I pass on to the sections which have to be considered for the purpose of deciding the real question now raised—those sections which deal with the disposition of the property of a man who has committed an act of bankruptcy. The first of any importance is section 43, which embodies, with regard to the trustee in bankruptcy, what is called the doctrine of "relation back." [His lordship read the section.] That section is very important. There is no talk in it about "void" and "voidable." Hirth having been adjudicated bankrupt upon a petition presented on the 12th of May, 1898, his bankruptcy relates back to the 7th of March, 1898, the date of the assignment to the company, if that assignment was, as it clearly in fact was, a fraudulent conveyance within the meaning of the fourth section of the same Act, which I have already read. Now we are getting on to ground where it becomes important to speak of void and voidable dealings. What is the effect of this relation back? Its effect is to be gathered from section 44, which vests in the trustee in bankruptcy all the assets of the bankrupt. [His lordship read it.]

Now we have to consider this question: What is the position of a trustee in bankruptcy who finds that there has been a fraudulent conveyance which has been an act of bankruptcy, and who elects to treat that as an act of bankruptcy, and to upset it? It appears to me that absolutely no answer at all can be made to his claim to do so. There are, as we know, certain provisions in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as to protected transactions, and, of course, if this transaction is protected by those provisions, the trustee in bankruptcy cannot impugn it. But, so far as I have yet gone, there is nothing which points to any difficulty at all in the way of the trustee's application. Hirth's trustee in bankruptcy claims this property. The conveyance, which was an act of bankruptcy, was avoided by section 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as from its date, being overreached by the bankruptcy petition. So far there is no difference between the view we are now taking and the view taken by the learned judge in the court below.

But we have now to consider the effect upon the trustee's rights of the winding-up of the company. Supposing this company were a person and not a corporation, what effect could that person's bankruptcy have upon the trustee's rights? None. What effect, then, has the winding-up of the company? It appears to me that it has simply none at all, and for this reason: the provisions in the Companies Act, 1862, which prevent any alteration in the status of bankrupt companies have no bearing at all on mere outsiders, and Hirth's trustee in bankruptcy is an outsider. There is no provision in the Companies Acts which prevents the claim of the trustee being prosecuted against the liquidator, except sections 85 and 87, which enact that after the presentation of a winding-up petition actions, suits, and proceedings may be restrained; and that after a winding-up order no action, suit, or proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced. Mr. Herbert Reed said that the winding-up resolution alters the rights of the creditors by making them liable to have their actions stopped, and that the creditors, having had their rights altered so that that may be done, ought to be treated as being, in a sense, secured creditors, and as having preferential claims. That argument would be all very well if the title of the trustee in bankruptcy could be treated as accruing only when he gave notice of his intention to impeach the transaction. In short, the argument might be good as against anybody except a trustee in bankruptcy, whose title relates back to the commencement of the bankruptcy. That "relation back" is peculiar to bankruptcy, and it is because the property is the trustee's as from an anterior date that no valid title can be acquired against him in the winding-up, and that he can upset all those transactions upon which Mr. Reed relied as an answer to his claim. That is the only point which has presented any difficulty, but I think I have shown how the language of sections 43 and 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, concludes the matter. There is really no difficulty when you understand the question and the sections of the Bankruptcy Act.

The appeal must therefore be allowed, and an order must be made for the handing over by the liquidator of the assets in his hands to Hirth's trustee in bankruptcy. The liquidator will be allowed any costs he has properly incurred in getting in the assets; but I do not suppose he will expect any costs of these proceedings. We shall not make him pay any costs. The trustee in bankruptcy will get his costs out of the assets when he receives them.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I shall deal only with that part of the case where we differ from Wright, J. The learned judge held that the mere commencement of the winding up is an absolute bar to the recovery of the property which belonged to the bankrupt, and which has been transferred to the company by a transfer constituting an act of bankruptcy. If that decision stood it would place in the hands of persons who wish to avoid payment of their debts a very simple machinery by which they could, to a very large extent indeed, avoid such payment. All that such persons would have to do would be to form a bubble company, and to wait until they saw whether their creditors (or the trustee in bankruptcy, as in this case) were going to take proceedings to recover the property which manifestly belongs to them and not to the company. If the creditors do take such proceedings, then the company would pass a resolution for winding up, and from that time forth that property, which belonged in every way to the bankrupt, the promoter of the company, would be beyond the reach of his creditors.

I agree that the appeal ought to be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I want only to correct a mistake which I made myself in the course of the argument to-day. When the case of In re Carey, Ex parte Jeffreys, was first mentioned I had not the report before me, and I thought I had in that case made an order preserving the rights of the bonâ fide creditors of the company upon the basis that they had acquired certain rights as members of the company, and that the property passed, subject to their rights, to the trustee in bankruptcy. The company being in liquidation, and the creditors of the company having got rights in the nature of a charge by reason of the appointment of a liquidator. On looking at the case I see that that was not so; and I see that the ground on which I decided that case cannot, since Salomon v. Salomon & Co., be supported. That is to say, when I decided Broderip v. Salomon, before it went to the House of Lords as Salomon v. Salomon, I treated the trader who had formed this company for the purpose of carrying on his business as the principal and the company as the agent. I was of opinion, when I decided In re Carey, that the creditors of the bankrupt could not stand in any better position than their bankrupt, and that, therefore, the relation of principal and agent existing between the trader and the company, and the trader being bound to indemnify his agent against liabilities incurred by his agent at his direction, that gave the creditors of the agent priority. Of course, since the decision in Salomon v. Salomon, that cannot be supported.

I really have nothing to add to the exhaustive judgments already delivered by the other members of the court. But I do wish to say that on the facts of this case I should myself have been perfectly prepared to hold that on the 7th of March, 1898, the date of the conveyance of this property to the company, the company, by its agent, the managing director (Hirth himself), had notice of the true nature of the transaction, so as to bring the company itself within operation of the statute of Elizabeth, and that it has further had full notice for the purpose either of preventing the company taking advantage of the protective sections of the Bankruptcy Act, or of preventing the company from in any way successfully claiming the position of a bonâ fide purchaser without notice.

Appeal allowed.

NEWBY v. ECKERSLEY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Agricultural holding—Compensation for improvements—Special bargain—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 57.

By an agreement between the tenant of a farm and his landlord it was agreed that the tenant should quit the farm on a day named within the space of two months, and that, in consideration thereof, the landlord should pay him reasonable compensation in respect of certain unexhausted improvements under four heads, one of them being a matter for compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, the other three being outside the Act.

Held, that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Agricultural Holdings Act, such agreement was valid, and the tenant might maintain an action against the landlord to recover compensation thereunder.

Appeal from the judgment of Lawrance, J., at the trial of the action with a jury at Leeds Assizes.

The action was brought by the outgoing tenant of a farm against his landlord to recover compensation in respect of certain unexhausted improvements under the following circumstances:

The plaintiff was the holder of a farm on a tenancy from year to year determinable by six months' notice under a lease dated the 29th of April, 1886.

On the 17th of December, 1896, it was orally agreed between the parties that the plaintiff should give up possession of the farm on the 2nd of February, 1897, and should receive from the defendant reasonable compensation in respect of certain unexhausted improvements—viz.: (1) Purchase of feeding stuff consumed on the holding; (2) value of hay left on the holding; (3) a new floor to a barn; (4) cost of manuring eight acres. The amount of the compensation was to be fixed by two valuers, and two referees were accordingly appointed for the purpose. In pursuance of this agreement the plaintiff quitted the farm on the 2nd of February. In the course of correspondence which followed between the parties, the defendant raised the point that the plaintiff had not given notice of his intention to claim compensation two months before the determination of the tenancy under section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883; but he waived the objection on condition that the valuers should also fix the amount of dilapidations for which the plaintiff was liable to him. The valuers met and agreed upon the amount of compensation payable by the defendant as follows—viz.: for purchase of feeding stuff consumed on the holding, £120 19s. 8d.; for hay left, £13 1s.; for new floor to barn, £1 5s.; and for cost of manuring, £4. They could not, however, agree on the question of dilapidations, and consequently they did not make any award; neither did they appoint an umpire in accordance with the provisions of section 9 of the Agricultural Holdings Act. The defendant having refused to pay compensation, the plaintiff brought this action to enforce the agreement entered into between the parties, and he claimed compensation as fixed by the referees. The defendant counterclaimed for dilapidations. At the trial, the jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiff in respect of his claim, the defendant took the objection that the action was not maintainable, and that the plaintiff's proper course was to proceed in accordance with the provisions contained in the Agricultural Holdings Act. Lawrance, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim, but stayed execution, saying that the parties might settle between themselves the amount of the dilapidations, and that that sum should be deducted from the amount of the plaintiff's claim. The defendant appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and R. A. Shepherd, for the defendant.—The High Court is not the proper tribunal to determine this matter. The plaintiff's only remedy is to follow the procedure provided by the Agricultural Holdings Act. The first and principal item in respect of which he claims compensation—viz., purchase of feeding stuff, is an improvement to which the Act applies: see First Schedule, Part III. Section 57 says that "a tenant shall not be entitled to claim compensation by custom or otherwise than in manner authorized by this Act in respect of any improvement for which he is entitled to compensation under or in pursuance of this Act." The effect of that section is to invalidate bargains such as that made in the present case.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and G. J. Banks, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by the outgoing tenant of a farm against his landlord to enforce a bargain that if the tenant went out of possession before the expiration of his tenancy the landlord would pay him reasonable compensation to be settled by two valuers for unexhausted improvements under four heads, one of them being a matter for compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, the other three being matters outside the Act. The defendant says that the plaintiff cannot bring this action because the making of such a bargain is prohibited by the Agricultural Holdings Act. The question is whether by that Act a landlord and tenant are prohibited from bargaining with one another as to the terms on which the tenant should go out with regard to payment of compensation for unexhausted improvements. No doubt an Act of Parliament may contain an express prohibition against contracting out, as was in fact done in the Ground Game Act, 1880, s. 3. But I cannot find any such prohibition in the Agricultural Holdings Act, and therefore it seems to me that this bargain was a good bargain. It is argued that section 57 contains such a prohibition. That section says that "a tenant shall not be entitled to claim compensation by custom or otherwise than in manner authorized by this Act in respect of any improvement for which he is entitled to compensation under or in pursuance of this Act." Section 1 gives an outgoing tenant a general right to compensation in respect of certain classes of improvements, section 7 requires that a tenant claiming compensation under the Act shall give two months' notice of his claim, and succeeding sections deal with the settling of claims for compensation under the Act. I think that section 57 ought to be construed as applying only to a tenant claiming compensation under the Act, and as meaning that such a tenant shall not claim otherwise than in manner authorized by the Act. Here the plaintiff does not claim under the Act, for he claims in respect of matters which are not mentioned in the Act. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—It is said on the part of the defendant that this bargain was void by reason of the Agricultural Holdings Act. I am of opinion that it was a perfectly valid bargain, for the Act does not prevent persons contracting themselves out of the Act if they think fit. The bargain was for payment of compensation in respect of four matters, three of which are without the Act, and only one within it. Again, the bargain itself was such that it was impossible for the tenant to give two months' notice of his intention to claim, and for want of such notice he had no power to claim for compensation under the Act. In my opinion there was in this case no reference under the Act all. I agree that section 57 applies only where a tenant is claiming compensation under the Act.

COLLINS, L.J.—The defendant's contention is that this agreement cannot be enforced by action, because the Agricultural Holdings Act provides a sufficient remedy, and that no agreement can qualify a right given by the Act. I do not think that the question of contracting out arises here at all; for this is not a case of contracting out of the Act. The tenant in this case had no right to compensation under the Act, because he had not given notice as required by section 7. The position was this: the landlord could not call upon the tenant to turn out on the 2nd of February, and the tenant had no right to compensation if he was to turn out on the 2nd of February, for it was impossible that he could give two months' notice of his intention to make a claim. So they entered into a bargain that if the tenant turned out on that day he should, in consideration thereof, receive certain compensation for improvements. The tenant, not having any existing right, bargained for a new and distinct right. I agree that that bargain was not rendered invalid by section 57. The claim in the action is founded on that bargain, and not on the statute: and I think the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

C. A. NATL. TELEPHONE CO. (LTM.) (APPLTS.) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (RESPTS.) C. A.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.) Dec. 8, 9.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Agreement in consideration of fixed annual payments—"Bond, contract, or instrument, being the only or principal or primary security"—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), First Schedule.

By an agreement in writing, not under seal, one S. R. agreed to pay a telephone company the sum of £12 per annum for the use of a telephone wire and apparatus which the company was to affix to his house. The rent was to be payable every year in advance, and either party might put an end to the agreement by giving the other party three months' notice.

Held, that this instrument was liable to an ad valorem duty under the head "Bond, Covenant, or Instrument of any kind whatsoever" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, as being "the only or principal or primary security for any . . . sum or sums of money at stated periods for an indefinite period."

Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 43 W. R. 318, [1895] 1 Q. B. 484, approved.

This was an appeal by the National Telephone Co. from the judgment of Grantham and Channell, JJ., sitting as a Divisional Court, upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39). An instrument, of which the following is a copy, was presented by the National Telephone Co. for the opinion of the commissioners as to what stamp duty it was chargeable with: "The 9th of March, 1886. The undersigned hereby agrees with the South of England Telephone Co. (Limited)," (whose business the appellants in this case, subsequent to the above date, purchased) "subject to above conditions, to pay them the sum of £12 per annum yearly in advance, the first payment to be made on the first day of the month succeeding that in which the wire and apparatus are fixed on the premises of the undersigned, and each subsequent payment to be made on the corresponding day in each and every following year, for the use of a private wire between No. 155, North-street and the South of England Telephone Co.'s local exchange system in Brighton. Either the company or the lessee may put an end to this agreement by giving to the other three calendar months' notice in writing expiring on the day previous to the rent being due in any year. No verbal notice can be recognized. Signature of renter (signed) Samuel Ridley. N.B.—All rentals are payable yearly in advance, and the first year's rent becomes due on the first day of the month succeeding that in which the wire and apparatus are fixed on the premises of the renter."

The commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was the only or principal or primary security for the sum of £12 payable annually for an indefinite period, that such sum was neither interest for any principal sum secured by a duly stamped instrument, nor rent reserved by a lease or tack, and that the instrument was chargeable with stamp duty under the head "Bond, Covenant, or Instrument of any kind whatsoever" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, with the duty of 7s. 6d., being the ad valorem duty of 2s. 6d. for every £5, and also any fractional part of £5 of the £12, the sum annually payable by the renter to the telephone company. They assessed the duty thereon accordingly, and the instrument was stamped in conformity with the assessment. The questions for the court were (1) whether the instrument was chargeable with the duty of 7s. 6d. in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty the instrument was chargeable.

Grantham and Channell, JJ., held that they were bound by the decision in Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 43 W. R. 318, [1895] 1 Q. B. 484, and accordingly affirmed the decision of the commissioners.

From this judgment the company now appealed.

Asquith, Q.C., and Roskill, for the appellants.—This instrument is not covered by the words in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, "bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever, being the only or principal or primary security . . . for any sum or sums of money at stated periods . . . for any indefinite period." In order to come under those words the instrument must be a security to pay money. A security is something additional to a promise or undertaking, and is for the purpose of making the performance more certain. It implies an antecedent obligation. The present instrument cannot be described as such. It is merely an agreement for the hire and use of certain property of the company for which the hirer agrees to pay rent. An instrument which does nothing more than create a liability is not a security. It is therefore not a security and it is only chargeable with a stamp duty of sixpence. The decision in Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue is wrong. Also in that case the instrument was under seal, in the present case it is not.

Counsel also referred to Limmer Asphalte Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 20 W. R. 610, L. R. 7 Ex. 211; Thames Conservators v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 35 W. R. 274, 18 Q. B. D. 279; Clifford v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 45 W. R. 14, [1896] 2 Q. B. 187.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the Crown.—The word "security" in the clause in question was intended to include an instrument creating a liability as in this case; it was not intended to apply only to documents creating a collateral liability. It is immaterial whether the instrument is under hand or under seal. This was a contract creating a liability to pay, and the instrument itself was the only security for the payment; it was therefore a "security" within the meaning of the clause in the first schedule.

They cited the following cases: Matheson v. Ross, 2 H. L. Cas. 286; Adams v. Morgan, 12 L. R. Ir. 1. 31 W. R. Dig. 190; Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1897] 2 Q. B. 316, 46 W. R. Dig. 74; Guardians of the Poor of West Ham Union v. Ovens, 21 W. R. 143, L. R. 8 Ex. 37.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal fails. The question we have got to decide is what is the meaning of the word "security" in the Stamp Act, 1891, not what is its meaning in ordinary parlance; and it seems to me that when this Act is looked at we find the word "security" is fairly defined by the Act itself.

In the first schedule to the Act we find, first of all, that an "agreement or any memorandum of an agreement made in England or Ireland under hand only, or made in Scotland without any clause of registration, and not otherwise specifically charged with any duty, whether the same be only evidence of a contract, or obligatory upon the parties from its being a written instrument," shall have a sixpenny stamp. Those words, "not otherwise specifically charged with any duty," bring us to the next passage in this schedule which we have to construe—namely, "bond." We there find that a "bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever . . . being the only security for any sum or sums of money at stated periods . . . for any indefinite period," is to have an ad valorem stamp.

Now then, I will take "bond." First of all a bond given to secure payment of money. I should say it is a "security." A bond is a "security," and therefore that would clearly come within this schedule.

Next, a "covenant." That clearly stands exactly in the same position as "bond."

Now I will take the third (which raises the question in this case), "or instrument of any kind whatsoever." That covers a contract in writing. A contract in writing "being the only" security "for any sum or sums of money at stated periods," for any indefinite period, is to have a 2s. 6d. stamp for every £5 and for any fractional part of £5.

I cannot sever the word "instrument" from the words "bond" and "covenant," and "bond" and "covenant" appear to me to be clearly a "security" within the meaning of this Act, and so does the "contract in writing," which is in the same clause; it falls within the same category, in my judgment, as "bond" and "covenant."

Then it is argued that "security" only means something "auxiliary" to an obligation which has gone before, therefore this simple contract for the payment of £12 a year in consideration of this telephone being put up at Brighton is not "auxiliary" to any other obligation. In my judgment that is a wrong reading of this Stamp Act. "Security" here means the original thing which has been given for securing the payment of money; and if that is so, it is fortified when I come to another part of this schedule a little later on, which is headed "Mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant (except a marketable security, otherwise specially charged with duty) and warrant of attorney to confess and enter up judgment (1) being the only or principal or primary security (other than an equitable mortgage) for the payment or repayment of money" (in certain events) which carries an ad valorem stamp.

Now we see the meaning of the word "security" there ["being the only or principal or primary security"] is made perfectly clear by division 2 under the same heading, which says: "being a collateral or auxiliary or additional or substituted security" which is to bear a lower stamp if the original "security" has been stamped with an ad valorem stamp. It seems to me, therefore, that upon the true construction of this statute, a contract in writing, whereby an obligation is undertaken to pay a certain sum of money, as in this case, for an "indefinite period" does come within the taxing clause under the head "Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever."

That being, in my opinion, the true construction of this statute, I need only say that the Limmer Asphalte case was rightly decided, and I also think that the case of Jones v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, which was decided by my brothers Wright and Collins, JJ., was also rightly decided. I have read the judgment of those two learned judges, and I agree with them entirely. For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. I think there cannot be a doubt that a contract in writing is within this head of the section. It also appears to me clear that what are called personal securities are securities within the meaning of this part of the schedule if they are created by bond or covenant. I cannot distinguish this case in any way by reason of the fact that it is an instrument that is not under seal. The phrase "personal security" is almost as common as "real security." "Real security" is associated with property, but "personal security means something which has no property at the back of it, but is a mere personal obligation. I also agree in the view that this applies to original securities. On the whole I think that the Limmer Asphalte case and Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue are cases which we ought not to interfere with, and which we ought to affirm and not disaffirm.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that I was startled at the outset of the case by hearing that I was a party to a decision which did not on its primâ facie statement commend itself to my judgment, but now that I have heard the argument and have had the opportunity of looking through the judgment in Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, I cannot see any escape from the decision. I have nothing further to add to what I said in the case of Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, except that in citing the case of Taylor v. Overseers of Pendleton (35 W. R. 762, 19 Q. B. D. 288), I obviously was making a mistake and confounding it with the Thames Conservators v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue; all that I said there had reference to that case and not to Taylor v. Overseers of Pendleton, and I must say after reading it again I think the case of the Thames Conservators v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue is open to the observations which I ventured then to make.

Appeal dismissed.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITIES v. GEORGE GILL & SONS. (a.)

Practice — Parties — Joinder of plaintiffs — Causes of action—R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 1.

Under ord. 16, r. 1, in its amended form now in force, persons may join as plaintiffs whose causes of action arise out of the same series of transactions, where a common question of law or fact arises.

Stroud v. Lawson, 46 W. R. 626, [1898] 2 Q. B. 44, considered.

In this case the action was brought by the University of Oxford and the University of Cambridge, as co-plaintiffs seeking to restrain the defendants from selling, advertising, or offering for sale any books or publications as being or bearing the title "The Oxford and Cambridge Publications," or "The Oxford and Cambridge Edition," and from using the names "Oxford and Cambridge," or either of such names upon or in connection with the books or publications or advertisements of the defendants in such a manner as to induce the belief that the books or publications of the defendants were publications of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge or either of them or emanated from the presses of or were authorized by the said universities or either of them.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged, amongst other things, as follows:

(1) The plaintiffs carry on an extensive and profitable business in printing and publishing, and their respective presses known as the Oxford University Press and the Cambridge University Press, and the works emanating from their respective presses, have a world-wide reputation.

(4) There are certain works, including the Revised Version of the Bible, which are joint publications of the Oxford and Cambridge University Presses.

(6) During the year 1897 it came to the notice of the plaintiffs that the defendants had begun to publish text-books under the title of "The Oxford and Cambridge Press," and were advertising the same under that title in the Journal of Education and the Educational Times; and further, that the defendants were using the arms of the two universities, or devices resembling those arms, in their advertisements and on the covers of their books.

(7) The plaintiffs objected to the use of the aforesaid title and of the arms of the universities by the defendants as aforesaid, and after some correspondence between the parties, and as the defendants would not desist from the wrongful acts complained of by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, an action was commenced by the plaintiffs against the defendants, claiming an injunction and other relief. And by an order dated the 3rd of May, 1898, on motion by the plaintiffs for an interlocutory injunction, it was by consent ordered that the defendants, their servants and agents, should be perpetually restrained from selling, advertising, or offering for sale any books or publications bearing the title of "The Oxford and Cambridge Press" or "The Oxford Press" or "The Cambridge Press," or the arms of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge or either of the said universities, or from inserting in advertisements any reference to the Oxford and Cambridge Press or Presses, or either of them, or the arms of the said universities or either of them which might induce the belief that the books or publications of the defendants were publications of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or either of them, or emanated from the presses of the said universities or either of them, but the said order was not to preclude the defendants from selling any bound books then in stock with the university arms thereon not infringing that part of the injunction which related to the use of the title "The Oxford and Cambridge Press," "The Oxford Press," or "The Cambridge Press."

(8) Subsequently to the date of the said order, it was brought to the notice of the plaintiffs that the defendants had commenced to advertise their publications as "The Oxford and Cambridge Publications," and had also commenced selling their works with the title the "Oxford and Cambridge Edition" thereon, and were using the words "The Oxford and Cambridge" in connection with the defendants' Biblical and other publications.

(9) The use by the defendants of the titles "The Oxford and Cambridge Publications" and "The Oxford and Cambridge Edition," and of the words "The Oxford and Cambridge" in connection with the defendants' Biblical and other publications is calculated to deceive and to induce the belief that the books or publications of the defendants are publications of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or emanate from the presses of the said universities, or are authorized by the said universities as text-books.

(11) The titles adopted by the defendants as mentioned in paragraph 8 hereof are calculated seriously to injure the plaintiffs in the sale of educational and Biblical works emanating from their respective presses.

The defendants moved that all claims by the plaintiffs in their statement of claim to any relief in respect of any separate cause of action in either of the plaintiffs, and all allegations in such statement of claim in support of any such separate cause of action, might be struck out, and that the action and the proceedings therein might be confined to the alleged joint cause of action of the plaintiffs, and that the statement of claim might be amended accordingly; or, in the alternative, that the plaintiffs might be put to their election whether they would proceed with their alleged joint cause of action, or with the alleged separate cause of action of one of the plaintiffs, and that so much of the statement of claim as applied to any joint cause of action or to any cause of action by the other plaintiff might be struck out, and the statement of claim amended accordingly.

Moulton, Q.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the defendants.—It is impossible to join separate causes of action with joint causes of action. Here the statement of claim alleges that the plaintiffs carry on business at their respective presses. Two people do not become a firm merely because they are jointly interested in a copyright. The plaintiffs do not allege that they trade together as a firm. [Jenkins, Q.C.—We do not suggest that we do. STIRLING, J.—If either A. or B. can bring an action, why may they not together bring an action?] The case does not fall within ord. 16, r. 1, or ord. 18, r. 1. There is no common question of law or of fact which arises here: Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494. [Jenkins, Q.C.—That case was decided prior to the alteration of ord. 16, r. 1.] See also P. & O Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima, [1895] A. C. 661, 44 W. R. Dig. 128; Sadler v. Great Western Railway, 45 W. R. 51, [1896] A. C. 450. Stroud v. Lawson, 46 W. R. 626, [1898] 2 Q. B. 44, decided after the amendment of rule 1 of order 16, shows that there must still be a common question of law or fact. Here there is no common question of law. [STIRLING, J.—There is a common question of fact, whether the defendants have published the books complained of, and if so, what is the effect of such publication?] In any case the plaintiffs are not entitled to an injunction: Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112.

They also referred to Drincqbier v. Wood, post p. 252.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts).—It is said that an action in this form really contains a combination of claims—first, by the two universities in respect of a joint interest; secondly, separate actions by each of them in respect of their separate interest; and it is said that according to the rules such an action cannot be brought. Whatever might have been said prior to the modification of ord. 16, r. 1, which was introduced in the year 1896, it seems to me that what I have to deal with is the existing rule, and not the rule as it existed prior to the alteration. I only call attention to the former rule to show the great modification which has been introduced into it. It ran thus: "All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative." The existing rule is in widely different terms: "All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief"—not the right to any relief, but "any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate actions any common question of law or fact would arise." That rule has been commented upon and explained by the Court of Appeal in the case of Stroud v. Lawson. Chitty, L.J., whose judgment I refer to as stating the effect of the rule, says: "That rule in its present form was framed with reference to the difficulty which arose in the cases of Smurthwaite v. Hannay and Carter v. Rigby & Co., 44 W. R. 566, [1896] 2 Q. B. 113. It is obvious on the face of the rule that it was not thereby intended to allow any number of different plaintiffs to join in one action any number of separate and different causes of action, but that it was intended merely to effect a modification of the old rule by which a limited liberty of joining plaintiffs with separate causes of action should be conferred." Therefore there is to be a limited liberty of joining plaintiffs with separate causes of action. "The nature of the limitation is plain upon the face of the rule." Then his lordship read it, and then he says: "It is necessary that both these conditions should be fulfilled—that is to say, that the right to relief alleged to exist in each plaintiff should be in respect of or arise out of the same transaction, and also that there should be a common question of fact or law in order that the case may be within the rule." It was held by the Court of Appeal in Stroud v. Lawson that the rule did not apply to the case then under consideration. A little further on Chitty, L.J., says: "It is not necessary for the present purpose to say to what cases the rule would apply. But I mentioned during the argument by way of illustration a case where persons having separate inheritances in a graveyard had separate rights of action in respect of disturbances of graves therein by one common act." That is the illustration of his lordship. Now, according to the interpretation put upon the rule by the Court of Appeal (and, indeed, it seems plain upon the face of the rule itself) there are two conditions to be satisfied. First, that the right to relief alleged to exist in each plaintiff should be in respect of, or arise out of, the same transaction; and secondly, that there should be a common question of fact or law. Are these conditions satisfied in the present case? First, do they arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions? The action arises out of the publication by the defendants of a series of books bearing the title "The Oxford and Cambridge Publications" or "The Oxford and Cambridge Edition," and otherwise bearing the name "Oxford and Cambridge." It seems to me clear that the action arises out of one transaction, or at any rate a series of transactions, if each publication is to be treated as a separate transaction.

Then comes the question, Does the statement of claim show that any common question of law or fact would arise in this case? In the first place, the statement of claim alleges the fact of publication. No defence has yet been put in, and it does not appear upon the pleadings as they stand how far that fact will be admitted.

It is said that upon the hearing of the motion the fact of publication was not denied, and that as to that no common question of fact would arise. But is the pleader in framing his action to take upon himself to judge as to what the defendant is going to do in the way of admission in the prosecution of an action? Can that be the meaning of the rule? That would make the rule very difficult to work. What the rule says is, "Where if such persons brought separate actions any common question of law or fact would arise." The publication of these books is a common fact which will have to be proved by the plaintiffs in order to establish this case. But there is more than that. What is the case made by the plaintiffs' pleader in paragraph 9? It is "the use by the defendants of the titles 'The Oxford and Cambridge Publications' and 'The Oxford and Cambridge Edition' in connection with defendants' Biblical and other publications is calculated to deceive and to induce the belief that the books or publications of the defendants are publications of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge or emanate from the presses of the said universities"—that means from both—"or are authorized by the said universities as text-books"—that is by both. Therefore, what the plaintiffs take upon themselves, according to this statement of claim, to prove is—that the belief which is induced in the public is, not that it is published by Oxford and Cambridge separately, but by Oxford and Cambridge Universities together. That is one of the paragraphs which I should anticipate that the defendants will join issue upon. The evidence which goes to prove the effect upon the public of that statement will be common to both cases. It seems to me that there is manifestly in this case a common question of fact which will have to be decided.

In my judgment this case is brought within the terms of the rule; and I must say, after all the argument I have heard, that it would be lamentable if, the rule having been amended, this case was not brought within it; for it appears to me to be one of the class for which the amendment was intended to provide. The rule has been amended in the way pointed out by Bowen, L.J., as the means of bringing about the result which was sought to be attained in Smurthwaite v. Hannay, and I think that the draftsman has attained what I doubt not was his object.

Then another question is raised. It is said that if this be so I ought to exercise the power conferred upon me by ord. 18, r. 8, which is this: "Any defendant alleging that the plaintiff has united in the same action several causes of action which cannot be conveniently disposed of together, may at any time apply to the court or a judge for an order confining the action to such of the causes of action as may be conveniently disposed of together."

It is said that the causes of action—namely, the case of injury to the plaintiffs jointly and the case of injury to the plaintiffs separately—cannot be conveniently tried together. Now, it seems to me that the nature of the case is such as to show that it is most convenient that these different causes of action should be disposed of together, and I think that that application fails just as much as does the other.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 1st of July, 1869, and made between Joseph Charter and Sarah his wife of the one part, and Job Watson of the other part, it was witnessed that in consideration of the sum of £350 then advanced by Job Watson to Joseph and Sarah Charter they, the said Joseph and Sarah Charter, thereby granted and conveyed certain freehold lands at Wentworth and Witcham, in the Isle of Ely and county of Cambridge, and at Somersham, in the county of Huntingdon, to Job Watson, his heirs and assigns, subject to the proviso for redemption thereinafter contained; and it was also witnessed that for the consideration aforesaid Joseph Charter covenanted that he and his wife would forthwith surrender certain copyhold lands at Witcham aforesaid to such uses as Job Watson should appoint, and in default of appointment, to the use of Job Watson, his heirs and assigns, subject to the proviso for redemption thereinafter contained; and it was further witnessed that for the consideration aforesaid Joseph Charter thereby assigned a policy of insurance upon his own life for £100 in the Royal Insurance Co. unto Job Watson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the proviso for redemption thereinafter contained. By the proviso for redemption which followed next, it was provided that if Joseph and Sarah Charter, or either of them, or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, should pay to Job Watson, his executors, administrators, or assigns, £350, with interest at £5 per cent., on the 11th of October then next, Job Watson, his heirs or assigns, would reconvey the freehold hereditaments to the like uses as the same were then vested, and release and discharge the said copyhold hereditaments, and assign the said policy respectively. In default of payment on the 11th day of October, 1869, power was thereby given to the mortgagee to enter into possession of and sell the said mortgage securities. The indenture also contained the usual covenants for payment of interest until payment off and for keeping up the policy. Subsequently to the execution of the indenture the copyholds were duly surrendered in accordance with the above covenant.

Previous to 1876 J. Charter had made default in paying the premiums on the policy, and thenceforth the same were paid and the policy kept on foot by the mortgagee till his death, and afterwards by his executors. In 1876, upon the default of the mortgagors in payment of interest, the mortgagee entered into the freehold and copyhold lands and continued in possession thereof without any acknowledgment of the title of the mortgagors or their right to redeem. The mortgagee died in 1881, and the defendant Charlotte Amelia Watson was his surviving executrix. Joseph Charter died intestate in 1897, leaving the plaintiffs Sarah Charter, his widow, and G. W. Charter, his heir-at-law, surviving him, and letters of administration to his estate had been taken out by the latter. The Royal Insurance Co. had not yet paid over the policy moneys to the defendant C. A. Watson, and they were joined as co-defendants. The plaintiffs brought this present action claiming against the defendant C. A. Watson an account of moneys received by her as mortgagee in possession, an inquiry of what hereditaments the mortgage security consisted, and redemption and reconveyance of the freehold and copyhold hereditaments and policy, and against both defendants an account in respect of the policy moneys, an injunction to restrain the defendant company from parting with the policy money until such account had been taken, and a receiver of the policy moneys. The plaintiffs submitted that even if their right of redemption was barred in respect of the freeholds and copyholds they were at any rate entitled to redeem the policy. At the trial it was not denied that the right to redeem the realty was barred by the statute.

Counsel and R. Bertrand Jackson, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs still have a right to redeem the policy even if their right is barred in respect of the realty. The mortgagee by electing to make himself owner of the realty must be held to have abandoned his right to the collateral security of the policy: Dyson v. Morris, 1 Hare 413. He should have realized the collateral security before foreclosing the realty, and, not having done so, his right to it is gone. The right to redeem the policy is not barred, for there is no statute applicable to it.

Warrington, Q.C., and Ribton, for the defendants.—So far as the real estate is concerned the plaintiffs' title became barred in 1888. The claim to redeem the policy is a purely equitable claim, and the court ought to apply by analogy to an equitable demand the same rules which the Legislature has provided shall apply in the case of land: Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 607, and Re Lady Hastings, 35 W. R. 584, 35 Ch. D. 94; and the proper period applicable to this case is twelve years: Harrison v. Hollins, 1 Sim. & St. 471. This is also a stale demand. Dyson v. Morris is not a case in point, for there the mortgagee had only gone into possession of part of the mortgaged land, whereas here the plaintiffs have taken possession of the whole security.

Counsel in reply.—The cases cited show that real estate statutes have been applied by analogy to other real estate; they do not support the contention that those statutes should be applied by analogy to personalty: Mellersh v. Brown, 38 W. R. 732, 45 Ch. D. 225.

KEKEWICH, J.—The novelty of this question calling for decision is certainly somewhat strange seeing that mortgages, including freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments and chattels, particularly policies of insurance, are extremely common. One would have thought that by now questions would have arisen relating to the lapse of the equity of redemption to chattels and policies of insurance in cases where it was already gone as regards the freehold, copyhold, or leasehold part of the security. But no authorities have been produced by the counsel on either side, and it seems to me that there are none such to be found, and I cannot recall any cases where the point has arisen. The point arises here very clearly. It cannot be denied that from lapse of time and by the operation of the statute the plaintiffs are debarred from redeeming the freeholds and copyholds comprised in the mortgage deed of the 1st of July, 1869. That is not denied. The twelve years have expired since the mortgagee took possession of the freeholds and copyholds and no acknowledgment has been put forward sufficient to keep alive the equity of redemption. But the mortgage also comprises this policy of insurance, and the question arises, has the right to redeem it also gone? I am asked to say that it has,

and to apply by analogy the Statute of Limitations, and reference is made to Lord Redesdale's judgment in the well-known case of Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, where he expounds the analogy between legal and equitable interests. The answer to that argument was given in reply, when it was said that I am asked to apply by analogy the statute, which only touches land, to property of an entirely different nature—namely, to policies of insurance, which are purely personal estate, and I am asked to do that notwithstanding that there is no statute touching such kind of property. Now, if I were to do that, I should be doing something very different from what Lord Redesdale did. He, in effect, said: We find a statute which does not purport to bind equitable interests, but we will apply it by analogy, and in dealing with equitable interests we will be bound by the statute. That seems to me to be very different from arguing that a statute which applies only to land should apply to a policy of insurance. I do not see my way to apply any such analogy, and I hesitate to create one on the present occasion. Then it is said that the plaintiffs come here with a stale demand. I am not sure that that is not a complete answer, but it has been pointed out that although there has been no such acknowledgment of the right to redeem as is required by the statute, yet if the matter were looked into there might possibly be some conduct on the part of the defendants which would render the defence of a stale demand insufficient. At any rate I should be reluctant to decide against the plaintiffs on the ground of a stale demand upon the facts which I have at present. I propose to deal with the case on a different footing. I shall treat it as a novel point, and strictly on principle.

This is a mortgage of freeholds, copyholds, and a policy of insurance. The fact that there are copyholds makes no real difference: my conclusion would be the same if there were no copyholds. The mortgage first of all conveys the freeholds in fee subject to the proviso for redemption thereinafter contained. That proviso does not follow directly, but is postponed. Then comes the second witnessing part, which deals with the copyholds; they are also to be held subject to the proviso for redemption thereinafter contained, and which is again postponed, because there is a third witnessing part by which the policy is assigned subject also to the proviso for redemption which then follows. One thus sees that all these three properties are intended to form one security; they may be called collateral in the sense that each is a branch of the security intended to lie side by side, and in that sense only are collateral, but there is no principal security, for all three constitute together one security. You know that before you come to the proviso for redemption, and when you do come to it, it makes it quite clear. [His lordship then read the proviso for redemption, and continued:] That is to say that if the money is paid by the day named there is to be a reconveyance of the freeholds and the copyholds and the policy. They are all placed together, and it would be impossible for either party to say that the redemption could be completed without the payment of the whole debt, and the reconveyance and reassignment of the whole security. I therefore conclude that we have here one indivisible security for one indivisible amount of money. I need not consider the rest of the deed; there are, of course, different provisions for keeping up the policy and other provisions usual in mortgage deeds of that date, but there is nothing which affects the construction which I have put upon the security. Now, how is the proviso for redemption to be read? One must bear in mind that a proviso for redemption which limits a particular day for payment of the principal sum and which makes the conveyance absolute and the property conveyed the property of the mortgagee unless such payment is made on the particular day named, has always been taken in a court of equity as not fixing a particular day once for all, but as constituting the transaction of the mortgage and making the property the security only, and as providing that so long as the interest continues to be paid the right to redeem remains. Before there were any Statutes of Limitations, certain limits were placed by the court on that right, but all those limits have been done away with by the Statutes of Limitations, and the right to redeem is now limited by statute and is not gone until the statutory limit has expired, provided that there has been no acknowledgment. When that time has expired the right to redeem has gone and the mortgagee in possession may retain the property strictly both at law and inequity, so that if the mortgagor does not pay by a certain day fixed by statute, not, of course, by the proviso for redemption, the result is that the right of redemption is gone. In this case the money has not been paid by the mortgagor, and the statutory period having expired, his right of redemption is therefore gone. That right, however, as I have already pointed out, was not to redeem a part of the mortgaged premises, but to redeem the whole of them, therefore the right is gone just as much with respect to the policy of insurance as with respect to the lands, not because with respect to the policy it is barred by the statute or by applying the statute by analogy, but because it being now impossible to require a reconveyance of the lands, it is equally impossible to require a re-assignment of the policy of insurance, the lands together with the policy forming one security for one debt. I think that that is in accordance with the principles of equity as applied to mortgages. On that ground I am of opinion that the plaintiffs fail, they cannot now redeem the policy without paying the principal, interest, and costs of the whole debt, and that they are not entitled to do, because as regards the lands they are barred by the Statutes of Limitations. The lands and the policy together form one security, and as they cannot redeem the lands neither can they redeem the policy. I think that that is a sounder view of the matter than to attempt to apply the Statutes of Limitations by analogy to a mortgage of personal property.

There will therefore be a declaration that the court being of opinion that the right to redeem the freeholds and copyholds being barred by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, the plaintiffs are not entitled to redeem the policy of insurance, and the action must be dismissed with costs.

DRINCQBIER v. WOOD. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Common cause of action — R. S. C., ord. 16. r. 1 — Company — Prospectus—Director — Liability — Director wilfully ignorant of contents of prospectus, but not repudiating it before action brought—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3.

The expression "the same transaction" in R. S. C.,

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ord. 16, r. 1, does not necessarily imply a transaction taking place between two parties; and, where different persons have causes of action arising out of the same transaction, they may be joined as co-plaintiffs.

The expression "prospectus" in the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, means the prospectus on the faith of which shares or debentures are taken.

A person, who assumes the post of director of a company and is aware of the issue of a prospectus, does not escape from his liabilities under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, by abstaining from making an inquiry as to its contents; he must give public notice of his repudiation of such prospectus, and it will not be sufficient for him to repudiate it after action brought.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which four separate plaintiffs claimed compensation for damages alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of certain untrue statements contained in a prospectus and covering circular, on the faith of which they took certain debentures in the plaintiff's company.

The claim was based upon the provisions of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890.

The facts of the case were as follow:

On the 3rd of January, 1895, the defendant James L. Wood entered into an agreement with the other defendant, his brother Henry Wood, whereby he agreed to let to the said Henry Wood a piece of land at Edmonton for the term of one year commencing from the 25th of December, 1895, at the rent of £50 per annum. Under the agreement it was provided that Henry Wood should be at liberty to dig and sell sand under the land, subject to his paying to his landlord for all the sand so taken a royalty to be arranged as the sand was dug; that he should on certain terms therein mentioned be at liberty to use a siding connected with the Great Eastern Railway for the purpose of conveying his sand from the land; that he should be at liberty within the year, by sending in a postage prepaid envelope a notice in that behalf to the landlord, to purchase the fee simple of the land at the sum of £1,000 with interest at 5 per cent. from the 25th of December, 1894, to the completion of the purchase, and that if he availed himself of this option he might pay the purchase-money in one sum or more within the said year or in instalments amounting in any one year to not less than £250, the amounts paid for royalties and rents in any one year to be included in this sum; that if he agreed to purchase he should be allowed to remain in possession pending completion; and that, in the event of his exercising the option and paying the purchase-money as provided, a proper conveyance of the premises should be executed to him.

Henry Wood entered into this agreement with a view of forming a company to make bricks, and he had, it was stated, obtained a patent for this purpose.

On the 20th of March, 1895, the company was registered under the title of the "Wood's Patent Brick Syndicate, Limited," with a memorandum and articles of association signed by the defendant J. L. Wood and certain other signatories, who were clerks or relations of J. L. Wood or of Henry Wood. Each signatory signed for one share only.

The capital of the company was to be £5,000, of which it was contemplated that the defendant Henry Wood should hold shares to the amount of £4,993.

On the 22nd of April, 1895, a meeting of the signatories to the memorandum was held, at which the persons present were the defendants and Mrs. Wood, the wife of one of them, at which the defendants were appointed directors, Henry Wood was appointed managing director, and A. T. Collins secretary. And after this the shares were allotted—viz., £1 fully paid-up share to each of the seven signatories and 4,993 shares of £1 each to Henry Wood. The articles and memorandum were approved, the contracts "of the prospectus and articles" (whatever meaning may be attached to this expression) were agreed to, and a resolution was passed to issue 1,200 debentures of £25 each.

Prior to the 24th of May, 1895, a prospectus had been prepared, and a third proof was in print. It was headed "for private use only," and stated the capital at £5,000 divided into 5,000 shares of £1 each. It gave the names of the two directors, and contained the following passage: "A site has been acquired at Angel-road, Edmonton, where a siding has been allotted capable of containing twenty wagons. Machinery has been erected capable of making 20,000 bricks daily. The cost of machinery, machine-erecting, &c., will be about £15,000. The whole of the shares will be kept by the vendor, except seven as ordered by Act of Parliament." The prospectus gave an estimate of the anticipated profits from brick-making, and continued: "The above net profit is arrived at after paying all office and management expenses, rent, &c. The above result is obtainable by working the patent upon one site only at Edmonton. . . . The following contracts have been entered into with Mr. J. L. Wood to purchase the land at Edmonton to be paid by the royalty of the sand disposed of. It is proposed to sell the sand off the estate, which is of an exceptionally fine quality and worth about 3s. per yard in rail or carts." It was also stated that these contracts, together with the memorandum and articles of association and specification of the patent, might be inspected at the offices of the company. At the same time a circular was in print headed "Wood's Patent Brick Co., Limited," dated May, 1895, "issue of 1,200 debentures of £25, each carrying 10 per cent. per annum payable quarterly, repayable in 5 years, at £27 10s. It commenced, "Dear Sir,—You will find enclosed a prospectus of my Patent Brick Co., and I am pleased to offer you some debentures on the above terms." The following passages occurred in the letter: "I have patented the process and purchased a field at Angel-road, Edmonton, to develop the business." "As the assets of the company include the freehold land, machinery, buildings, and patent rights, it will be seen that there is abundant security for the debenture-holders." This letter was not signed, but it had a place left for signature, under which were the words "Managing Director."

The evidence at the trial of the action made it clear that three out of the four plaintiffs applied for and took their debentures on the faith of the prospectus and the covering letter, and that the fourth of these, Auguste Drincqbier, placed more reliance on these documents than on certain statements made to him by Henry Wood, which statements, however, were not inconsistent with anything therein contained. With the exception of their rights under the agreement of the 3rd of January, 1895, the company never acquired any land, machinery, or buildings. The business proved a failure and the assets of the company were realised in June, 1897, by a sale under the direction of the court in an action brought by a debenture-holder, and were insufficient to pay the plaintiffs the principal amount due upon their debentures.

The defendant, Henry Wood, did not defend this present action. J. L. Wood in a separate defence denied that he prepared or issued to the public a prospectus or covering letter as alleged in the statement of claim either at all or with a view to induce the plaintiffs to subscribe for debentures, or that he delivered to the plaintiffs or any of them copies or a copy of the prospectus and covering letter. He further submitted that if the plaintiffs had any cause of action against him, they could not be joined in one action. The plaintiffs moved for judgment against Henry Wood.

R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 1, provides: "All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate actions any common question of law or fact would arise."

The Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3, provides, inter alia: "When, after the passing of this Act, a prospectus or notice invites persons to subscribe for shares in, or debentures or debenture stock of, a company, every person who is a director of the company at the time of the issue of the prospectus or notice . . . shall be liable to pay compensation to all persons who shall subscribe for any shares, debentures, or debenture stock on the faith of such prospectus or notice for the loss or damage they may have sustained by reason of any untrue statement in the prospectus or notice, or in any prospectus or memorandum appearing upon the face thereof, or by reference incorporated therein or issued therewith, unless it is proved that, having consented to become a director of the company, he withdrew his consent before the issue of the prospectus or notice, and that the prospectus or notice was issued without his knowledge or consent, and that on becoming aware of its issue he forthwith gave reasonable public notice that it was so issued without his knowledge or consent, or that after the issue of such prospectus or notice, and before allotment thereunder, he, on becoming aware of any untrue statement therein, withdrew his consent thereto, and caused reasonable public notice of such withdrawal and of the reason therefor to be given."

Astbury, Q.C., and G. Cave, for the plaintiffs, opened the case.

Eve, Q.C., and Beddall, for the defendant, J. L. Wood, took a preliminary objection. The action cannot be sustained, as the plaintiffs have not a common cause of action. The circumstances under which they received the prospectus may have been different. Ord. 16, r. 1, provides that all persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction is alleged to exist. But here the claim of the plaintiffs does not arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions, and to hold that it did would be to embarrass the defendant.

They referred to Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494; Stroud v. Lawson, 46 W. R. 626, [1898] 2 Q. B. 44; Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima, [1895] A. C. 661, 44 W. R. Dig. 128.

Astbury, Q.C., and G. Cave, for the plaintiffs.—The action in this case has arisen out of a common wrong —viz., the issue of the prospectus. Stroud v. Lawson does not apply here. That was an action in which a plaintiff sought to join in one action a claim for damages in his personal capacity and a claim by him as representing the shareholders for a declaration that a payment made was ultra vires. In deciding that case Vaughan Williams, L.J., says, "I do not understand, however, that by the new rule it was intended to prevent the joinder of different causes of action under it": [1898] 2 Q. B. at pp. 53, 54.

They also referred to Carter v. Rigby & Co., 44 W. R. 566, [1896] 2 Q. B. 113; and Arnison v. Smith, 37 W. R. 405, 593, 739, 40 Ch. D. 567, 41 Ch. D. 98, 348.

Eve, Q.C., replied.

BYRNE, J.—This case is not free from difficulty, but I think that the action is properly brought. Ord. 16, r. 1, provides. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] Prior to this rule being made there had been certain decisions given, notably Smurthwaite v. Hannay, in which it was held that the old ord. 16, r. 1, dealt merely with the parties to an action and had no application to the joinder of several causes of action, and that when the causes of action of several plaintiffs were separate and distinct, the same could not be joined in one action. Since the new rule has come into operation one case, Stroud v. Lawson, has been decided by the Court of Appeal which assists me in its interpretation. In that case plaintiff commenced an action for damages against the directors for fraud in inducing him to purchase shares in the company, and he also sought in the same action, as representing the shareholders, for a declaration that the payment by the directors of dividends out of capital was ultra vires, and it was held that he did not come within the rule, because the right to relief did not arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions. I have, therefore, to consider in the present case if the plaintiffs can allege causes of action arising out of the same transaction. It is true that if these plaintiffs had not entered into contracts to take debentures they would not have had any title to relief, and that the entering into each of these contracts was a separate transaction. The case of the plaintiffs is, however, that their right to relief arises out of the issue of the same prospectus, and therefore out of the same transaction. The "same transaction" in the rule does not necessarily imply something taking place between two parties, as for instance, where a collision between two ships causes damage, or a traction engine passing along a highway shakes houses. It is true that each plaintiff, to establish his right to relief, must prove his case on distinct evidence. But here the plaintiffs ground their case upon the issuing of the prospectus by the defendants. I think, therefore, that the case comes within the rule and that the defendants are not entitled to say that each of the plaintiffs must bring a separate action. The rest of the rule prevents any injustice or inconvenience to defendants in case of the joinder of a large number of plaintiffs.

The case accordingly proceeded. The plaintiff Auguste Drincqbier in his cross-examination and re-examination admitted that if Henry Wood had told him that the company was going to acquire a patent, that it would be tenant of the property at Edmonton for a year, and that at any time within a year it was in a position to purchase the same for £1,000, it would not have made any difference to him. On re-examination he stated that he read the statements in the prospectus about the freehold land and understood them to mean that the company had the freehold, that if it had said that the company might have the freehold, but must pay £1,000 for it, he would have thought the security for the debentures just as good as not, because of the valuable gravel pits and the plants.

Certain questions put to this witness by his lordship and his answers thereto appear in the judgment.

Counsel for the defendant J. L. Wood submitted that upon this evidence no case was made out.

Henry Wood and J. L. Wood were also examined.

J. L. Wood stated that he had never authorized his brother to make use either of the prospectus or of the covering letter, and in cross-examination he said that he never heard of the prospectus until the action was brought, that he left to his brother and the secretary all matters relating to the issue of the debentures. He admitted that until the action was brought that he had taken no steps to repudiate his name in connection therewith.

Astbury, Q.C., and Cave, for the plaintiffs.

Eve, Q.C., and Beddall, for the defendant J. L. Wood.

The argument sufficiently appears in the judgment.

BYRNE, J.—The plaintiffs claim compensation for loss or damage alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of untrue statements in a prospectus and covering circular on the faith of which they took certain debentures. They ground their claim upon the provisions of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. There are two defendants, Henry Wood and J. L. Wood, who at the date of the events giving rise to this claim were the only directors of a company called the Wood's Patent Brick Syndicate (Limited). The defendant Henry Wood put in no defence, and against him the plaintiffs move for judgment, and as the averments in the statement of claim are admitted, and are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to relief, there must be judgment in their favour severally for compensation for the loss or damage sustained by reason of the untrue statements contained in the covering letter and prospectus in the statement of claim mentioned, and there must be an inquiry and payment of the amount found to be due. They are also entitled to costs up to and including judgment, the subsequent costs being reserved.

As against the plaintiff Auguste Drincqbier, counsel for the defendant J. L. Wood elected to call no evidence, and submits that no case has been made out. As against the remaining plaintiffs he has adduced evidence, and I must therefore consider the case of Auguste Drincqbier separately. [His lordship proceded to read the provisions in the Directors' Liability Act and to state the facts of the case, and continued:] The next question that I have to consider is, are the statements to which I have referred untrue statements. I consider that the statements in the covering letter as to the purchase of a field at Angel-road, as to the assets of the company including the freehold land are untrue. [His lordship proceeded to summarize the plaintiff Drincqbier's evidence, and continued:] I was not satisfied from the form of the questions asked or from the answers given whether the witness quite appreciated their meaning, and for that reason I asked him at the conclusion of his re-examination whether it would have made a difference to him in taking debentures if he had known what the terms really were with reference to the acquisition of the site, and I explained to him what the real terms were—that is to say, taking as nearly as possible the words of the agreement showing that an option would have to be exercised within a year, and £1,000 would have to be paid, and showing the way in which the £1,000 might be paid. He said that it would have made a difference to him; but in reply to the question, "What difference?" he replied. "I cannot answer what difference it would have made." I did not feel justified in further pressing the matter, and the evidence rests there. I did not, as I said, feel justified in pressing the matter further upon him, as I might have been suggesting an answer; but I must point out that he could not have understood the effects of the non-exercise of an option to purchase if he thought, nevertheless, that he should have the gravel pits. There is a passage that I should like to refer to in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in Arnison v. Smith, 41 Ch. D. 369, where he says, "It is an old expedient, and seldom successful, to cross-examine a person who has read a prospectus and ask him as to each particular statement, what influence it had on his mind and how far it determined him to enter into the contract. This is quite fallacious. It assumes that a person who reads a prospectus and determines to take shares on the faith of it can determine among the different parts of it the effect produced by the whole. This can rarely be done at the time, and for a shareholder thus to analyze his mental impressions after an interval of several years, so as to say which representation in particular induced him to take shares, is a thing all but impossible. A person reading the prospectus looks on it as a whole; he thinks the undertaking is a fine commercial speculation; he sees good names attached to it; he observes other points which he thinks favourable, and on the whole he forms his conclusion. You cannot weigh the elements by ounces." To my mind it is very frequently an extremely difficult thing for a man who has taken shares or debentures upon the faith of a prospectus, on being asked, "Would you have taken shares if something had been left out and something else put in?" to answer. And probably in many cases his true answer would be, "I can hardly answer that question, as I never saw a prospectus with the statement that you mention in it." I think that the plaintiff Drincqbier believed, and was justified in believing, that a freehold site had been actually acquired, and that he was deceived. I am of opinion therefore that he is entitled to succeed in this action.

In regard to the case of the other plaintiffs, their evidence is not open to the criticism directed against that of Auguste Drincqbier. I am satisfied that each one of them took debentures on the faith of the prospectus and covering letter, but I have to consider the effect of the evidence adduced on behalf of the defendant J. L. Wood. The Act provides for the liability to which I have referred on the part of a director, unless it is proved amongst other things that the prospectus was issued without his knowledge or consent. J. L. Wood admits that except in putting it into the hands of his solicitor to defend the action he never did anything to repudiate the prospectus which bore his name. [After considering J. L. Wood's evidence further, his lordship continued:] I am satisfied that the defendant J. L. Wood knew that there would be a prospectus, and that there was one in existence in or about July, 1895, at a time when debenture-holders were being sought for, and that if his evidence be true as to his not having seen it, before action brought, he chose to abstain from asking to see it. Two points have been submitted to me in reference to this matter, the one being that the Act uses the expression "the prospectus" and that the prospectus means the prospectus on the faith of which the debentures were taken—a construction of the Act with which I agree. And it is further said that there might have been others. But no evidence was adduced, nor was any suggestion made, except that it was put in argument as a possibility, that any other prospectus was issued, although there is some little evidence tending to show that a further print, which so far as I know was in exact accordance with that proved to have been issued, was executed. But it is clear that the defendant J. L. Wood never "forthwith" nor ever before action brought, "on becoming aware of its issue," gave reasonable public notice that the prospectus was so issued without his knowledge or consent, or that after the issue of the prospectus or notice and before allotment, he on becoming aware of any untrue statement therein withdrew his consent thereto, and caused reasonable notice to be given of such withdrawal and of the reason therefor. I do not consider that a director otherwise liable under the provisions of this Act, discharges himself from the burden thrown upon him if he can do no more than show that, having become aware of the issue of a prospectus or notice, he deliberately abstained from inquiring as to its contents, and refrained from giving any notice. It may be that he can repudiate without making inquiry as to the contents, and he can certainly take the more reasonable course, and one more consistent both with his duty as a director and an honest man, of endeavouring to understand what statements have been made for which he is responsible and then if he finds that there are untrue statements publicly put forward, forthwith repudiate them. It is quite true that he had no pecuniary interest in the company beyond his interest as landlord and possible interest as vendor under the agreement, and he was content to leave the preparation and issue of everything, including the prospectus and any notice that might be issued to obtain money, to his brother and the secretary, trusting in them. He was not fully acquainted with the provisions of the Act. But it must be understood that a director who consents to be a director assumes a position involving duties which cannot be shirked by leaving matters to others.

There is one other observation that I should like to make before I conclude, and that is upon the question whether I took the right view of the meaning of the rule under which I allowed the case to proceed. I am satisfied that in the present case, so far from working an injustice, it has saved expense to those parties by whom the expense of this litigation will have to be borne. Under the circumstances I hold that all the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment severally for the amounts which, on the proper inquiries being taken, shall be found due to them.

I think that it is only fair to add that I do not look on Henry Wood as a rascal. I think that he was an enthusiast believing most firmly in the patent which he had obtained, and he says that he still thinks that the prospectus is all true. I think that he is probably like a good many investors, extravagantly sanguine, and he seems to have taken the advice of a layman with regard to this prospectus who had had something to do with some other prospectus, but I cannot relieve him of responsibility upon that account. With reference to J. L. Wood, I will not say anything upon the way in which he gave his evidence; but apart from that, he chose to rely upon his brother Henry, and he cannot complain that he has been made responsible.

(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills, J.) — Oct. 27.

WANDSWORTH BOARD OF WORKS (Appellants) v. PRETTY (Respondent). (a.)

Metropolis—Streets—Costermonger—Exposing for sale on carriage-way—Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 60, sub-section 7—Metropolitan Streets Act Amendment Act, 1867 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 5), s. 1—Police Regulations of the 28*th of December*, 1869.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 60, sub-section 7, of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, "Every person who shall expose anything for sale . . . upon or so as to hang over any carriage-way or footway . . . so as to cause annoyance or obstruction in any thoroughfare within the Metropolitan Police district, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than forty shillings."

By regulation 6 of the Police Regulations dated the 28*th of December*, 1869, and made under the Metropolitan Streets Act Amendment Act, 1867, it is provided that costermongers and others and their barrows are thereby made liable to be removed from any street and public way in which they cause an obstruction to the traffic, or where they are an annoyance to the inhabitants.

Held, that section 60 and the above regulation do not cover the same ground, and that section 60 was not impliedly repealed by the regulations, nor was the penalty provided for by the said section superseded by them.

This was an appeal on a case stated by one of the Metropolitan police magistrates sitting at the South-Western police-court.

The respondent, who was a costermonger, was summoned upon a complaint made by the appellants, the Wandsworth Board of Works, that she had unlawfully exposed for sale celery upon the carriage-way in a thoroughfare so as to cause annoyance and obstruction in the said thoroughfare contrary to the provisions of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 60.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved the respondent did expose celery for sale upon the carriage-way in Balham High-road, which is a thoroughfare in the Metropolitan police district, in such a manner that she caused annoyance to the inhabitants and obstruction to the traffic. Upon that evidence the magistrate found as a fact that she had exposed celery for sale upon the carriage-way in a thoroughfare within six miles of Charing Cross in such a manner as to create obstruction to traffic and annoyance to the inhabitants, but he refused to fine her and dismissed the summons on the ground that the remedy given by regulation 6 of the Police Regulations, 28th December, 1869, framed under section 1 of the Metropolitan Streets Act Amendment Act, 1867, superseded the remedy provided by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 60.

The sixth regulation provides that "costermongers, street hawkers, and itinerant traders, and their barrows, carts, and stalls are hereby made liable to be removed from any street and public way in which they cause an obstruction to the traffic, or where they are an annoyance to the inhabitants."

By 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 60, it is provided that "every person who, in any street or public place within the limits of the Metropolitan police district, shall be guilty of any of the following offences, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than forty shillings for every such offence."

Sub-section 7 continues: "Every person who shall expose anything for sale . . . upon or so as to hang over any carriage-way or footway . . . so as to cause any annoyance or obstruction in any thoroughfare."

By section 6 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 134), it is provided that "No goods or other articles shall be allowed to rest on any footway or other part of a street within the general limits of this Act or be otherwise allowed to cause obstruction or inconvenience to the passage of the public for a longer time than may be absolutely necessary for loading or unloading such goods or other articles."

"Any person doing any act in contravention of this section shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

Then by the Metropolitan Streets Act Amendment Act, 1867 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 5), s. 1, it is provided that "The sixth section of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, prohibiting the deposit of goods in the streets shall not apply to costermongers, street hawkers, or itinerant traders so long as they carry on their business in accordance with the regulations from time to time made by the Commissioner of Police with the approval of the Secretary of State."

The questions for the opinion of the court were whether section 60, sub-section 7, of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, was impliedly repealed or superseded by the Police Regulations of the 28th of December, 1869, and whether the magistrate's decision was right in law.

Horace Avory, for the appellants.—The magistrate was wrong in not convicting the respondent. The police regulation in question did not impliedly repeal or supersede section 60, sub-section 7, of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47.

No one appeared for the respondent.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. There is no ground for saying either that section 60, sub-section 7, of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 is impliedly repealed by the regulations of the 28th of December, 1869, or that the sixth of these regulations supersedes the remedy provided by section 60. The statute and the regulations do not cover the same ground. Section 60 provides that every person who shall expose anything for sale upon any carriage-way so as to cause annoyance or obstruction in any thoroughfare shall be liable to a certain penalty, whereas number six of these regulations provides that costermongers and their barrows are liable to be removed from any street and public way in which they cause an obstruction to the traffic or an annoyance to the inhabitants. For these reasons I am of opinion that the magistrate's decision was wrong in point of law, and the appeal must be allowed. The case will be remitted to the magistrate to convict.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree.

Case remitted.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BEECH. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Property passing on death—Settlement—Surrender of life estate to remainderman—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2 (sub-section 1 (b)), 5, 7 (sub-section 7).

A tenant for life (who died in 1896), more than twelve months before her death, surrendered her life interest in certain trust property, so as to merge her life estate in the immediate reversioner, who then became absolutely entitled.

Held, that, upon the death of the tenant for life, no property passed on her death within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1 (b), of the Finance Act, 1894, and estate duty was not payable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (46 W. R. 435, [1898] 2 Q. B. 147) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Chitty, and Collins, L.JJ.) reported 46 W. R. 435, [1898] 2 Q. B. 147, reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B., and Ridley, J.), 46 W. R., p. 44, [1897] 2 Q. B. 535, upon an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894.

The facts are set out at length in the report of the case in the Queen's Bench Division. Shortly they are as follows:

Mrs. Beech was entitled under her marriage settlement to the income of real and personal property for her life, with remainder to her son Howard Beech absolutely.

In 1894 she by deed surrendered her life interest in the property to the trustees of the settlement to the end and intent that her life interest might merge in the interest in remainder of her son Howard Beech. Upon the surrender of this life interest to Howard Beech, he became absolute owner of the property.

Mrs. Beech died in August, 1896, upon whose death estate duty was claimed.

The Court of Appeal had held that the duty was not payable.

The Crown appealed.

By the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value, ascertained as hereinafter provided, of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty, called estate duty. . . ."

By section 2, sub-section 1: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following—that is to say: . . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. . . ."

By section 7, sub-section 7: "The value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased shall, (a) if the interest extended to the whole income of the property, be the principal value of that property. . . ."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellant.—The duty is leviable under section 1. What is the natural meaning of these words, "All settled property which passes on the death of the person"? We say it is the ordinary devolution of property, i.e., when a different interest arises. The scheme of the Act so intends. A succession takes place when a different person takes. Due effect has not been given to the words of the Act considered apart from surrender. On the dropping of the life, the remainderman gets an interest in the property. We have not to consider what the individual acquires, but what passes. The remainderman acquires owing to the settlement. Section 2, sub-section 1 (b), means property in which deceased or any other person has a life interest, i.e., an interest ceasing on her death. But for merger, the remainderman would take an assignment of an interest which does cease on the death of the deceased. The character of the interest is considered in this sub-section; the value to be taken as the principal value. The words used in section 5 (dealing with settlement estate duty) must be taken as passing under that disposition. Section 7, sub-section 7, are descriptive of the interest. It was intended to fix the time (the death of the tenant for life) when the duty was payable. On this supposition the scheme works.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Levett, Q.C., W. M. Spence, and Austen Cartmell, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I confess I have not been able to entertain any doubt that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, and that the judgment of the Divisional Court was erroneous.

The real difficulty I have in this case is in speaking with sufficient precision and, at the same time, proper respect towards the argument that has been addressed to us. I do not deny the ingenuity with which it has been sought to invest ordinary language with some extraordinary and subtle meaning which I have not always been able to follow. The subject-matter seems to me to be clear enough. The Finance Act, 1894, is a statute which is intended on the face of it to impose a tax upon property passing on death; that is the meaning of the statute, that is what it purports to do; and in this case I do not see that any property did pass on the death. That seems to me to be the whole case. I am unable to follow any other proposition. It is said, indeed, that there was a life estate, and that when once a settlement has been made, it is supposed to fasten and stamp upon every life estate that may be comprehended within it an indelible obligation to pay estate duty at some time or another. That does not seem to me to be the natural meaning of the words. What the statute is intended to make liable to pay duty is the succession by one person from another upon death; I do not say necessarily from the person who has died—there may be such a thing, of course, as a succession by reason of the death of a person not immediately the former owner of the property in popular language—but some death settled between the parties as the period at which the estate should vest.

But that being the meaning of it, let us see what the facts are here. I assume for the purpose of what I am about to say that the twelve months' limit is out of the question. It is out of the question for two reasons. First, because, as a matter of fact, the period was longer than twelve months when the particular conveyance which is now sought to be charged with the duty was made; and, according to Sir Robert Reid, who has said a good deal to induce one to take that view, his view, at all events, is that it is out of the question for another reason, which I will not stop to consider, because it may prejudice future inquiries if I express any opinion upon it; but that being so, the question here is whether, upon a conveyance inter vivos of the interest that the mother possessed, that falls within the language of the statute, "property passing by death." Again I say I agree with a great deal that has been said about the language which is intended to be understood, and has been used as language to be understood by ordinary people, and not in a technical sense. When the mother had passed her life estate by a conveyance inter vivos to her son, would anybody, untainted by technical views, have said that that estate passed from the mother to her son upon death? Death had nothing to do with it. The moment that conveyance was made the son was completely master of the situation, and he might have sold the property the very next day. That seems to me to dispose of the question under section 1.

Then in what other sense has it passed on the death? It is said that there is certain property which is to be deemed to pass. It seems to me, from what I have already said, that it is very manifest that the Legislature had good reason to use those words "shall be deemed to pass," because, taking the case I have already illustrated, where the death is the point of time at which the new estate shall vest, although it does not pass from the one to the other in a certain sense, yet death is the point of time at which the estate is to pass from the one to the other, and therefore it is deemed to pass within the meaning of the statute.

I think this is the whole question. I cannot argue it any further because it seems to me to speak for itself. It is not necessary here to say that taxing Acts must be precise and particular, and that the object of taxation has to be ascertained, because I am really unable to fix upon any words which even by any doubtful construction can make the tax payable under these circumstances. It appears to me that it would go to the root of the whole principle of the statute itself. The scheme of the Act (which I quite agree is a phrase quite proper to be used, even in respect of a taxing Act) is to inflict taxation upon property passing on death; and the one principle which seems to me to dispose of the whole of the case is that here there is no property passing on death at all; death has no more to do with it than any other immaterial circumstance in the case. That which passed the property, which did operate upon the property that passed, was the conveyance inter vivos which vested the property passed in the person to whom it was conveyed, perfectly independently of, and having no relation to, the death at all.

In these circumstances it appears to me that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was perfectly right, and this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—This is not, according to my apprehension, a very large question; it may be large in its scope, but it certainly depends upon considerations which are very shortly stated in the statute itself which the appellants seek to interpret. The arguments used in support of their contention have been very subtle, very ingenious, and on the whole—excepting in their result—very satisfactory; but I certainly do not see my way to placing upon any taxing statute so wide an interpretation as has been submitted for our approval by the present Attorney-General and his predecessor in office.

I think the case lies exactly where my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has stated it. The Act is one which grants to Her Majesty a right to taxation, which is to be levied in the case of any person dying "upon the principal value of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person." Taking these words by themselves, the construction of the taxing clause would, I think, necessarily be somewhat more limited than follows from the terms of the next section—section 2—which enlarges the scope of the clause. It apparently was anticipated that a court of law might place upon these words, "which passes on the death of such person," a construction limited to property which passed in the ordinary sense of the term from the deceased into the possession and property of another person after his death. But section 2 of the statute widens that interpretation very much, for it extends it to all cases where the survivor of the deceased derives a succession, or, I should say rather, derives a benefit by reason of the death of the deceased, dependent upon and emerging upon the death of the deceased.

The present case is said to fall within sub-section 1 (b) of section 2. I only read the first part of it; the rest is inapplicable. "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." There are two points in that definition in regard to which the present case utterly fails. "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased.

—that is, an interest in him or her at his or her death which did not cease except with his or her lifetime. With regard to the property in question here, it is a right of life rent which was not in the deceased at the time of her death; she had parted with it months before, and accordingly, having so parted with it by a deed inter vivos, it follows that in the words of the remaining part of the definition no benefit accrued or arose by the cesser of her interest.

It is said that the succession—the fee which was taken by the respondent—was taken by him under the settlement. That is true; but it was not taken by him in such circumstances as to render it a succession or interest which was liable to taxation under the Act with which we have to deal.

For these reasons (I do not require to say more) I entirely concur with the judgment moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—I concur with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. This is a taxing Act, and it is essential to see that the tax is expressly imposed, that the subject is not taxed without clear words, and that the natural construction is given to the words used. Here the express words do not support, but contradict the Crown's contention, for as a fact nothing passed on the death of the tenant for life. Practically, the argument for the Crown requires the alteration of the words of the statute so as to include the case of a tenant for life who had previously had an interest which had ceased, not on, but before the death. Indeed, the argument requires not only the alteration, but the insertion of words that the life interest should be deemed to continue down to the death, notwithstanding previous surrender, conveyance, or merger.

I think that the order of the Court of Appeal is quite right.

Lords MACNAGHTEN and MORRIS concurred.

Lord SHAND.—I also concur, and I have only to add that, concurring as I do with what has fallen from all your lordships, I think the reasons given by the Court of Appeal, by Smith and Chitty, L.JJ., are entirely satisfactory, and make the decision of the question quite clear.

Lord DAVEY.—I also concur, and it is really sufficient, so far as section 1 is concerned, to say that this was not settled property at the date of the death, and that it did not pass.

I only desire to add that when the cestuis que trustent under a settlement become absolutely entitled in possession to the trust funds, with power to dispose of the trust funds without the consent of any other parties, the settlement, according to every rule and doctrine, is at an end. The trustees are functi officio, they have no longer any duties to perform, they have no longer any interest to protect; their position is exclusively that of bare trustees for the persons absolutely entitled, and whether those persons absolutely entitled choose to get in the outstanding legal estate, or do not care to get in the legal estate, cannot make the faintest difference in their position as absolute owners with power of dealing with the estate; and it is a complete fallacy, in my opinion, to say that the respondent in the present case was, after he took a surrender of his mother's life interest, the owner of two separate interests. He was the absolute owner of the property, and one cannot be more than the absolute owner of the property. There is no single test of absolute ownership that can be applied to his position at that date which shows that he was in any degree other than the absolute owner of the property. If he was the absolute owner of the property before his mother's death, he remained absolute owner of the property afterwards, and there was no passing of the estate—that is, no change of ownership by reason of her death.

This is not a mere technical doctrine, it is the expression of a fact. A man, it may be, had a conveyance from half-a-dozen persons, but from whomsoever he derives his title, however many be the persons who join in conveying to him, if he has got the absolute ownership he is the owner of one estate or interest—namely, the ownership in fee of real estate, or absolute owner of personal estate.

With regard to section 2 it may be said (as Sir Robert Reid in particular argued) that although this property did not pass, it is to be deemed to pass. I do not differ from what has been already said as to the construction of that section. It appears to me shortly upon that section that neither the deceased nor any other person had an interest ceasing at the death of the deceased at the time when the duty attached—namely, the death of the deceased; and it also appears to me that no benefit can be shown to have accrued or arisen in any form whatever to the respondent by the cesser of that interest. That seems to me to dispose of the case.

With regard to the difficulties raised by Sir Robert Reid as to the fearful consequences of evasion which this decision would lead to, I am not convinced that he takes a right view of the construction and effect of section 2, sub-section 1 (c); but it is not necessary to express any opinion whatever about that, and I abstain from doing so. It may be, even if he is right, that the point was overlooked by Parliament, or that Parliament thought that section 2, sub-section 1 (c), would hit it and were mistaken; but in either case I cannot see that it can in any way affect the construction to be put upon this Act.

Lord LUDLOW.—If this taxing Act is to be interpreted and read according to established principles, and if there is to be given to the words used in it their ordinary popular meaning, I can only say that I have not the slightest hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the judgments of the Court of Appeal were perfectly right; I concur with them, and I am unable to agree with the decision of the Divisional Court.

Ex parte THE SHERIFF OF MIDDLESEX. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Execution—Sheriff's right to poundage—Goods seized but not sold—Sale stopped by official receiver—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11, sub-section 1—Order as to Fees (31*st August*, 1888) under the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55).

A sheriff who has seized goods under a judgment, but has, by notice of a receiving order and a request (under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890) to deliver the goods to the official receiver, been prevented from selling, is not entitled to poundage.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division (Wright and Darling, JJ.).

In March, 1898, the Sheriff of Middlesex, under a writ of execution issued in an action in which the debtor, H. P. Thomas, was defendant, seized goods belonging to the debtor. The sale of the goods so seized was duly advertised to take place on the 31st of March, 1898; but on the 29th of March the official receiver served the sheriff, who was still in possession, with notice that a receiving order had been made against the debtor, and further requested him (in pursuance of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890) to deliver the goods to the official receiver. The sheriff did, accordingly, deliver up the goods. Afterwards the sheriff sent in to the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy a bill of charges which included a charge for poundage. On taxation the registrar of the Edmonton County Court disallowed the charge for poundage.

The question turned upon, first, sub-section 1 of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890; and, secondly, the order made under the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), which is set out in the Annual Practice for 1899, vol. 2, pp. 236-239.

The former enacts that "where any goods of a debtor are taken in execution, and before the sale thereof or the completion of the execution by the receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy, notice is served on the sheriff that a receiving order has been made against the debtor, the sheriff shall, on request, deliver the goods and any money seized or received in part satisfaction of the execution to the official receiver, but the costs of the execution shall be a first charge on the goods or money so delivered, and the official receiver or trustee may sell the goods, or an adequate part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying the charge." The latter provides that "sheriff's poundage and the fee for delivery of the writ to the under-sheriff shall be the same as before the making of this order" (item No. 11); that "the foregoing fees, numbered . . . 11, shall be levied in every case in which an execution is completed by sale"; and that "where an execution is . . . stopped the fees under this order shall be paid by the person . . . at whose instance the sale is stopped."

The county court judge reversed the decision of the registrar, and allowed the poundage.

The trustee in bankruptcy appealed to the Divisional Court, which reversed the decision of the county court judge and restored that of the registrar, but gave leave to appeal.

The sheriff appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appeal.—Poundage is part of the "costs of the execution" within section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Poundage is the only remuneration allowed to the sheriff, except the fee for seizure, and is payable when the money is obtained without a sale: Madeley v. Greenwood, 42 Solicitors' Journal, 34. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Under the old law poundage was not allowed unless there was a sale: Sneary v. Abdy, 1 Ex. D. 299, 24 W. R. Dig. 262.] The person who "stops" a sale is liable to pay poundage. Here the official receiver stopped the sale by his request to deliver the goods, and the trustee must pay. Mere notice that a receiving order had been made would not have stopped it: Trustee of Woolford's Estate v. Levy, 40 W. R. 483, [1892] 1 Q. B. 772, at pp. 779, 781, 782. The two cases which seem to be against me, Miles v. Harris, 12 C. B. N. S. 550, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 67; and In re Ludford, 33 W. R. 152, (sub. nom. In re Ludmore) 13 Q. B. D. 415, are distinguishable, because they were before the order as to fees of the 31st of August, 1888 (Annual Practice, 1899, vol. 2, pp. 236-239); and some of the observations of the judges there are in my favour. In re Harrison, Ex parte Sheriff of Essex, 41 W. R. 512, [1893] 2 Q. B. 111, was a decision on a different fee (the possession money).

He also referred to Lee v. Dangar, 40 W. R. 469 [1892], 2 Q. B. D. 337.

J. D. Crawford, for the trustee in bankruptcy, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—It appears to me that the decision appealed from is perfectly correct. First of all, let us take this case apart from the rules about the sheriff's fees which were made under the Act of 1887. Apart from those rules the sheriff has, to my mind, no case at all. That is as plain as anything in law can be. The sheriff has seized, no doubt, but he has not sold; and, as he has not sold, he is, by the law which had been settled for years, not entitled to poundage. I know that there is a qualification upon that doctrine of law where the sheriff has seized, and where, although he has not sold, the court has regarded him as having produced the money which has been obtained by the execution creditor. As to the case of Madeley v. Greenwood, if in that case the execution creditor did not get his money I should think that the decision was wrong; if he did get it, the decision may be right. But apart from that consideration that the sheriff produced the money received by the execution creditor—a consideration which we have not to consider here, because, of course, nobody here has got any money through the sheriff's action—I say again that, unless the rules of 1888 make a difference in his favour, the sheriff has no case at all. That is consistent with the decision in Miles v. Harris. Mr. Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant, contends that the order of 1888 is more beneficial to him than the old law was. We must look at that, of course. [His lordship read the material parts of the order, and proceeded:] There is not a word to direct that the sheriff shall be entitled to poundage when he does not sell; the language rather shows that the Rule Committee did not mean to interfere at all with the right to poundage. What they say does not assist the appellant in any way whatever. The right of the sheriff to what is called poundage is given by a statute of Elizabeth, and poundage is payable to the sheriff only on a sale, or possibly on the realization of money by a seizure without a sale; but here there was no sale. I think that, having regard to the case of The Trustee of Woolford's Estate v. Levy, Mr. Muir Mackenzie is right in saying that the official receiver, or Thomas's trustee in bankruptcy, whoever it was that served the sheriff with the notice and the request to deliver the goods, did "stop the sale." But that does not carry the appellant through, for what is to be paid is "the fees under this order." Now, that cannot mean that all the fees enumerated in the order are to be paid whether they have been earned or not; that would be nonsense. What must be meant, because it is the only sensible construction, is that such fees as have been earned up to the time of the stoppage of the sale are to be paid; unless we are to go the preposterous and absurd length of saying that all the "foregoing fees" are to be paid whenever the execution has been stopped.

I think we cannot decide in Mr. Muir Mackenzie's favour. The appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. I do not think that the exceptional cases in which the sheriff had his poundage though he had not sold—where, namely, the money had been obtained by the fact of his taking possession—ought to be treated as governing the present case.

Vaughan Williams, L.J., said: The sheriff's poundage is a fee which is given by a statute of Queen Elizabeth. Now, the words of that statute did leave an open question, because the expression was simply "levy, or extend and deliver in execution." But it was decided—although I cannot give the name of the case,* I am certain it was decided—even earlier than the case of Miles v. Harris, which was cited to us this morning, that "levy" in that statute meant turning the goods into money; and in Miles v. Harris itself Erle, C.J., when he comes to deliver judgment, says that he was only confirming a previous decision. He says: "The question is whether a seizure of goods under the fi. fa. is a levy within that statute. I am of opinion that the sheriff has not levied so as to be entitled to poundage under that statute until the goods seized have been turned into money." There has been no departure in any of the cases from that rule. It is quite true that in a case where the execution creditor has stopped the sale because he has got his money, that has in some way or other been held to be within the scope of the statute. But that consideration has here no application whatsoever. The eleventh item of the order of August, 1888, gives the sheriff the same poundage and fee for delivery of the writ as he was entitled to before the making of that order; and it really is not denied that the fees given to him there are the fees he earned down to the time of the notice of the receiving order and the demand for possession of the goods. According to the principle laid down in the case just cited, poundage has not been earned because the goods have not been turned into money.

Appeal dismissed.

Lower Rhine and Würtemberg Insurance Association v. Sedgwick. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Re-insurance—Lapse of original policies—New policy—Alteration of risk—Liability under policy of reinsurance.

An underwriter who had subscribed two time policies on a ship valued therein at £5,600 effected a reinsurance by a time policy which was expressed to be a policy on the same ship, "being a reinsurance of policy or policies, and subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon." The first of the original policies having expired, the second original policy was cancelled, and the underwriter subscribed a new time policy on the same ship, which was valued therein at £5,000.

Held, that risk undertaken by the new policy was not covered by the reinsurance.

Judgment of Kennedy, J. (46 W. R. 380, [1898] 1 Q. B. 739), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, reported 46 W. R. 380, [1898], 1 Q. B. 739.

The action was brought to recover money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant on a policy of reinsurance under a mistake of fact.

On the 20th of February, 1896, the defendant, who was an underwriter at Lloyd's, and six other underwriters, subscribed for £50 each a policy of insurance upon the steamship Collynie for twelve calendar months, the total amount insured being £350. The steamer was valued as follows: Hull, £3,600; machinery, £2,000—total, £5,600. The premium was at the rate of nine guineas per cent. Time clauses were inserted providing for the return of a certain portion of premium in certain events.

On the 20th of June, 1896, the defendant, with six others, subscribed for £25 each a further policy upon the same ship for twelve calendar months, the total amount insured being £850. The risks, the valuation on hull and machinery, the premium, and the time clauses were identical with those in the former policy.

On the 27th of November, 1896, the defendant and his six co-insurers effected a policy of reinsurance with the plaintiffs. This policy was expressed to be for £250 on the ship Collynie from the 4th of November, 1896, to the 20th of June, 1897, the hull and machinery being valued at £5,600, and the premium being at the rate of ten guineas per cent. Affixed upon the policy by a rubber stamp was the following clause, "Being a reinsurance of policy or policies . . . and subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, whether reinsurance or otherwise, and to pay as may be paid thereon."

The original policies were not asked for or shown to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs themselves again reinsured under a policy dated the 12th of November against total loss only.

On the 20th of February, 1897, the first policy expired by effluxion of time, and the second policy, of the 20th of June, 1896, was cancelled, and the defendant, with eight others, subscribed a new policy for £50 each on the same ship for twelve calendar months. This policy was for £1,040, on hull and machinery valued at £5,000. The premium was at the rate of ten guines per cent., and the time clauses providing for return of premium differed from those in the two original policies.

On the 3rd of May, 1897, The Collynie was totally lost, and the plaintiffs paid the defendant for a total loss under the policy of reinsurance of the 27th of November, 1896, the defendant having paid his assured for a total loss under the policy of the 20th of February, 1897.

When the plaintiffs sought to recover from their reinsurers, their reinsurers asked to see the original policies, and the plaintiffs then ascertained the facts, which before they were ignorant of, relating to the cancellation of the policy of the 20th of June, 1896, and the substitution in its place of the policy of the 20th of February, 1897. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action.

At the trial Kennedy, J., gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26.—A. L. Smith, L.J., read the following judgment: The point raised in this case is, What risk has an underwriting company covered under a policy of marine reinsurance dated the 27th of November, 1896?

unfilled-up clause attached, by means of a rubber stamp, to the margin of a policy upon ship against perils of the sea. Although the action is brought by the company to recover back money paid under a mistake of fact, it will be convenient to treat the case as if were an action by Mr. Sedgwick, the reinsured, to recover from his reinsurers a loss under a policy of reinsurance, for it is not disputed that the effect of the rubber clause attached to the policy is to cut down the policy upon ship to a policy of reinsurance.

The question is whether a policy dated the 20th of February, 1897, which I shall call "the new policy," and which was effected after the reinsurance policy of the 27th of November, 1896, is covered by that policy. Prior to the 27th of November, 1896, Mr. Sedgwick and others had underwritten two time policies upon the ship Collynie. The first is dated the 20th of February, 1896, and covers the ship against sea perils from the 20th of February, 1896, to the 20th of February, 1897, to the amount of £350. The hull and machinery is therein valued at £5,600—hull at £3,600 and the machinery at £2,000—and time clauses are inserted in this policy.

The second policy is dated the 20th of June, 1896, by which Mr. Sedgwick and others underwrote a further risk upon the same ship against sea perils, covering her from the 20th of June, 1896, to the 20th of June, 1897, to the amount of £850. This policy, with the exception of the time covered and the amount underwritten, is identical with the policy of the 20th of February, 1896. The hull and machinery are again valued at £5,600—hull at £3,600 and the machinery at £2,000—and similar time clauses are inserted.

Whilst these two policies were running, Mr. Sedgwick, being under liability as underwriter thereon, caused the reinsurance policy now in question to be effected with the company.

By this policy (27th of November, 1896) the company, by way of reinsuring Mr. Sedgwick, covered the ship Collynie against perils of the sea from the 4th of November, 1896, to the 20th of June, 1897, to the amount of £250, the hull and machinery being together valued at £5,600. Affixed upon this policy by a rubber stamp is the following clause, which is called for brevity "the rubber clause": "Being a reinsurance of policy or policies" (here a blank space is left unfilled in) "and subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, whether reinsurance or otherwise, and to pay as may be paid thereon."

The effect of this clause I have before stated. It converts a policy upon ship into a policy of reinsurance; but what upon its true construction are the interests—or, as I prefer to call them, the liabilities—of Mr. Sedgwick which this rubber clause covers? Is the true reading that the company reinsured Mr. Sedgwick only against loss which might accrue to him under the two original policies then existing which he had theretofore underwritten, as the company contend, or is it that the company also reinsured any loss Mr. Sedgwick might incur under policy or policies which he might thereafter underwrite upon the ship Collynie, always assuming such loss to occur during the continuance of the reinsurance policy, which is what Mr. Sedgwick contends for?

The ship Collynie was lost upon the 27th of May, 1897, which was after the first policy underwritten by Mr. Sedgwick had expired, and after the second policy had been cancelled, which took place upon the 20th of February, 1897, but during the continuance of the reinsurance policy.

Upon the 20th of February, 1897, which it will be seen was about three months after the plaintiffs had underwritten the policy of reinsurance (27th of November, 1896), Mr. Sedgwick underwrote a new risk upon The Collynie to cover her from the 20th of February, 1897, to the 20th of February, 1898.

In this new policy of the 20th February, 1897, the hull and machinery of The Collynie are valued at £5,000, and not £5,600. This, in my opinion, for reasons hereafter given, plays an important part in this case.

Mr. Sedgwick's case is that this new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, effected after the making of the reinsurance policy, is covered by the rubber clause, and my brother Kennedy has so held.

It is argued by the learned counsel for Mr. Sedgwick that as by marine insurance law a policy upon ship or goods covers the interest of an assured which exists at the date of loss, and not necessarily at the date of the policy, and as the interest of an assured under a marine policy may vary between the time the policy is effected and the date of loss, the rubber clause by law is capable of covering the new risk Mr. Sedgwick undertook under the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, for at the date of the loss of the ship Mr. Sedgwick was liable as underwriter thereunder, and consequently had an interest covered by the reinsurance policy.

These propositions of law are not denied by the learned counsel for the company; but they insist, and I think rightly, that the question still remains, what under the reinsurance policy were the interests—or, as I call them, the liabilities—of Mr. Sedgwick which were covered.

It is said for Mr. Sedgwick that the company might have inserted in the space left blank in the rubber clause the numbers of the two then existing original policies, and have limited the reinsurance to such policies, but not having done so, the company have reinsured any liability Mr. Sedgwick might undertake by underwriting any policy or policies upon the ship Collynie subsequent to the reinsurance being effected, if the loss then insured against occurred during the time the reinsurance was running. I do not agree with this.

At the date of the reinsurance policy two original policies, and two only, were in existence upon which Mr. Sedgwick was liable as underwriter. I agree that a person who effects a reinsurance primâ facie reinsures the liability he is under when he effects the reinsurance, and not a liability he is not then under, and may never thereafter come under. To cover this latter liability I should expect to find some words showing that this latter liability was covered.

Do I find such words in the rubber clause upon the reinsurance policy? By it the company reinsures policy or policies subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon. It seems to me that the original policy or policies here mentioned are the two original policies then in existence. Then what are the policy or policies subject to the same terms and conditions as the original policy or policies? They may include a policy or policies effected after the original policy and policies, and I am not prepared to say that the words are not sufficient to embrace a policy or policies effected after the date of the reinsurance policy; but it is unnecessary to decide this, for I am clear that to come within the rubber clause the policy or policies to be thereafter effected must contain the same terms, conditions, and clauses as the original policy or policies. Does, then, the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, fulfil these conditions? Does it contain the same terms, conditions, and clauses as the original policy or policies? My brother Kennedy saw the point about the difference of values in the original policies and reinsurance policy and the new policy, but he said that this was immaterial, because the ship Collynie was a total loss, and the difference in value did not matter in this case; but I think this point cannot be thus evaded, and must be dealt with in order to see whether the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, comes within the rubber clause, and the question is not to be determined upon whether the ship happens to be a total loss or not.

The new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, is upon hull and machinery valued at £5,000, and not £5,600 valued separately as in the original policies. Does this make a material difference between the terms, conditions, and clauses of the original policies and the new policy? I think it certainly does, and to bring out the difference I will take a concrete case. In every case of damage happening to the Collynie for which Mr. Sedgwick was liable under the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, excepting in the case of a total loss of ship, an important factor in ascertaining what was Mr. Sedgwick's liability thereunder would be the agreed value of the hull and machinery—i.e., £5,000. Take the case of the question being as to whether the ship was a constructive total loss or not under the new policy. Take cost of repairs as being £5,250—the agreed value is £5,000. Mr. Sedgwick would have to pay under the new policy as for a total loss, because the cost of repairs would exceed the agreed value. When he came upon his reinsurance policy the ship would not be a constructive total loss, for the agreed value of the ship being £5,600, it would exceed the cost of repairs—i.e., £5,250—by £350. What then? Mr. Sedgwick would have as underwriter to pay his assured under the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, as for a total loss, and could only recover an average loss from his reinsurers. It was stated and admitted by Mr. Sedgwick's counsel that £5,600 was to be taken as the agreed value of the hull and machinery between Mr. Sedgwick and the company under the policy of reinsurance.

Now, by the rubber clause the reinsurers have agreed with Mr. Sedgwick "to pay as may be paid thereon"—that is, as he pays under the policies he has underwritten, they will pay him up to the amount of £250 underwritten by them, which to my mind shows that the rubber clause deals, as it says, with policy or policies which contain the same terms, conditions, and clauses as the two original policies, and not with policies which do not; and this is the position of the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897.

In my judgment, upon this ground the new policy of the 20th of February, 1897, is not covered by the rubber clause, and Mr. Sedgwick therefore cannot claim from the company as reinsurers losses he may have had to pay as underwriter thereunder.

For these reasons I cannot agree with my brother Kennedy, and I think judgment should be for the company.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. At the date of the policy of reinsurance the construction of which has to be dealt with in this case, there were in existence two policies, which must in my opinion be deemed to be the original policies referred to in the rubber clause. The risk on those policies was covered by the reinsurance policy so long as the policies themselves were running. They, however, came to an end before the loss of the ship, and the only policy in existence at the date of the loss was expressed in terms different in material respects from those original policies. In particular, the valuation of the ship and machinery at £5,000, instead of £3,600 on hull and £2,000 on machinery as in the policies in existence at the date of the reinsurance policy, brought about such a difference in the risk thereunder as to make it impossible that a reinsurance thereon should be on the same terms, conditions, and clauses as the original policies. In my judgment, therefore, in the facts of this case the reinsurance policy does not extend to cover the risk under the newly-effected policy. In other words, the insured could not recover anything on the reinsurance. I think it unnecessary to determine what would have been the case if there had been no policy underwritten by the reinsured at the time of the reinsurance, or if the new policy had been on the same terms as the policies that were then in existence.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: The real point in this case turns on the construction of the rubber clause in the policy of reinsurance. Is it framed to cover any risks upon the vessel which the assured may underwrite during the period named, or is it limited to specific ascertained risks? Is it in fact, what it purports primâ facie to be, a reinsurance of an actual existing risk covered by an original policy or policies; or is it an antecedent undertaking to indemnify the assured against any future undefined risks which he may undertake on the named vessel within the given period? If the latter is the true construction, the judgment appealed from is right; if not, it is wrong.

I think the decision of this question stands quite outside the consideration of insurable interest so much pressed upon us in the brilliant argument for the respondent. No question of insurable interest arises in this case; and if it did, it is elementary law that its existence is material only at the time of the loss. It is not material, therefore, to contend that it would be legally possible to make an antecedent contract with an underwriter whereby he should undertake to hold the assured indemnified on all liabilities which he should come under in respect of risks to be undertaken by him within a given period. But it is obvious that the indefiniteness of the risks would be an important factor in determining the amount of the premium. The question here is whether, looking at the plain words of the policy taken in conjunction with the surrounding facts, the subject-matter of the contract was risks already undertaken by the assured under existing policies capable of being described. It seems to me that this is the fair meaning of the clause. It is described as "being a reinsurance," which in strictness it is not if there is no antecedent insurance, and it is only by somewhat straining the plain primâ facie meaning of the words that they can be held to describe an undertaking to indemnify against risks not already underwritten. The clause goes on, "of policy or policies," leaving a blank for their specification. This again, in my opinion, is framed to cover the case of existing risks. It is inapt to cover policies not yet in existence and incapable of specification. Something more than filling in the blank would be required to make the clause grammatically applicable to risks to be undertaken afterwards. The form is not framed to cover such a case. But the concluding words of the clause are, I think, even less adapted to cover future and variable risks. They are: "And subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, whether reinsurance or otherwise, and to pay as may be paid thereon." This, as was pointed out, is the essence of the contract. Its purpose is to cover in whole or in part the risk actually undertaken on "an original" policy. The standard of liability must be ascertained and identical in both cases. I do not mean that the whole sum underwritten must be covered by the reinsurance, neither need the whole risk. For instance, the original policy may cover any loss, total or partial; the reinsurance may be against total only, or partial only; but the conditions under which one or the other can be recovered are to be identical, so that the payment on the reinsurance may be "as paid" on the original. The clause does not provide for, and it seems to me excludes, the possibility of the same facts giving rise to a claim for total loss on the original policy, and for partial only on the reinsurance policy. The valuation, therefore, in the original and the covering policy ought to be the same where both are valued, and a condition of the former is that in case of constructive total loss the valuation in the policy is to be taken as the value of the ship when repaired; otherwise the main provision of the clause will be defeated, and the standard of liability will never be the same under the two policies except in the single case of an actual total loss. In considering, therefore, the clause itself, and looking, as I am entitled to do, at the surrounding facts to ascertain the subject-matter to which it was applicable, I find that at the date of the policy of reinsurance there were in existence two policies underwritten by the assured on the same ship at the same valuation—namely, £5,600, which is the valuation named in the covering policy; and I hold that it was the risk on these policies only that was intended to be covered by the reinsurance, which in its terms is in my judgment inapplicable to a policy subsequently effected at a different valuation. It is not and cannot be questioned that at the time the reinsurance was effected it was intended to cover the two existing policies, and complete effect could be given to every word in the reinsurance policy had the loss taken place while these policies were running.

But substitute for these policies a policy at a different valuation, and the standard of liability under the new policy and the reinsurance policy is no longer the same, but different. The argument for the respondent, that the rights of the assured on the reinsurance policy will always be measured by reference to the standard of the reinsurance and not of the "original" policy, does not meet the difficulty, as it admits that the standard of liability would not in such a case be identical; but that it should be identical I look upon as the governing intention of the clause. For instance, in this case Mr. Walton had to admit that, having regard to the difference in the valuation in the new policy and the reinsurance policy, coupled with the provision in the time clauses as to "repaired value," that which would be a constructive total loss under the former might be only a partial loss under the latter, and consequently that, though the amount insured in both policies was the same, the amount payable under the first would be different from that recoverable under the second, and thus what I hold to be the plain intention of the "rubber clause" would be defeated.

The inference from identity of valuation in the policies current at the date of the reinsurance, and in the reinsurance itself, is not, in my judgment, weakened by the fact that in the current policies this valuation was the sum of two named factors. The lump valuation is not inconsistent with the detailed valuation of the original policies, and the words of the rubber clause, "to be paid as paid thereon," would, I think, equalize the scale of payment under the original and covering policy. Still less does it affect the argument that policies to be brought under the reinsurance policy must, if due effect is to be given to the rubber clause, be at the same valuation. The valuation at £5,600 has a twofold operation: it helps to identify the subject-matter as being the two existing policies at that valuation, and it excludes a subsequent policy at a different valuation from the scope and intention of the clause. Neither do I draw any inference adverse to the underwriter in this case from the fact that the blanks were not filled up. I think this was probably a mere omission in the hurry of business, and has not had the effect of converting a clause framed, in my judgment, to meet specific risks into a general ambulatory undertaking to cover indefinite risks.

The argument for the respondent which was adopted by Kennedy, J., was that any policy effected by the assured on the same ship after the reinsurance during the named period might become the "original policy" within the meaning of the clause, and the respondent was bound to say so, as the contract of the reinsurance is to pay "as paid thereon"—i.e., on the original. But I think it is quite impossible to make the language of the clause fit such a construction. As I have already pointed out, the two policies existing at the date of the insurance must in the circumstances of this case have been "the originals" at the date of the reinsurance. If so, it must be the terms and conditions of these policies, and no others, that are to govern the contract, and unless money is "paid thereon"—i.e., on these policies, none becomes payable under the reinsurance. Whether or not, therefore, the clause was capable of covering risks not theretofore accepted in a case where none had been accepted at the date of the reinsurance, the fact that in this case risks had been accepted under existing policies which were intended to be covered by the reinsurance necessarily, it seems to me, by constituting these policies "the originals," ties the clause to these policies, and limits the obligation of the reinsurer to pay as paid thereon; and since nothing became due thereon, nothing is payable by the reinsurer. I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

ELLETSON v. PILLERS. (a.)

Practice—Payment into court—Trustee.

A trustee, in answer to a motion that he should pay into court money arising from the sale of shares forming part of the trust property, swore that he in good faith paid away the purchase-money in the belief that he was entitled thereto, and no part thereof was then in his hands.

Held, that as the terms of the affidavit did not shew that the trustee had no control over the purchase-money, he must bring the sum into court.

Motion.

William Benson, by his will dated the 17th of October, 1888, gave all his real and personal estate to the plaintiff and defendant, whom he appointed his executors, upon trust for sale and conversion and investment of the proceeds, and subject to his widow's life interest, on trust for the plaintiff.

The testator died on the 30th of December, 1888, and the widow on the 21st of August, 1898.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 19th of September, 1898, the plaintiff and defendant executed transfers of 195 fully-paid preference shares of £5 each in the Fishponds and Bedminster Brick and Tile Co., 335 ordinary shares, and a debenture for £1,000 to the defendant. Certain shares were also transferred to the plaintiff. The defendant sold part of the shares transferred to him for £2,025.

The defendant was a solicitor, and had managed the trust estate. He alleged that the plaintiff had given him the shares as remuneration for his services.

The only question in dispute was whether the defendant could be ordered to pay into court the purchase-money of the shares sold by him. By his affidavit he admitted having sold the shares and received the purchase-money, but said: "Before any question was raised as to the said transfers I in good faith paid away and disposed of all the said purchase-money in the belief that I was entitled thereto, and no part thereof is now in my hands, and I have no power over the said 195 preference shares and the 200 ordinary shares, or any of them."

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Ribton, for the plaintiff.—The defendant must show that he has paid the money to someone entitled to it to resist this motion.

They cited Neville v. Matthewman, 42 W. R. 675, [1894] 3 Ch. 345; Nutter v. Holland, 43 W. R. 18, [1894] 3 Ch. 408; and Crompton and Evans Union Bank v. Burton, 44 W. R. 60, [1895] 2 Ch. 711.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and C. James.—The question is simply gift or no gift. The defendant does not admit that he has trust money in his hands.

Vernon Smith replied.

NORTH, J., referred to the facts, and said: The defendant has made an affidavit in which he says that he is entitled to the property as a gift from the plaintiff, and that it has ceased to be trust money. Of course if it is clearly established that there was a gift to him deliberately made by the plaintiff in such circumstances that he as a solicitor is entitled to retain it, it did cease to be trust property. That will have to be decided at the trial of the action. At present it is absolutely impossible to say that the court ought to be satisfied that the property has ceased to be trust property merely because the defendant says that there was a gift to him. I do not think that it makes any difference that some of the shares have been sold. If the shares are trust property the proceeds must be also trust property. The terms of the affidavit do not show that the defendant has no control over the proceeds of the sale. The defendant says that he has no power over the shares he has sold, but he does not say that he has no power over the purchase-money he has received. He says that he has disposed of it in good faith, but that would be consistent with its standing at this moment to his credit at his bank. He does not say that the money was not in his power or under his control, and I do not think his affidavit sufficient to relieve him from liability to pay the £2,025 into court, which he must do within a month.

DREW v. DREW. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift to wife of testator's son—Second wife.

Where in a will a gift is made to the wife of a person married at the date of the will, in the absence of any context to show the contrary the wife in existence at that date is the person benefited.

A testator gave the income of a share of his residuary estate to his son for life, after his death to his wife for life, and after her decease to the children of his son living at the time of the son's death. The will also contained a clause that in the event of the son's bankruptcy the trustees should apply the income of the share thereinbefore directed to be invested for the said son and his family for the benefit of the said son, his wife, and children.

Held, that there was sufficient context to take the case out of the general rule, and that a second wife of the son could benefit under the gift.

This was a summons raising the question as to what person was intended by the testator when he spoke of the wife of one of his sons, to whom he gave an interest in part of his property.

The testator gave all his property to trustees upon trust for the benefit of his wife during her life; and then, subject to that, "out of the said rents and profits, dividends, interest, and income which shall arise for and during the first sixteen years next following my decease" to make certain payments; and upon further trust to divide the surplus rent and profits in thirteen equal parts. Then he gave one-thirteenth part to his son Beriah Harvey Drew for so many years after the term of sixteen years as he should live; "and as to one-thirteenth part hereinbefore directed to be paid to my said son Beriah Harvey Drew upon trust to pay the same after his decease to his wife during the remainder of the said term of sixteen years in case she shall so long live for her separate inalienable use, and from and after her decease upon trust to pay the same to the child or children of my said son Beriah Harvey who shall be living at his decease for and during the remainder of the period of sixteen years in case they or any one or more of them shall so long live." Then after the period of sixteen years he directed a sale, and gave "the remaining one-thirteenth part of the said trust funds upon trust to lay out and invest the same in Government or real securities at interest, or in the purchase of preference shares in some or one approved railways or railway, and to pay the interest, dividends, or income arising from the money so invested unto my son Beriah Harvey Drew for and during the term of his natural life, and from and after the decease of my son Beriah Harvey Drew unto the wife of my said son for and during her natural life for her separate inalienable use, and from and after her decease upon trust to pay such interest, dividends, and income to the lawful child or children of my said son Beriah Harvey who shall be living at his decease, and who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years; and on such child or children attaining his, her, or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years upon trust to pay to or divide the said principal moneys or share so invested amongst his children, if more than one share and share alike, and if only one then to such only child." The will also contained the following proviso:

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"I do declare it to be my will that the part and share of the surplus rents and profits, dividends, and income hereinbefore provided for my said son Beriah Harvey Drew, and also the thirteenth part or share of the net moneys arising from the sale of my residuary estates and property hereinbefore directed to be invested for his benefit during his life, are so respectively by me given and provided for him, and shall be had and enjoyed by my said son only until he shall alien, or attempt to alien, charge, or encumber the same, or any part thereof, or until he shall become bankrupt or insolvent within the meaning of any Act of Parliament, or do or admit any act whereby the same benefits would, but for this limitation, become payable to or vested in any other person or persons, official or otherwise. And after the determination of the interest so given or intended for my said son Beriah Harvey Drew, upon trust that the said trustees or trustee for the time being do and shall retain and keep in their own hands the share of and in the said surplus rents and profits, interest, dividends, and income, and the interest, dividends, and income of the thirteenth part or share hereinbefore directed to be invested for my said son Beriah Harvey Drew and his family, and every part thereof, for the purpose of applying the same in or towards the maintenance and support of my said son Beriah Harvey Drew, his wife, and children, at such time or times and in such manner and in such proportions as the said trustees or trustee shall in their or his entire discretion think fit, or otherwise paying the same to any one or more of my other children or their respective issue."

The testator died in 1862. At the date of the will B. H. Drew was married. His wife died, and on the 5th of April, 1890, he married the defendant Sarah Ann Drew. B. H. Drew died on the 16th of February, 1898, and the question now arose whether the second wife was entitled to the income of the thirteenth share during her life.

The arguments used and cases cited appear from the judgment.

STIRLING, J.—This is a case which it is not satisfactory to decide, either having regard to the state of the authorities or the principle on which the case must be decided. [His lordship then stated the facts, and continued:] As regards the rule of law, the proposition which is admitted in this case is that primâ facie where the wife of a person is spoken of, and that person is married at the time of the will, in the absence of any context to show the contrary the wife in existence at the date of the will is the person benefited. That proposition is clear, and is not disputed. The sole question I have to consider, therefore, is whether there is any context in this case to take it out of the general proposition. Two circumstances are relied on. The first is the gift to the children of B. H. Drew. As to this gift, it is argued that the children are, and must necessarily be, children by any wife, because they are described in the first place as his children, and secondly, the class is limited to those children who are living at the time of his death. That is the first thing, and it is said upon that, that as the children to be benefited are children by any wife, it would be an extraordinary thing if the wife to be benefited should not also be the wife living at the time of the death of B. H. Drew. The second ground is that in the clause which provides for the destination of the income of this one-thirteenth in the event of alienation or bankruptcy on the part of B. H. Drew, his wife and children are to be the objects of the discretionary trust, and I think it was hardly argued by counsel that in that clause the wife intended was not a second wife, but it was said that that clause did not throw any light on the previous gift, but only operated on the income which, but for the alienation or bankruptcy, would have come to the son.

As regards authority the matter stands in a somewhat peculiar position. The two cases which have been relied on by Mr. Dickinson in support of his argument—namely, Radford v. Willis, 20 W. R. 132, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 7, and Firth v. Fielden, 22 W. R. 622, appear to me to clearly establish the first proposition which I have stated, which is not disputed.

Then, as regards the effect of the first element contained in the objection, that the gift is to the children of B. H. Drew—namely, children by his first, second, or any subsequent wife, the authorities seem to me to be somewhat conflicting. First, there is the decision of Kindersley, V.C., in In re Burrows' Trusts, 10 L. T. Rep. 184, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 113. There a testator directed that if the wife of his brother, William Burrows, survived her husband she should enjoy for her life the property given by the will to William Burrows for life, with remainder to his children, and that the division should not take place till after her death. In that case it was held that the wife there meant was not a second wife. On the other hand, in In re Lyne's Trust, L. R. 8 Eq. 65, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 186, in which, unfortunately, In re Burrows was not mentioned, the testator gave £800 to trustees to pay the dividends to his son for life, and after his decease to transfer the capital unto and equally between and amongst the wife of his son (in case she should survive him) and all and every the child and children of his son equally upon their attaining twenty-one, at which period the shares of such children were to be vested in them. At the date of the will the son had a wife and one child, but the wife died before the testator. After the testator's death his son married again and died, leaving a widow, who claimed to be entitled to a moiety of the fund equally with the only child of the son, and Malins, V.C., held that the gift was to a class consisting of all the children and any wife of the son who survived him.

As regards the effect of the second element two authorities have been cited, neither of them, perhaps, directly in point, one being Longworth v. Bellamy, in 40 L. J. Ch. 513, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 127, in which there was a gift by a testator of his property to trustees in trust as to different portions for each of his children for life, and after the death of each child for its issue, and a declaration that if any of his sons should become bankrupt his life estate should cease as if he were dead, and during the remainder of his life the trustees should apply the income to which, but for such forfeiture, he would have been entitled for the benefit of the wife and children of such son in such manner as the trustees should think fit. One of the testator's sons was married at the time of the testator's death; he subsequently became bankrupt, his wife died leaving him without issue; he married again and had two children. Lord Romilly held that the trust for the wife and children of the bankrupt son revived as soon as there came to be any wife or child to take under it. That is open to the observation that in that case there were some legatees who were unmarried. The other case is Boreham v. Bignell, 8 Hare 131, which was the case of a very peculiarly worded will, and where the Vice-Chancellor held, as he says, with regret, that the gift did not extend to a second wife. But as I read the decision he would, but for the special circumstances mentioned in the judgment, have come to a different conclusion.

Now I have to apply the rule to the case before me to say what the effect of the two elements which I have to consider is on my mind. I confess the effect of the two on my mind is that the testator meant any wife of his son. Whether I could have come to that conclusion on the first of the two elements alone in the conflicting state of the authorities it is needless for me to say, but I do rely on the way in which the testator provides for the income to be dealt with during the life of B. H. Drew in the event of alienation. I think there the testator meant any wife. I cannot believe it was the intention of the testator that though the children of the second wife were to be provided for, the second wife herself was to be excluded. What light does that throw on the prior part of the will? Testator has said that he has directed one-thirteenth part to be invested for the son and his family. "Family" there is used in a wide sense, and would include, I think, any wife of B. H. Drew for the time being, and that is shown by the direction that the income is to be applicable for the benefit of the son, his wife, and children. It seems to me, looking at the whole, that there is here a sufficient context to take the case out of the general rule, and I think, therefore, that the lady is entitled during her life.

Where the sole surviving trustee of a settlement is a person of unsound mind not so found, and is within the jurisdiction, the Chancery Division of the High Court has, under the Trustee Act, 1893, jurisdiction to appoint new trustees, but has no jurisdiction to make a vesting order.

This was a summons intituled in the matter of a settlement and also of the Trustee Act, 1893, asking for the appointment of new trustees of the settlement in the place of the two original trustees of the settlement, one of whom was dead, and the other of whom was a person of unsound mind not so found, and also asking that the right to call for a transfer of, and to transfer into the names of such new trustees a sum of consols, and to receive the dividends thereof, might vest in the new trustees. The applicant was a person of unsound mind not so found.

Kenyon Parker, for the applicant.—The question is whether or not this application ought not to have been made in Lunacy. I submit that it is properly made in this court. The old jurisdiction of the court in Chancery was not taken away by the Lunacy Act, 1890. Before that Act the jurisdiction was undoubted: In re Lemann's Trusts, 31 W. R. 520, 22 Ch. D. 633. The Trustee Act, 1893, re-enacts the provisions of the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852, as to the appointment of new trustees and the making of vesting orders, thus showing that the jurisdiction of this court and of the court in Lunacy are intended to be concurrent. The Act of 1893 gives this court power in the widest terms, and there is nothing to show that the case of unsoundness of mind is excluded.

STIRLING, J. — Before considering the powers conferred by the Act of 1893 it is necessary to see what were the statutory powers of the court at the time when it was passed. These were derived under the Trustee Act, 1850, and the Trustee Act, 1852. [His lordship referred to the provisions of those Acts, and continued:] Under those Acts it has been established that as a general rule, where a vesting order was required by reason of a trustee being of unsound mind, the lunacy jurisdiction had to be resorted to: see In re Davidson, In re Good Intent Benefit Society, In re Ormerod, In re Mason, In re Martin's Trusts. It has, however, been held that where the trustee of unsound mind was also an infant the jurisdiction conferred on the Court of Chancery by section 7 of the Trustee Act, 1850, might be exercised: In re Arrowsmith's Trusts; and the like conclusion was arrived at where the lunatic trustee was out of the jurisdiction: In re Gardner's Trusts, the judgment in which case shows the ratio decidendi. There Jessel, M.R., said: "The only point decided in In re Mason was that in the case of a lunatic trustee you should intitule your petition in Lunacy as well as in Chancery, under the 3rd section of the Act. The Court of Appeal, however, in directing the petition to be so intituled do not appear to have given any reason for the direction. The 9th section of the Act says that when the trustee is out of the jurisdiction the Court of Chancery may make a vesting order; and the 3rd section says that when the trustee is a lunatic the judges in Lunacy may make a vesting order. When you read the two sections together they evidently mean this, that when a lunatic trustee is within the jurisdiction the judges in Lunacy should make the order, but that when he is out of the jurisdiction the Court of Chancery—now the Chancery Division—may alone make the order, just as in the case of any other trustee out of the jurisdiction."

It has also been held that where the legal estate in land sold under the order of the Court of Chancery was vested in a person of unsound mind not so found, the Court of Chancery had power to make a vesting order under section 1 of the Trustee Act, 1852: Herring v. Clark. In cases where the lunacy jurisdiction was resorted to for a vesting order, and the appointment of a new trustee was also required, it was the usual course to make the order both in Lunacy and in Chancery; but wherever section 10 of the Trustee Act, 1852, was applicable, the order was properly made in Lunacy alone: In re Owen. If no vesting order was required, the Court of Chancery had power to appoint a new trustee in the place of one who had become a lunatic: In re Boyce, In re Sparrow, In re Vickers' Trusts, In re Martin's Trusts.

It has been suggested that a reason why it was held that the Court of Chancery had no power to make a vesting order on the appointment of a new trustee in the case of a lunatic is to be found in the language of section 34 of the Trustee Act, 1850, stating the effect of the vesting order. It is true that there are no words which expressly refer to the freedom of the old trustees from disability; but such words are equally absent in sections 7 and 9, under which it was held that the Court of Chancery might make vesting orders although the trustee was of unsound mind. Again, the terms of section 26 of the Trustee Act, 1850, and section 6 of the Trustee Act, 1852, with reference to vesting orders of stock, are the widest possible. Yet In re Ormerod shows the opinion of the Court of Appeal to have been that the Court of Chancery had no power to make a vesting order either as regards realty or personalty. Finally, the absence of such words was not regarded by the Master of the Rolls in In re Gardner's Trusts as an obstacle to his making an order under section 9 of the Trustee Act, 1850.

This being the state of the law, there was passed, in 1890, the Lunacy Act, 1890, which, by section 342, repealed (inter alia) all the sections of the Trustee Act, 1850, and the Trustee Act, 1852, which conferred on the lunacy authority powers of making vesting orders or appointing new trustees, and substituted for them a series of enactments (sections 133-142) conferring similar or extended powers on the judge in Lunacy.

Section 143 provides as follows: "The provisions of this Act as to vesting orders shall not affect the jurisdiction of the High Court as to any lunatic trustees out of the jurisdiction: In re Gardner's Trusts; or under section 1 of the Trustee Act: Herring v. Clark. The section appears, however, to show that it was not the object of the Act of 1890 to extend the jurisdiction of the High Court as regards the making of vesting orders in the case of lunatic trustees. The result, therefore, was that from the passing of the Lunacy Act, 1890, down to the passing of the Trustee Act, 1893, the High Court had no power to make a vesting order in the case of a lunatic trustee which that court did not possess before the Act of 1890 came into operation. By section 51 of the Act of 1893 the sections of the Acts of 1850 and 1852 which conferred on the Court of Chancery power to make vesting orders and appoint new trustees were repealed, and there were substituted for them a series of enactments, contained in sections 25-41, conferring on the High Court powers similar to those given by the repealed sections of the Trustee Acts. The contention on behalf of the applicant is that the power of the High Court has been extended by those sections, so that whereas prior to 1893 that court had no power to make a vesting order on the appointment of a new trustee in the place of a person of unsound mind, it now has jurisdiction to do so.

The language of section 32 of the Act of 1893 is in some respects wider than that of section 34 of the Trustee Act, 1850, and it expressly refers in some cases, though not in all, to the capacity of the trustee. The reason, however, why it was held that the Trustee Act, 1850, conferred no jurisdiction on the Court of Chancery to make a vesting order when the trustee was of unsound mind, was not, in my opinion, the presence or absence of words referring to incapacity from unsoundness of mind, but the existence in the Act of 1850 of clauses which dealt specially with the case of such trustees. Such clauses are not found in the Trustee Act, 1893, but they do exist in the Lunacy Act.

The Trustee Act, 1893, does not expressly deal with incapacity on the part of a trustee caused by unsoundness of mind. The Lunacy Act, 1890, and the Trustee Act, 1893, are simply statutes consolidating the existing enactments with reference to lunatics and trustees respectively; and looking at the history of the legislation on the subject, I have been unable to satisfy myself that the general terms used in the latter Act were intended to confer a jurisdiction which down to that time the High Court had not enjoyed. Seeing the great importance which attaches to vesting orders, and the undesirability of their being made by courts whose jurisdiction is open to doubt, I think that the safe and proper course in the present case is to abstain from making a vesting order, and so bring the present decision under the review of a higher court, by which I trust the question will be set at rest. At the same time, I consider that I have jurisdiction to appoint a new trustee and am willing to do so if the applicant desires it.

Dec. 2.—Kenyon Parker again mentioned the matter to the court, and asked for the appointment of a new trustee.

MILLER & ALDWORTH (LIMITED) v. SHARP. (a.)

Statute of Frauds—Part performance—Landlord and tenant—Verbal agreement for lease with existing tenant—Payment of increased rent.

Payment by the tenant and acceptance by the landlord of an increased rent in respect of premises hitherto held and occupied by the tenant as a yearly tenant, may be acts unequivocally and in their nature referable to an alleged new agreement for a lease for 21 years, and therefore such a part performance as takes the case out of the Statute of Frauds and allows parol evidence to be given of the alleged agreement.

Nunn v. Fabian, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 35, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 119, explained and followed.

This was an action for an alleged parol agreement to grant a lease for twenty-one years. The defendants were, as the trustees of J. Sharp, deceased, owners in fee simple of a beerhouse called "The Jolly Millers," in Dartford, Kent, and the plaintiffs, Miller & Aldworth (Limited), a limited company, held the beerhouse, as yearly tenants of the defendants at the rent of £14 a year.

The statement of claim alleged that a few days prior to the 23rd of May, 1894, a verbal agreement was come to between Miller & Aldworth (Limited) and the defendants, whereby the defendants agreed to grant, and the said plaintiffs agreed to accept, a lease of the premises for the term of twenty-one years, from the 24th of June, 1894, at the increased rent of £26 a year, and that such lease was to contain the usual covenants. Miller & Aldworth (Limited) remained in occupation of the premises and paid the rent of £26 from the 24th of June, 1894, until July, 1897, when they assigned the agreement to the plaintiffs, the Dartford Brewery Co. (Limited), who thereupon entered into occupation, and paid the rent. The rent was accepted by the plaintiffs, who gave receipts for it from time to time.

The defendants admitted the remaining in possession by the plaintiffs, and their payment of the increased rent, but stated that these acts were merely done in continuation of the yearly tenancy, and to avoid a notice to quit, and not in pursuance of any such agreement for a lease as was alleged. They also pleaded the Statute of Frauds. In proof of their case the plaintiffs produced at the trial, besides the receipts for rent, a letter written by James Sharp, one of the defendants, to Miller & Aldworth (Limited), as follows:

"Dear Sirs,—

"'Jolly Millers,'

"My brothers and I have arranged for Mr. E. Waterman to receive the rent of the above, so kindly pay him in future. We are advised that the rent you pay is a great deal too low, but as we are unwilling to take it out of your hands, we shall be glad to consider a proposal from you to take it on lease. Kindly let us have your early reply."

Upon the plaintiffs proposing to call witnesses to prove the agreement, the defendants objected that such evidence was inadmissible.

Astbury, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for the plaintiff.—The payment and acceptance of the increased rent of £26 was a part performance of the agreement for a lease of twenty-one years, which enables us to prove it by parol evidence. This was decided by Nunn v. Fabian, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 35, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 119; and the principle was stated and approved by Baggallay, L.J., in Humphreys v. Green, 10 Q. B. D. 148, at p. 156, 31 W. R. Dig. 82. And this view is consistent with the observations of Selborne, L.C., in Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, at p. 822, L. R. 8 Ca. App. 467, at p. 478.

They also cited McManus v. Cooke, at p. 35 W. R. 754, 35 Ch. D. 681 at p. 693; and Williams v. Evans, 23 W. R. 466, L. R. 19 Eq. 547.

Eve, Q.C., and W. C. Dare, for the defendants.—The cases have never gone so far as to say that mere payment of rent can be considered as part performance so as to let in parol evidence, and the better opinion is to the contrary: see the observations of Lord Selborne already quoted. Nunn v. Fabian does not decide this; in that case the increased rent paid by the tenant was in respect of premises part of which he had not previously been in possession of, and we submit that this was a special circumstance which distinguishes that case from the present: see the observations of Brett, L.J., in Humphreys v. Green, L. R. 10 Q. B. D. at p. 160.

BYRNE, J.—I am asked by the defendants to exclude parol evidence to show whether there was an agreement, and if so what that agreement was, with respect to the new tenancy alleged to have been entered into by the plaintiffs and defendants. It is an undoubted fact that there was a yearly tenancy existing. Then on the 8th of March, 1894, one of the defendants wrote the following letter to the tenants. [His lordship read the letter.] There is also a series of receipts for the new rent, of which the one dated the 29th of September, 1894, being a receipt for the rent, less tax, for the "Jolly Millers," is an example. The plaintiffs rely on the case of Nunn v. Fabian, and that case is a binding authority upon me. It appears to me that in that case Cranworth, L.C., held that notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds parol evidence might be given of an agreement to grant a lease on the ground of part performance where payment of rent at an increased amount had been proved. But the defendants sought to distinguish that case from the present one as being decided upon the special circumstance that new property not within the old tenancy was included in the new tenancy. I think, however, that in considering what was the ground of that decision, the remarks of Baggallay, L.J., in Humphreys v. Green (p. 156) must be considered, where, after stating that he was counsel in Nunn v. Fabian, he said, referring to the facts of that case, "the receipt for the balance of rent did not contain all the necessary elements of the contract; if, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for specific performance, it must have been upon the ground of proof of a sufficient part performance to take the case out of the statute, and so Lord Cranworth held. The fact of the plaintiff being in possession of the property was not a sufficient part performance of the parol agreement, for it was equally consistent with his continuing in possession under his previous tenancy, as of his possession being due to some agreement between himself and his landlord; moreover, Lord Cranworth declined to treat a proved expenditure of money upon the property as a part performance; but he held that there was a clear part performance by payment and acceptance of the Michaelmas rent at the increased rate, being of opinion that the payment of the increased amount could be referable only to some agreement; and upon that ground alone he made a decree for specific performance." I think, therefore, that Nunn v. Fabian is an authority in point. I also think that the observations of Selborne, L.C., in Maddison v. Alderson (p. 478) are applicable. [His lordship read the passage commencing "Lord Hardwicke," and continuing:] "Some of the reasons which have been given for that conclusion" (that part payment of the purchase-money is not an act of part performance) "are not satisfactory; the best explanation of it seems to be, that the payment of money is an equivocal act, not (in itself) until the connection is established by parol testimony, indicative of a contract concerning land. I am not aware of any case in which the whole purchase-money has been paid without delivery of possession, nor is such a case at all likely to happen. All the authorities show that the acts relied on as part performance must be unequivocally and in their own nature referable to some such agreement as that alleged."

In the present case I think that the acceptances of rent at the increased rate were acts "unequivocally and in their own nature referable to some such agreement as that alleged," and not to the old tenancy, and consequently that parol evidence of what that agreement was may be given.

[The action was subsequently compromised.]

Q. B. Div.

GORDON v. CANN. (a.)

Local government—Lighting-up time for bicycles—"Sunset"—Greenwich mean time—Statutes (Definition of Time) Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 9), s. 1—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 85.

By section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, bicycles and other similar machines are required to carry a light "during the period between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise."

By section 1 of the Statutes (Definition of Time) Act, 1880, whenever any expression of time occurs in any Act of Parliament, deed, or other legal instrument, the time referred to shall, unless it is otherwise specifically stated, be held in the case of Great Britain to be Greenwich mean time.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that "one hour after sunset" was not an expression of time within the meaning of the Act of 1880, and therefore that lighting-up time, within the meaning of section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, was to be reckoned from the time of sunset in the particular locality in which the alleged offence of riding without a light had been committed.

Case stated by justices for the city of Bristol.

The question for the decision of the court was whether the period between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise, during which lights are required by section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, to be carried on bicycles and other similar machines, should be reckoned according to the actual time of sunset in the locality or according to the times of sunset and sunrise at Greenwich.

The justices held that the period must be reckoned according to the times of sunset and sunrise at Greenwich, because they thought it would be an advantage that there should be a readily ascertained time for the lighting-up of bicycle lamps. They accordingly convicted the appellant, who on the occasion of the alleged offence on the 19th of August, 1898, was riding a bicycle in Bristol without a light at 8.15 p.m., which was less than one hour after sunset at Bristol, but more than an hour after sunset at Greenwich on that date.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Alexander Glen, for the appellant.—"Sunset" is not an expression of time within the meaning of the Statutes (Definition of Time) Act, 1880, and therefore that Act does not apply. If the justices were right in holding that the Act of 1880 did apply, then we say that the decision of the justices must be set aside as being unworkable and absurd. The statute directs that "whenever any expression of time occurs in any Act of Parliament the time referred to shall, unless it is otherwise specifically stated, be held, in the case of Great Britain, to be Greenwich mean time." In the present case "one hour after Greenwich mean time" means, if it means anything at all, six o'clock all the year round. Supposing there was a difference between the local time of sunset where the alleged offence was committed and sunset at Greenwich of an hour in summer, then a cyclist might be required to light up an hour before the sun sank below the horizon, and in winter, in some cases, he would not be compelled to light up till an hour after it had sunk below the horizon. There is no difficulty in fixing the time of sunset at any given locality in England by reference to the book of the Cyclist Touring Club.

The respondent did not appear.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am not surprised that no one appears to argue for the respondent, for the decision of the justices is clearly wrong. The conviction must be quashed, and as it appears that the respondent set the law in motion with the object of getting the question decided, he must pay the costs of the appeal.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Dec. 5; Jan. 23.

In re MASON.

Ex parte BING v. CRAIG. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Partnership—Loan of money at rate of interest varying with profits of business—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 2 (3) (d), 3.

In 1893 a creditor advanced various sums of money to a firm of Bryan & Mason under an agreement to take a share of profits in lieu of interest. In 1895 the firm dissolved partnership, and Mason took over the business and liabilities, entering into a fresh agreement with the creditor to pay five per cent. interest on the money advanced. Mason became bankrupt in 1898, and the creditor proved for the moneys advanced.

Held, that the money must be considered to have been advanced under the agreement of 1893, and not under that of 1895, and that the proof could not be admitted until all the other creditors should have been paid in full.

Appeal by a creditor from the rejection of a proof for money lent.

The first advance made by Mrs. Bing, the appellant, was made to the firm of Mason & Bryan under the terms of an agreement dated the 2nd of October, 1893, whereby she agreed to provide £600 on the 31st of January, 1894, and further capital not exceeding £1,000 on the 21st of July, 1894, and it was further agreed that she was to receive a sum equal to one-third of the profits of the business in lieu of interest. The partnership between Mason & Bryan was dissolved by a deed dated the 1st of June, 1895, whereby Mason took over the business and agreed to pay and satisfy all moneys owing by the firm to Mrs. Bing. Upon the 1st of August, 1895, a further agreement was entered into between Mason and Mrs. Bing, which recited that Mrs. Bing, in addition to the £1,600 agreed to be advanced under the deed of 1893, had at the date of the dissolution of partnership advanced to the firm a further sum of £2,307 14s. 2d., and had since that date advanced £1,120 to Mason. By the same deed Mason agreed to repay to Mrs. Bing the sum of £1,600 on the 31st of December, 1902, and in lieu of interest thereon one moiety of the profits of the business. He further agreed to pay her the sum of £1,000 (part of the said sum of £2,307 14s. 2d.) by the 31st of December, 1895, a further sum of £1,000 by the 30th of April, 1896, and the residue of the said sum of £2,307 14s 2d. and the sum of £1,120 and all further advances by the 30th of April, 1897, "and until the said principal sums (other than the said sum of £1,600) shall be repaid will pay to her interest thereon or on so much thereof respectively as shall be owing at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum."

Mason became bankrupt in 1898, and Mrs. Bing proved in the bankruptcy for the whole of the moneys advanced by her, whereupon the trustee rejected her proof upon the ground that the proof was in respect of a loan of money to a business at a rate of interest varying with the profits, within section 2 (3) (d) and section 3 of the Partnership Act, 1890, which enacts that where money has been advanced to a person engaged in business on a contract with that person that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, then in the event of such person being adjudged a bankrupt the lender shall not be entitled to recover anything in respect of the loan until all the other creditors have been satisfied.

Mrs. Bing appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Hansell, for the appellant.—The trustee is only justified in thus rejecting a proof when the case comes within the words of the Partnership Act, 1890: "In the event of any person to whom money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract . . . being adjudged bankrupt." In this case the "person" to whom the money was advanced has not become bankrupt; the money was originally lent to Bryan and Mason, and Bryan has not become bankrupt. On the 1st of August, 1895, there was a new lending to Mason, under an agreement whereby only £1,600 was left at a rate of interest varying with profits, and whereby it was agreed to pay 5 per cent. upon the remainder. The proof should therefore be admitted as to all but the £1,600.

Dickens, Q.C., and P. T. Blackwell, for the trustee.—The court must look at the terms upon which the loan was originally made. Ex parte Taylor, In re Grason, 28 W. R. 205, 12 Ch. D. 366. It makes no difference that one member of the original firm has retired, the sole representative of the firm has now been adjudged bankrupt.

Reed, Q.C., in reply, cited Ex parte Nottingham, In re Tuff & Nottingham, 35 W. R. 567, 19 Q. B. D. 88.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case it seems to me that the contract of the 1st of August, 1895, is not the contract under which the money in question was advanced because it recognizes that money as previously advanced. The contract of the 1st of June, 1895, does not affect the question because it does not mention the terms under which the money was advanced, it only substitutes one partner for two, and it does not amount to a fresh lending. We must therefore go back to the contract of October, 1893, and I think that the true inference from all the circumstances of the case is that when Mrs. Bing advanced the £2,300 she did it on the same basis on which she had advanced the £1,600. Therefore section 3 of the Partnership Act, 1890, applies. The contract of the 1st of August, 1895, altered the terms of the lending, but not so as to have any legal effect: see Ex parte Taylor, In re Grason.

Mr. Reed's point on section 3 of the Partnership Act was very ingenious, but I do not think that my decision ought to be affected by it; the money was lent to a firm, and the person who represents the firm has been adjudged bankrupt, which seems to me to bring this case within the section.

Appeal dismissed.

SPICER v. SPICER. (a.)

Probate—Practice—Costs—Proof in solemn form—Notice by defendants to cross-examine only—R. S. C., ord. 21, r. 18.

The court at the hearing of a probate suit being of opinion that the defendants—who were opposing a will and codicil, and had given notice under ord. 21, r. 18, that they merely insisted on the will being proved in solemn form of law, and that they only intended to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of the will—had no reasonable ground for opposing the will, condemned the defendants to pay the costs of the plaintiffs who were propounding the documents.

Hearing before the court itself of a probate action in which the plaintiff, Mary Jane Spicer, widow of Frederick Spicer, as executrix, and Frederick John Shaw, as executor, propounded the will and codicil of Frederick Spicer, deceased, Trinity House pilot.

The defendants were three daughters of the testator by a former marriage, and with their defence gave notice (before the 15th of August, 1898) under the old ord. 21, r. 18, that they merely insisted on the will being proved in solemn form of law and that they only intended to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of it.

The attesting witnesses were called, and after they had been examined and cross-examined, the cross-examination eliciting nothing to throw a doubt on the will, the court held the will to be duly executed. The question of costs was then argued.

Barnard, for the plaintiffs, asked for costs under ord. 21, r. 18. The defendants applied for a common jury, stating there would be a plea of undue influence, but withdrew the application. The plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendants' solicitors asking them to withdraw their defence, and giving them notice that if they did not the plaintiffs would apply for costs. They have had plenty of time since the 15th of August, when the new rule came into operation, to do so, but they have refrained from doing so, thus putting the plaintiffs to the expense of proving the will in solemn form, and they ought to pay the costs.

Bayford, for the defendants.—The defendants gave the notice under the old rule when it was in force, and ought therefore to be protected by it. There was nothing to draw their attention to the new rule; it was not publicly circulated until after it came into force.

JEUNE, P.—In this case I have to deal with the new rule, ord. 21, r. 18, which says that "In probate actions the party opposing a will may, with his defence, give notice to the party setting up the will that he merely insists on the will being proved in solemn form of law, and only intends to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of the will, and he shall thereupon be at liberty to do so." The following words are new, "and shall not, in any event, be liable to pay the costs of the other side unless the judge shall be of opinion that there was no reasonable ground for opposing the will." That rule effected an alteration of the old practice which, as provided by the old rule, was that "the defendant shall be subject to the same liabilities in respect of costs as he would have been under similar circumstances, according to the practice of the Court of Probate, before the principal Act came into operation," the practice of the Court of Probate was that the party giving such notice was not liable for costs. I confess I never could see the reason of the rule. I suppose its origin was historic. I have been unable to see why a party should not make up his mind one way or the other, and either admit or dispute a will rather than be allowed to join in a skirmish at no risk of paying costs but at the expense of the estate. The question under the new rule is whether I am of opinion that there was reasonable ground for opposing the will. It has been said the defendants' solicitors did not know of the alteration of the rule, but when they did know of it they could have withdrawn and might then have had a good ground for asking for costs up to then. I am clearly of opinion that there was no reasonable ground for opposing the will. The new rule was intended to prevent people opposing wills where they have no case, therefore the defendants must pay the costs of the plaintiffs.

In the Goods of BRAZIER. (a.)

Probate — Will — Obliteration — Words obliterated, "apparent"—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 26.

A holograph will originally contained two devises and gift of a legacy to the testator's son "Daniel." The name had been obliterated in all three places, but when there was nothing to show, and the testator had written in the names of Daniel in one, and of another son Thomas in two other places.

The court, on the evidence of an expert that, with the aid of a magnifying glass, he could read the original name Daniel in all three places, on motion by consent of all parties interested, granted administration with the will annexed, with the original word "Daniel" substituted in all three places, on the ground that the original words were "apparent" within the meaning of section 26 of the Wills Act.

Motion on behalf of Daniel Brazier for administration to the estate of his father, Thomas Brazier, who died the 9th of January, 1897, with a will of 1874 a codicil of 1881 and a will of 1884, annexed, with a substituted name in the latter for names written over erasures.

The will of 1884 was a holograph will containing no revocatory clause, and did not dispose of the whole of the property, but it contained a clause in respect of which the difficulty had arisen. By the clause in question the testator bequeathed a cottage to "my son Daniel Brazier," another cottage to "my son Thomas Brazier," and £300 "unto Thomas Brazier." An expert in handwriting, T. H. Gurrin, on affidavit, deposed that he had examined the will with a magnifying glass, that the three above-mentioned Christian names were written over erasures, and that in each case the name originally written was Daniel. The surviving attesting witness was unable to say whether the alterations were made before the execution of the will. The application was made with the consent of parties interested.

Priestley, in support of the application.—As the name Daniel is visible to an expert, as deposed by him, it is "apparent" within the meaning of section 26 of the Wills Act, and the court ought to grant administration with the obliterated word Daniel in all three places restored.

BARNES, J., considered the evidence sufficient, and made the order.

Motion allowed.

DOWLING v. DOWLING. (a.)

Divorce—Wife's suit—Separation deed not pleaded—Cruelty before separation deed—Covenant not to sue—Undefended suit.

The court granted a wife a decree for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty and adultery, the cruelty being before the date of a separation deed, notwithstanding a covenant in the deed providing that no proceedings should be taken in respect of such misconduct, on the ground that the deed had not been pleaded.

Hearing of an undefended suit by Elizabeth Mary Dowling for dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty and adultery.

The parties were married in 1870 and in 1897 they separated on the terms of a deed which provided that no proceedings should be taken by either party in respect of any misconduct prior to the date of the deed, but that the covenants of the deed should be void if the marriage were dissolved or the parties judicially separated by reason of any subsequent misconduct. Cruelty prior, and adultery subsequent to the deed were proved. The husband did not set up the deed, and did not defend the suit.

Barnard, for the petitioner.—The covenants in the deed of separation are different from those in Rose v. Rose, 30 W. R. 736, 7 P. D. 225, before Sir J. Hannen, and 31 W. R. 573, 8 P. D. 98, in the Court of Appeal. Moreover, the respondent has not pleaded the deed, and therefore the court should follow the case of Tress v. Tress, 35 W. R. 672, 12 P. D. 128, and assume that the respondent knew that he could not successfully do so.

BARNES, J., granted the decree nisi, distinguishing the case from Rose v. Rose on the ground that the deed had not been pleaded.

STANLEY v. STANLEY. (a.)

Divorce—Dissolution of marriage on wife's petition—Maintenance of wife and children—Payment of capital sum without settlement—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 4.

Upon a dissolution of marriage at the suit of the wife, where the husband disappeared, and the only asset available was a sum of money standing in his name in a suit in the Chancery Division, the wife being entirely without means, the court, on a petition, ordered the balance (about £200), after payment of costs, to be paid to the wife (without any settlement) for the benefit of herself and children.

Morris v. Morris, 31 L. J. P. & M. 33, 10 W. R. Div. Dig. 24, followed.

Motion to confirm the registrar's report on a petition by Margaret Anne Stanley against her former husband for maintenance of herself and children. The marriage was dissolved on the ground of the husband's cruelty and adultery, and the husband disappeared about eight years ago, taking with him all the money he possessed. In 1895 the husband, by the death of his mother, became entitled to a sum of £320 now in court standing to his credit in a suit in the Chancery Division.

This petition was then presented and the registrar's report recommended that after payment of the costs to the petitioner's solicitors, the balance should be paid to the mother without any settlement for the maintenance of herself and children, she being without means and supported by relations.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Le Bas, in support of the motion.—After payment of the solicitors' costs there will be a sum of about £200. It would not be for the benefit of the children to settle this, as the amount is so small. The court has power under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 4, to make any order it likes for the maintenance of the children. In Morris v. Morris, 31 L. J. P. & M. 33, 10 W. R. Div. Dig. 24, the court made an order under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 32, for the payment by the husband to the wife of a lump sum for her maintenance.
